Hunt Hall declared safe despite rumors

By Matt Ellis
Staff Writer

Despite rumors that have lead some students to believe otherwise, Hunt Hall is a structurally stable building.

The rumors traveling around campus have been related to the structural strength of certain rooms in Hunt Hall and the building in general, specifically during Greek recruitment when the building's occupancy more than doubles.

Students began questioning the building's stability last Tuesday when members of Delta Delta Delta sorority noticed a hairline fracture in the ceiling of a room on their suite. They also noticed that the ceiling slightly flexed as members of Kappa Kappa Gamma practiced recruitment activities on the suite directly above.

"We heard a loud boom, which was caused by jumping in the room above. We also noticed some movement in the ceiling. We got a little scared at first," said Kate Greer '03, a sister of Delta Delta Delta.

The following day, Director of Housing and Residential Life Dan Remley, Assistant Director of Maintenance Jeff Loss and Assistant Director of Operations of Physical Plant Mike Patterson inspected the building.

"There are no visible signs of structural problems in the building. There is a hairline crack in the middle of the Tri-Delt suite, but nothing of eminent concern," Patterson said.

"If anyone thought Hunt Hall was unsafe we would have closed it," Ferraro said.

"After everyone came to look at the building and it was decided it was safe, we all felt that it must be safe," said Katie Rogers '03, a sister of Delta Delta Delta.

The administration frequently talks about renovating Hunt Hall, though no date to do so has been disclosed.

"It is an old building that needs renovated. No plans to begin the renovations have been scheduled as of yet. The design is done, but the Board of Trustees must approve the project which could happen as soon as next year," said Patterson.

Ferraro reiterates Patterson, saying the building will be renovated at some point.

"Hunt Hall is the first building slated to be renovated and hopefully we will be able to complete this project in the not too distant future," Ferraro said.

Concern for the stability of the floor arises when an excessive amount of people jump, causing a potentially dangerous point load on the floor.

According to Patterson, the principals of harmonic motion caused the concern. If a large group of people jump in unison, a wave can be created. If the motion is continued, the wave can become strong enough to cause damage to the building.

"All parties were advised that large numbers of people jumping up and down [on floors] other than the basement floor rooms were not advisable. This goes for a building as old as Hunt and of one as new as the New Residence Hall," Patterson said.

According to Patterson, a comparable situation would be having 25 women jump up and down in a second floor room of a normal house—something a home is not meant for. This, Patterson said, is the same situation as in Hunt Hall or any other resident hall on campus. The building was not designed to sustain this type of force.

"This type of activity has been going on for several years, but each year it has gotten worse as each sorority tries to outdo the other. The upcoming renovations will not allow for this type of activity since it is not what the structure was designed for," Patterson said.

Hunt Hall was built in 1928 and is one of the oldest buildings on campus. The residence houses seven sorority suites and is the only single-sex dormitory on campus.

Bison mourn loss of a legend

After coaching cross country and track and field at the University for 36 years, Art Gulden passed away while in New Jersey for the IC4A track tournament in May, writes Senior Sports Writer Brian Klotz.

Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Art Gulden passed away in May after a seven-year struggle with B-cell Lymphoma, a type of cancer.

The first reports started coming in on the evening of Saturday, May 19th, 2001. Art Gulden, head coach of the University track and field and cross country teams, had passed away. The story hit major sports and running publications across the country shortly after; the running community was in shock.

Gulden was in Princeton, N.J., the site of the 2001 IC4A outdoor track and field meet, when he died. He had gone to watch the Bucknell athletes compete, some of whom he had coached for four straight years. Still recovering from a bone marrow transplant four months before, he was weak and only able to be mobile for a few hours at a time. He was just about to leave to watch the meet for the day when he collapsed on his bed from a heart attack, dying ten hours later at the Helona Trauma Center in Trenton, N.J.

Gulden came to Bucknell 36 years ago. He earned a master's degree in education from Rutgers University just a year before and had a passion for running. He initially taught seminars, including one entitled "Sport as a Social Institution," before gravitating towards coaching full-time in 1970.

Taking over the reins as head coach of the cross country and track and field teams was a difficult job, with almost no team to speak of at the time. Gulden spent the next five years building the program, showing what it took to be a member of his team.

"Commitment to the goals that you had, whether it was track or school, was what Coach Gulden was all about," remembers podiatrist Dr. Dan Davis '76, who has been donating his time to the University running program for the past fifteen years treating athletes as a service to Gulden. "He took a couple of us that were a dime-a-dozen runners, and through commitment made us good."

Title IX enforced, wrestling cut

By Andrew Burr
Sports Editor

"Achieving gender equity in athletics is morally the right thing to do, and it also is a matter of federal law."

Those words, received by the student body on May 2 in an email from University President Steffen Rogers, preceded the University's official decision to discontinue the varsity wrestling program following the 2001-2002 season. The University also indicated that the varsity crew program would be reclassified as a club sport following the upcoming season.

"The Bucknell community feels, by and large, that 28 or fewer varsity sports is about the right number," Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said. "The decision came down to what the right move would be for Bucknell to balance gender equity and fiscal responsibility, while maintaining excellence."

The core issue and overwhelming reason why wrestling and crew were cut from varsity status arose from disproportionate numbers of male and female varsity athletes at the University. Last year, despite sponsoring 14 varsity athletic programs for both males and females, the University sports community consisted of 157 more male athletes than female athletes. As President Rogers stated in his announcement before the programs were cut, " ... 49 percent of our undergraduates are women, but only 42 percent of our student-athletes are women."

Title IX, a provision of the Education Amendments of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, mandates a level of female participation roughly equivalent to the male/female student population at institutions. Existing as a federal law, the termination of the wrestling and crew programs was an effort by the University to bring the number of male and female athletes to a more acceptable ratio.

The decision was made public following weeks of rumors regarding the fate of the two male athletic programs, and with assurances from the administration that every other alternative was explored.

Called an "administrative decision with the support of the trustees" by Rogers, the means to come into compliance with Title IX provisions and former University President William Adams' self-imposed gender equity plan were reduced to the discontinuation of male varsity athletic programs.

"The only justification to reducing men's sports is to be in compliance with federal law," Rogers said.

The process and prospect of ending varsity programs at Bucknell has not been a pleasant experience for the administration, participating athletes and coaches, alumni and students.

In a written statement, Athletic Director John Hardt called the decision "gut wrenching" but "necessary for Bucknell to address gender equity issues and the legal requirements of Title IX."

According to Pollock, there were several criteria by which the administration weighed the decision to cut male varsity athletic programs. Lack of Patriot League sponsorship was one of the most critical factors in the determination, leaving three sports exposed: men's water polo, wrestling and crew. "After that," Pollock said, "we looked

Borough imposes stronger party restrictions

By Katie O'Connell
Staff Writer

New Lewisburg party regulations exist this semester as a result of an ordinance passed by the Borough of Lewisburg in mid-May. The ordinance increases fines for "public disturbances and other acts of disorderly conduct" in the town from a $350 minimum fine to a $1000 maximum fine.

At this point, the Lewisburg police have exhibited restraint in applying the ordinance. The police have not yet issued any citations for violation of this ordinance.

The Borough intends to minimize "public disturbances" with this ordinance and consequently make police services more readily available to serve other locations and emergencies. The disproportionate number of calls regarding public disturbances in certain downtown areas prompted the Borough to create the ordinance.

"Public disturbances" include problems such as public drunkenness, public urination, littering, obstruction of roads, unreasonable noise and obscene language.

"In part, I think the town has acted with restraint because it sees an effort by many students and by persons in the school's administration to try to be helpful," Richard Ferraro, dean of students, said.

The ordinance holds the hosts of the gatherings as well as the attendees and the owners of the property accountable for the disturbances and resulting consequences. In addition to the standard fines imposed for these disturbances, the owners of the properties will be charged for the police service costs for each disturbance after the initial one in any given period of 30 days.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Students who live downtown face tough sanctions for unruly parties.

However, Charles Sypula, an owner of a number of student-rented properties in the downtown area said, "I don't think the ordinance will affect my relationship with my tenants because I have always had high expectations of my tenants and they have been respectful of the neighborhood, of the neighbors and of the buildings. I seldom have been disappointed in the four years that I have been a student landlord in Lewisburg."

With the increased volume of calls for public disturbances in the past six months and the increase in severity of the parties, the Borough voted unanimously 7-0 in May to make a total commitment to this issue.

"The council is taking the problem very seriously. The goal of the Borough is to decrease the number of calls going back to these parties. I think the ordinance is going to have a positive impact on the community," Borough Police Chief William R. Nietz Jr. said.

The ordinance also grants officers certain options in dealing with the people held responsible for the disturbances.

"The ordinance gives us the right to actually arrest and take an individual directly to the district justice," Nietz said.

The fines will be determined by the magistrate and will often depend on the number of times the individual has come before the magistrate for citations previously.

Students living in the downtown area represent the primary subjects who will be influenced by this ordinance.

"I think certain people will be more cautious when it comes to walking with open containers, for instance, but I think the majority of people will carry on as they usually do unless the police begin to give out these fines," said Kristin Raggi '02, downtown resident.

The police department and Borough will not be able to gauge the effectiveness of the new ordinance in reducing incidents of public disturbance for another couple of months when records can be compared.

"While the $1000 ordinance has not been enforced to date and while the town seems to be acting cautiously, do not give fate-control up to other people. Assume that the first charge may be just around the corner. Act in a way that is protective of yourself and fair to others," Ferraro said.

Class of 2005 raises standards

By Michelle Dombeck

Nine hundred and thirteen of the University's newest students arrived on Friday, Aug. 24th. The class of 2005 includes some of the best and the brightest—valedictorians, athletes, musicians and artists.

Elena Gregorio '05 is an example of a well-rounded first-year student. Valedictorian at her high school, Gregorio is a member of the Humanities Residential College. Gregorio was also accepted into the University Concert Chorale and Rooke Chapel Choir. She feels the University is a good fit for her.

"This school was the perfect location and size for me. The music program here is great, and the idea of the residential colleges was very interesting, especially the Humanities College," Gregorio said. "At Bucknell, the admis-

Public Safety Log

August 28, 2001

INFORMATION / STUDENT RETURNED TO CAMPUS BY LPD - A University student was returned to Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity after he was cited for underage consumption and littering on South Sixth Street.

INFORMATION / SYRINGES - Public Safety responded to the rear of Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity for the report of a syringe on the ground. The incident was determined to be unfounded.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF - Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of a window broken by a water balloon. No witnesses or suspects could be located in a search of the area.

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE ACT 64 VIOLATION - Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of the odor of marijuana. Upon investigation, the incident was determined to be unfounded.

August 29, 2001

STUDENT HEALTH SERVICE TRANSPORT - Public Safety responded to Galloway House for the report of an ill student. The individual was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room by a Student Health Service driver and later returned to campus.

INFORMATION - A University alumnus contacted Public Safety and advised he was receiving computer viruses from a University student email account. Upon investigation, it was determined that the University student had received an infected email that was randomly generating email to unknown persons. The student had used a virus scan program to eliminate the problem so the incident has been cleared.

INFORMATION / MISSING COUCH - A University student reported to Public Safety that a couch he had stored in Tustin Gym was missing when he returned for it. The student was advised to check with the individual who authorized the storage to see if the furniture could be located.

August 30, 2001

STUDENT HEALTH TRANSPORT - A student reported to Public Safety that he felt dizzy after being struck in the head while playing football. The individual was transported by Student Health Services to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus.

August 31, 2001

INFORMATION - Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of intoxicated individuals running in the hallways tearing paper from the doors. The group had dispersed by the time the officers arrived. The incident is under investigation.

SUSPICIOUS ACTIVITY / MALE SITTING IN VEHICLE - A University student reported to Public Safety and Lewisburg Police that a male has been sitting in a car staring into a St. Louis Street residence. If the occupants go outside, the male leaves immediately. Lewisburg Police requested the student to call 911 immediately if the person returns. The incident is under investigation.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF - Public Safety responded to the Farm Lot for the report of a University student's vehicle that was damaged while it was parked there. East Buffalo Township Police was notified and the incident is under investigation.

September 1, 2001

6308 / AMBULANCE TRANSPORT - Public Safety responded to Smith Hall for the report of an intoxicated student who was ill. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment of an alchol overdose. The student later returned to campus.

POWER OUTAGE - The campus experienced a power outage possible caused by a vehicle striking a light pole off campus. Physical Plant electricians were on campus and corrected the problem.

POSSIBLE ACT 64 VIOLATION - Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of the odor of marijuana. Upon investigation, the incident was determined to be unfounded.

September 2, 2001

September 4, 2001

INFORMATION - Public Safety responded to Hunt Hall for the report of a male outside the building yelling. The individual was gone when the officer's arrived and a search or the area met with negative results. The female students were advised to call Public Safety if the individual returned.

Bertrand Library extends hours

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

All the upperclassmen returning to the University this fall will get a nice surprise when they learn about the library's extended hours. The closing times will stay the same for Friday and Saturday nights; however, on weeknights the library will stay open until 1 a.m. and continue to open at 8 a..m.

Faculty, students, and even the librarians all agree that this is an excellent change.

"This was an issue that was just resurrected last semester. Two years ago, the issue was worked on extensively, however at the time the administration did not follow through. That is why when the new executive board came in last semester, we tried to convey that extended library hours was something the students really wanted and it was definitely time the administration act on this request," BSG President Nate Sorber said.

Bucknell Student Government also went through several different steps in order to enact these changes. "First BSG delegated the issue to the Academic Affairs Committee of BSG, in which Erica Delsandro is the chairwoman. Academic Affairs was instructed to gather all previous information dealing with the issue. They also constructed surveys to gain an understanding of what exactly the students' feelings were on the time extension.

Once we had a concise document of what we believed the students wanted, myself and the executive board, took the issue to the administration," continued Nate Sorber.

The Vice President for student affairs was enthusiastic about the changes. " I hope there will be additional opportunity to access resources supporting academic inquiry and additional quiet study space. Also for communal scholarship, a sense that there are lots of people on campus committed to scholarly pursuit," said Charlie Pollock, Vice President of Student Affairs. "Initially President Adams and I tried always to be encouraging of BSG and its efforts. But we're equally concerned that the library staff be 100% behind this and that all practical dimensions be accomplished," continued Vice President Pollock.

It seems that Vice President Pollock does not have to worry about opposition among the library staff. The employees of the library learned about the changes this summer, when they received an e-mail. "I don't have a problem with this change. I think it's a good idea. It will give students a chance to be here later and get more work done, " said Misty Trezona '02 and librarian.

Apparently, every side on this issue is in accord. Everyone agrees that the later hours will have its intended effect on giving the students more time to finish their work. Now it is up to the student body to take advantage of these changes and use the later hours for productive uses.

With the help of Bucknell Student Government, the Bertrand Library has extended its hours to 1 a.m.

Major construction projects underway

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

It would be hard not to notice the changes in the campus this year. With two major construction projects visibly underway and numerous lower-profile renovations either in planning or in progress, the University will end this year with a different face than the one that students see now.

The most noticeable of the renovations is the new building being erected in the uphill area. The foundation for the O'Leary Center for Psychology and Geology was completed over the summer, and work on the actual structure will begin before the end of September.

"The work is progressing on-schedule," Director of Physical Plant Dennis Hawley said. "The building will begin to take shape soon."

By the time it opens in 2002, the construction of the O'Leary Center will have cost a total of $8 million, although little of that total has been spent yet.

Students with classes in Coleman Hall may notice another project currently underway. The building is in the second year of a three-year renovation project, and although the renovation of the southern wing of the building had been completed over the summer, work on the northern wing was stopped for the academic year after a large part of the wing had been prepared for restorations, but has not yet been completed.

"The prolonged schedule is a natural result of the magnitude of the work that has to be done, and the fact that we're restricted to doing that work during the summer," Hawley said. "We need to do all the work we can in the time before classes start, because we can't divert all of the classes and offices in Coleman to other buildings."

Returning students will remember that the Langone Center underwent general renovations beginning at the end of the last academic year. Over the course of the summer, the bookstore and ground floor mall were completely remodeled, and the asbestos that had been used as fireproofing for the structural steel of the building when it was first constructed was removed.

"Where it was, the asbestos posed no health risk—we had an independent contractor verify that when the work was originally planned," Hawley said. "We removed it as part of a long-standing University practice of removing asbestos as a standard part of any renovations."

Work on the Center will start up again in April 2002, when the Cafeteria will close for the year. Over the next few months, an as-yet unchosen contractor will update the dining and serving areas, making the general layout more efficient and replacing much of the current equipment, some of which has been in service since the Center opened in 1971.

In order to give students a place to eat while the Cafeteria is being renovated, Dining Services will, beginning after Spring Break, keep the Larison cafeteria and Terrace dining room open during the Cafeteria's normal hours, instead of their current abbreviated schedules.

"We will be providing for students' needs during the renovations," said Timothy Tenon, general manager of dining services.

Construction also got underway over the summer for the Recreation and Athletics Center. East Field, the former home of soccer and lacrosse games, was leveled to pave way for the expansion and construction of new facilities.

Less-noticeable projects completed over the summer months include the reconstruction of six tennis courts behind the new Fieldhouse and the upgrading of a number of campus utilities, including electrical wiring and steam distribution. This upgrade, and the extensive digging that was necessary to complete it, is the reason that many of the grassy areas on campus were reseeded before students arrived in August.

sions process was also a lot friendlier than some of the other places I applied."

Dean of Admissions Mark Davies reports that the class of 2005 is extremely qualified and one of the most competitive classes yet.

"Interest in Bucknell is increasing. We have received more than 8,000 applications for the incoming fall class, which is a record," Davies said.

According to Davies, the SAT average is in the upper 1270s. With so many qualified students applying for admissions this year, only 38.9 percent of applicants were accepted. Sixty percent of these students also graduated in the top 10 percent of their class.

Colleen Auriemma '05 is also very satisfied with her decision to attend the University.

"Initially I was drawn to Bucknell's great reputation. However, as I began to talk to alumni and students about Bucknell, I noticed how much Bucknellians loved their school," Auriemma said.

A visit to campus cemented her decision.

"I wasn't one of those kids who instantly knew which school they wanted to attend when they stepped on campus, but when I visited Bucknell for the second time, only a few weeks before my decision was due, I realized that this is where I wanted to be," Auriemma said. "There were so many activities going on and the students seemed to be having so much fun."

Eager to share their enthusiasm for the University, Auriemma and her roommate, Tyler Kidder '05, expressed in hosting prospective students. The Admissions Office informed the pair that they would be hosting a prospective in a month. Both students look forward to the chance to show others how exciting the University can be.

"I never had the chance to spend the night here, but I got such a great feeling from Bucknell when I visited," Kidder said. "Now I want everyone else to see how great this campus is."

Mexico's leader seeks immigration deal this year

WASHINGTON (CNN) — Mexican President Vicente Fox said Wednesday he would like to see a wide-ranging agreement with U.S. officials on immigration by the end of the year.

President Bush welcomed Fox to the White House for talks on immigration and other subjects on Wednesday, and Fox was the guest of honor at the president's first state dinner Wednesday night. Fox wants a blanket amnesty for Mexican immigrants who entered the United States illegally, which Bush opposes.

Job cuts top 1 million

NEW YORK (CNNfn) — Companies set fewer job cuts last month than in July, but the total brought the number of announced cuts above 1 million so far this year, an employment firm said Wednesday.

The number of cuts announced last month fell 32 percent to 140,019 from July, but came in more than double those of a year earlier, Challenger Gray & Christmas said in its monthly report on job cut announcements.

And with the August numbers, total job cuts announced this year climbed to 1.12 million, 83 percent higher than the total for all of last year, the Chicago-based firm said.

Missiles rip Palestinian security building

GAZA CITY (CNN) — The Israel Defense Forces said Wednesday it attacked a Palestinian security building — a post of the elite Force 17 security guard unit close to Beit Hanun in Gaza — in reaction to the firing of mortar bombs overnight at Israeli targets from Gaza.

The incidents follow what Israeli police are calling a suicide bombing in Jerusalem on Tuesday, when a man blew himself up on a busy street, killing himself and injuring at least 12 people, at least three seriously.

Police stopped the bomber — who they thought was acting suspiciously and who was dressed as an Orthodox Jew — to ask him for identification when they said he panicked and exploded the bomb.

Oklahoma to try Nichols for bombing

OKLAHOMA CITY, Oklahoma (CNN) — Terry Nichols will face a state murder trial — and the threat of a death sentence — for his role in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building that killed 168 people, District Attorney Wes Lane said Wednesday.

Lane said he would seek the death penalty against Nichols, 46, who is already serving a life sentence on federal convictions for conspiracy and involuntary manslaughter in the deadliest terrorist attack in U.S. history.

Lane said even if he is not successful in securing a death sentence against Nichols, he would still consider the trial to be a success because "responsibility and accountability" were embraced, "one way or another."

First Lewisburg Pub Crawl

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

Paying homage to the pub life of the past, the First Annual Lewisburg Pub Crawl took place downtown on Friday, Aug. 31. Despite a drizzle, local and University students visited five area pubs while supporting a worthy cause.

The event commenced at The Highlands Pub and progressed down Market St and Route 15 to The Lewisburg Hotel, The Bull Run Inn, The Towne Tavern and Buffalo Bills.

Pam Rosado, representative from Clear Channel Radio Station KISS 102.7FM, explained the origin and purpose for the Pub Crawl.

"I came up with the idea for the First Annual Lewisburg Pub Crawl. This event's purpose is to both benefit the St. Jude Children's Hospital and to welcome the new Highlands Pub into the local pub community," Rosado said.

The Pub Crawl was also an opportunity for Lewisburg merchants to contribute to the community.

"The local businesses have all come out to support the Pub Crawl. In fact all the prizes for tonight's drawings were all donated by the local businesses," Rosado said.

This event attracted local residents and ignited the interesis of repeat visitors to the Susquehanna Valley.

"This is our fifth time up to Lewisburg and we were looking for a place to have a good time and this is great. Lewisburg is normally a pretty sleepy town but this event and the new pub makes weekends and our trips here more exciting," said Bob and Anne Steiner, visitors from Allentown, Pa.

The Pub Crawl, which Co-owners Mike Bishop and Schuyler Patton '01 hope will remain an annual event, attracted even more business to the bustling pub.

"It's crowded here every night. Business here has been great," Bishop said.

The Highlands Pub also made some changes to attract more students from the University.

"We are now open six days a week and we have 20 oz. imperial pints," Patton said.

After an hour, the majority of the patrons moved on to the Lewisburg Hotel where the festivities continued. Students from the University increased in number and seemed very impressed with the Pub Crawl.

"If I had to describe the Pub Crawl in one word it would be 'explosive,'" Jeff McGovern '02 said.

Another student came out not only for of the entertainment but also because it benefited charity.

"I am not a big drinker but since it's for charity, I am staying out all night," Peter Devlin '02 said.

Prizes were given out at each location and the items ranged from t-shirts to framed prints of original art works. When both the prizes and the pints of ale were depleted, the crowd migrated to Buffalo Bills, the next venue on the pub circuit.

Many local residents of Lewisburg were already at Buffalo Bills before the arrival of the Pub Crawl. Students and local residents mingled and enjoyed the bonding experience.

"Bucknell has a reputation of being a preppy school and this event closes the gap between the locals and the students. The Pub Crawl has been so much fun and I am so glad that 102.7 KISS FM organized this event to help the St. Jude Children's Hospital," said Renee Moist, a long time resident of Lewisburg.

The crowd became excited at the Towne Tavern when a bidding war occurred for a Scottish balmoral bonnet. Matt Marks, the winner of the bid, paid $27 for the bonnet, all of which went to the St. Jude Children's Hospital.

After visiting the different pubs, patrons formed their opinions on the event and declared their favorite spot.

"[The] Pub Crawl is good but I am a little disappointed by the student turn out. So far I must say that I like the Highlands the best because it has the right atmosphere. I think soon The Highlands will be the preferred student hangout," Bill Kranec '02 said.

"The Pub Crawl is for a very worthy cause and despite the weather it has been very fun. Events like this will help the local businesses," said Jenny Darr, resident of Lewisburg.

Residents were also supportive of turning this event into an annual tradition. "The Pub Crawl is a ton of fun and a great way to spend a Friday night. We would love to see this become an annual event," said Mike and Karen Vanhorn, residents of Lewisburg.

Both town residents and students at the University considered the First annual Lewisburg Web Crawl a success.

Kate Fairweather '00, a local resident and an alumna of the University summed up the event:

"I feel good about supporting the St. Jude Children's Hospital. I think that if the Pub Crawl happened every weekend it would bring the college and the town together."

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Students and Lewisburg residents visited five local pubs and restaurants Friday night to support the St. Jude Children's Hospital.

"The fundamental idea is that the Theatre is an important part of Lewisburg. As the University tries to support alternative social venues for students off-campus, having the Theatre remain open and viable is important to us," Rice said. "Eric 's plans to add a café and bring in films that people might not ordinarily have the chance to see in Lewisburg create a social and intellectual opportunity for students off-campus, one not fabricated by the University."

Already, Faden has plans, in conjunction with the Library of Congress, to show archived films at the Campus Theatre during a two-week festival.

"The Library of Congress is having a massive retrospective in theaters. They've picked 50 movie theaters in the world to do this and the Campus Theatre is one of them," Faden said. "Essentially, the Library of Congress has the largest film archive in the world. The problem with archives, though, is that the movies are archived and no one gets to see them. We'll be showing approximately 30 films in 14 days.

The festival, "a Panorama of American Cinema," will be held, Oct. 26 through Nov. 9 and features visits by actors and directors of classic American films. Janet Leigh, the star of Alfred Hitchcock's "Psycho" and Orson Welles' "Touch of Evil," will be in Lewisburg to introduce Welles' film during the event. Other classics, including Scorsese's "Raging Bull," Kubrick's "Dr. Strangelove," Hitchcock's "Shadow of a Doubt" and Minnelli's "Gigi," are on the program as well.

"The Library is charged by Congress to collect the most historic and aesthetic films in the US. Every year, 25 films are inducted in the archive. From those, we get to pick and choose what we're going to show during those two weeks," Faden said.

In purchasing the Theatre, Faden acquired old film projectors which are capable of showing the films in the Library of Congress's collection.

"These are the greatest films in American History," Faden said. "The films shown are struck from the original negative. The Library of Congress puts together the best print—"Raging Bull" just looks unbelievable. It's as it was meant to be seen by Scorsese."

The University will show films during the two-week showcase as well on its 16mm projectors—a type of projector not available at the Campus Theatre.

According to Pollock, Faden's purchase of the Theatre and specifically the inclusion of "Panorama of American Cinema" is an exciting way for the University to advance downtown-campus interaction.

"The possibilities that professor Faden is imagining are exciting. I hope that this is one of many new ways that develop into a new student and faculty presence downtown," Pollock said. "So often, the traffic is one way—up here, to see things in the Weis Center, attend sporting events, etc. Here's an opportunity to create traffic in the other direction—to lure students downtown to a greater degree, perhaps, than the Campus Theatre has historically."

Faden, too, is excited to share the Theatre with students and the rest of the community.

"There are three parts to working with film: producing, distributing and showing. There's something that's just great about showing films, knowing that these images and sounds stick with people for the rest of their life," Faden said. "Knowing that I'm responsible for that is a gratifying feeling."

Internships and employment opportunities are available at the Campus Theatre. Contact Professor Eric Faden (efaden@bucknell.edu) for more information.

Interior construction of the Theatre, including platform seating for couches and tables, will be completed in early October.

Suicide at PSU

A first-year student committed suicide after allegedly sexually assaulting three women, writes Staff Writer Jaclyn Carr.

Timothy Michael Kulp, an 18-year-old first year student of Penn State University, was reported dead after committing an apparent act of suicide on the morning of Tuesday, Aug. 28. Kulp was arrested and placed in an isolated temporary holding cell at the Bellefonte Centre County Prison on $35,000 bail after allegedly sexually assaulting three women who were sleeping in their Mifflin Hall rooms at the University. He was found hung on a shoelace attached to a metal bar on his cell's back window shortly after 11 p.m. Monday. While waiting for an ambulance to arrive, attempts were made to resuscitate Kulp, who was unresponsive but maintaining a weak pulse.

Warren Sheesley of the Union County Prison said that this was "an unfortunate incident" where "a good kid messed up a little." Sheesley also said Kulp was probably worried over "what [his] parents are going to think."

Kulp gave officials no reason to believe he needed to be placed on suicide watch, but his death has prison officials debating whether or not they should have known to put Kulp under surveillance. Kulp's father said his son had been suffering from depression for the past several months, but the prison was unaware of this.

"Predicting suicide is not an exact science," said Arlyne Hoyt, director of psychological services at Bucknell. Hoyt said a person can give warning signals or the act can happen with no forewarning.

Statistics provided by the National Survey of Counseling Center Directors show that in the 1999-2000academic year, 29.1 percent of the 286 surveyed schools had a student suicide (122 students in all). Counseling Center Directors also report a 79.6 percent increase in severe psychological problems in college students. Depression is also a common problem in college where about 9 percent of incoming students at 4-year private nonsectarian colleges (including Bucknell) in 2000 stated that they frequently felt depressed in the past year. When Bucknell's incoming first year students in the fall of 2000 were asked if they "have ever experienced an extended period of time (i.e., lasting more than 2 weeks) when [they] were unable to shake off the blues, took little pleasure in things, and felt rather hopeless and sad", 20 percent answered "yes" and an additional 13 percent answered "Yes, but it was related to a traumatic event".

> "Predicting suicide is not an exact science,
> —Arlyne Hoyt

These statistics suggest that depression is a rising problem on college campuses and should be treated as an illness and not just a case of the "blues." Hoyt said signs of depression involve a loss of interest, helplessness, hopelessness a sad or empty mood, decreased energy and changes in eating patterns. Depression is usually triggered by events such as a loss of a loved one or a sudden, negative change in one's lifestyle.

Kulp experienced depression during the end of his senior year in high school and also had a problem with underage drinking, according to his roommate. Alcohol acts as a depressant and even though the drug may give the guise of alleviating problems, it can actually worsen the conditions of depression.

Since this act occurred at a neighboring university, Psychological Services encourages anyone who can related or who finds this disturbing to talk to someone in Psychological Services located in the Lowry House.

Annual notification of rights under FERPA

The provisions of the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act (FERPA), designed to protect a student's educational records, are printed below in accordance with the act's directives. FERPA, instituted in 1974, has since been amended to maintain the privacy of all student records barring the following extenuating circumstances and what FERPA terms "directory information."

"FERPA governs the students' records, but any offices that maintain any parts of records on the students... all have to ensure that they comply with students' rights under FERPA also," said Dennis Hopple, director of academic information systems.

Hopple also assures the students that leniency will be granted regarding the ten day deadline for prohibiting the release of "directory information."

The Family Education Rights and Privacy Act of 1974, as amended, is designed to protect the privacy of a student's education records. Bucknell University is subject to the provisions of the law and will accord all the rights under the law to students. Those rights are:

1. The right to inspect and review the student's educational record.

Students should submit to the Office of the Registrar a written request that identifies the record(s) they wish to inspect. The Registrar will make arrangements for access and notify the student of the time and place where the records may be viewed. The review by the student must occur, by law, within 45 days of receipt of the request. The student must provide photo identification in order to view the records. The University is not required to provide copies of materials in the records unless, for reasons such as a great distance, it is impossible for the student to inspect the records in person.

2. The right to request the amendment of the student's education records that the student believes are inaccurate or misleading.

Students may ask the University to amend a record they believe is inaccurate or misleading. They should write the official responsible for the record, clearly identify the part of the record they want changed, and specify why it is inaccurate or misleading.

If the University decides not to amend the record, the student will be notified of his or her rights to a hearing regarding the request for amendment. Additional information regarding the hearing procedures will be provided to the student when notified of the right to a hearing.

The rights of challenge under FERPA are not intended to allow students to contest, for example, a grade in a course, because they felt the assigned grade should have been higher.

3. The right to consent to disclosures of personally identifiable information contained in the student's education records, except to the extent that FERPA authorizes disclosure without consent.

One exception that permits disclosure without consent is disclosure to school officials with legitimate educational interests. A school official has a legitimate educational interest if the official needs to review an education record in order to fulfill his or her professional responsibility.

The University may disclose education records in certain other circumstances, without consent. They are:

* To officials of other schools, upon request, at which a student seeks or intends to enroll;
* To certain government officials in order to carry out lawful functions;
* To appropriate parties in connection with financial aid to a student;
* To accrediting organizations;
* To comply with a judicial order or a lawfully issued subpoena;
* To appropriate parties who need to know in cases of health and safety emergencies.

4. The right to file a complaint with the U.S. Department of Education concerning alleged failures by the University to comply with the requirements of FERPA.

Students are encouraged to first contact the Registrar's Office, where the FERPA representative will assist the student in receiving local resolution and to confirm that all resources have been exhausted, before filing a formal complaint. If that effort is not satisfactory, a student may file a complaint with the Department of Education at the following address:

Family Policy Compliance Office
U. S. Department of Education
400 Maryland Avenue, SW
Washington, DC 20202-4605
(202) 260-3887

The law does allow the university to designate personally identifiable information contained in a student's educational record as "Directory Information". This information may be disclosed, at the University's discretion, without a student's prior consent. Information designated by Bucknell as Directory Information includes:

1. Student's name;
2. Address;
3. Telephone listing;
4. University email address;
5. Major field(s) of study;
6. Achievement, degrees, academic honors or awards:
7. Dates of attendance
8. Enrollment status (e.g., full-time or part-time)
9. Student's Level of Study (e.g., freshman, sopho more, etc. or graduate studies)
10. Participation in officially recognized activities and sports;
11. Weight and height of members of athletic teams
12. Photograph

To avoid release of Directory Information, a student must advise the Registrar's Office, in writing, that any or all the information with respect to that student, not be released. Notification must be done in the Fall semester and prior to the 10th day of classes. The non-disclosure agreement signed by the student will remain in effect throughout the student's academic stay at Bucknell or until such time, that the student, again, in writing releases the non-disclosure agreement. Students must understand that restricting Directory Information will result in:

1. The Registrar's Office refusing to release any information to friends, family members, or colleagues.

2. Student's address, telephone number and email address not appearing in the University Student Directory.

Definitions:

For the purposes of this policy, Bucknell University has used the following definitions:

Student - any person who attends the University

Education records - records directly related to a student and maintained by the institution or by a party acting for the institution. It does not include:

* Records of instructional, supervisory, administrative, and certain educational personnel which are in the sole possession of the maker and are not accessible or revealed to other individuals except for a substitute who performs on a temporary basis the duties of the individual who made the records.
* Records maintained by a law enforcement unit of the University.
* Records maintained by Student Health Services and Psychological Services if the records are used only for treatment of a student and made available only to those persons providing treatment.
* Records relating to individuals who are employed by the institution which are made and maintained in the normal course of business, and relate exclusively to individuals in their capacity as employees and are not available for other purposes.
* Records maintained by the Alumni Office containing information about an individual who is no longer a student attending Bucknell.

Directory Information - information contained in an education record of a student that generally would not be considered harmful or an invasion of privacy, if disclosed.

School Official - those members of the institution who act in the student's educational interest within the limitations of their "need to know". These may include faculty, deans, administrators, clerical and professional employees and other persons, including student employees or agents, who manage or need to view student education record information in the context of their responsibilities.

Mix of returning players, new recruits has team in position to return to Patriot League Tournament

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

Students are going to have to walk a little farther this year to see the women's soccer team play, but this is a walk they will want to take as Head Coach Chrissy Findlay fields her most complete team in her fifth year at the helm.

The Bison have lost only one player to graduation and bring back a core of veterans combined with a good recruiting class.

"I am expecting this team to be exceptionally strong," Findlay said. "We have depth in every position, and we have never had that before during my tenure.

"I anticipate immediate talent and depth with the incoming class accompanied by the ongoing commitment and discipline of our returning players," she said.

The Orange and Blue made great strides last year as a program, advancing to the Patriot League tournament as the second seed.

Despite losing in the first round to eventual champion Holy Cross, the Bison felt good about a season in which they lost six players, four of them starters, to injury over the first three quarters of the season.

"Last year we found ourselves fighting for first when we didn't expect to," Findlay said. "We learned that team chemistry is everything. We learned this every day as we battled through injuries."

Bucknell was selected to finish fourth this year in the Patriot League in a preseason poll of league coaches and sports information directors.

"We are always picked to finish fourth," Findlay said, "but it does not mean anything to us. There is a lot of parity in this league."

The women's soccer team huddles during a practice prior to its win over Pittsburgh.

This year's seniors are a special group to Findlay because they are her first recruiting class.

Chandler is in her second year as captain and will provide unselfish and consistent play on the outside midfield. Hall enters her third year wearing the captain's armband, anchoring a strong backfield.

Lindsay Slomer '02 joins Chandler in the midfield after battling knee injuries last year and recovering from knee surgery. Findlay is confident that she will battle back to full strength this year. "Lindsay will return to the high level of play that she is capable of," she said.

Sarah Klang-Glienna '02 will provide a constant attack on the outside midfield and Jessi Springer '02 will bring commitment and support as a valuable utility player for the Bison.

Former All-League player Meredith Barnes '02 returns to the team after a year abroad and despite sustaining a knee injury in preseason, she looks to pick up right where she left off.

The junior class includes the last of the three captains, offensive midfielder Tara Utchel '03. Utchel was an All-League selection last year despite missing the last four games of the season due to injury. After a successful rehab program in the off-season, Utchel looks to make another huge impact this year on the field for the Orange and Blue.

Emily Keber '03 and Lauren Schwarz '03 provide great athleticism in the midfield. Keber's constant energy on the flank combined with Schwarz's excellent playmaking ability creates a formidable problem for opponents. Kate Cramer '03 will be battling for a starting spot in the backfield.

Goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 returns to man the Bison net for the third year. After recording four shutouts last year she will undoubtedly be one of the most important players on the field for Bucknell.

"Laurie is playing the best soccer I've ever seen her play," Findlay said.

Savannah Rennels '04 and Kristie Simon '04 return up front and look to provide even more offensive spark this year.

Last year these two combined with Utchel for 23 of the team's 30 goals. Kristen Tsou '04 will provide depth in the midfield and Abby Seaboyer '04 brings her speed to the defense again this season.

The squad's freshmen bring much needed depth for the Bison all over the field. Ashely Dincher '05 and Meghan Farrell '05 bring one-on-one ability and playmaking to the midfield while Meghann Chipko '05 and Isabel Diaz '05 provide talent in the center of the field as well.

Newcomers Michelle Santonacita '05, Jill Smith '05 and Annie Greenspun '05 will battle on defense for the Bison this fall. Kelley Kannen '05 provides a first for the team in net as a backup to Purse. "We have never had two quality keepers while I have been here," Findlay said.

Findlay would cite her team's strengths to be their camaraderie, chemistry, depth and stability in defense and at goalkeeper. She says that her team needs to work on its speed in transition and getting back on defense.

Players to watch this season are frontrunner Rennels who, according to Findlay, is very crafty and creative and has a nose for the goal, as well as Seaboyer, who possesses exceptional speed in the back and is the ultimate team player.

"Overall we're strong," Findlay said. "It is just a matter of taking it day by day. We feel capable of winning the Patriot League Tournament but we need to practice and play every day as if that is our goal."

Utchel agrees with Findlay's outlook. "This is by far the most skilled squad the program has ever seen," she said. "We have a tremendous amount of depth, and our freshman are immediate impact players."

> —Head Coach Chrissy Findlay

Bucknell started the season on a positive note on the road with a 1-0 victory over Big East foe Pittsburgh this past Sunday.

After getting off to a rough start in the first half, the Bison pulled it together in the second, igniting their offensive attack against the Panthers.

Farrell connected on her first collegiate goal, driving a well-placed right-footed shot into the upper left corner of the goal with just over five and a half minutes left to play.

Klang-Glienna started the play by taking the ball down the right side of the field and then finding Schwarz in the center of the field who then found Farrell for the game-winner. Purse was superb in net with ten saves as the Bison were outshot 18-10 for the game.

"The first half was a case of first game jitters. We were just giving them the ball," Findlay said. "We started to play our game in the second half by playing it wide and we found ourselves attacking more which boosted our confidence."

"The win against Pitt was a great way to start off our season," Chandler said. "We put up a fight and our defense stayed strong the whole game. We were much more fit than Pitt and it showed in the last 20 minutes when we had control of the game and scored to prove it."

The women's soccer team has set high goals for this year. "We are fighting for first from the get go," Findlay said.

Football readies for tough match against Division I-A Kent State

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The Bison's solid offensive line (pictured) will provide protection for running back Jabulani Powell and quarterback Todd Wenrich.

By Cory Nadler
Staff Writer

When asked about what to expect in the upcoming Bucknell Bison football season, Head Coach Thomas Gadd said "Tough schedule... Having our first three games on the road, and on Astroturf, makes it a challenge." The Bison are in for a rough start when they face Kent State University, their first Division 1A opponent since 1986, this Saturday, Sept. 8.

Injuries to key players is one of the main reasons for the tough ending of the Bison's 2000 season. Many of those injured players are returning to the Bison for their 2001 campaign.

A big plus for the team is the return of the entire offensive line. "This is the most mature Bucknell team in a long time," Gadd said.

Standout running back Jabulani Powell '02, named to Don Hansen's National Weekly Football Gazette's pre season All-America Team as a third team selection, is also returning. Other returning members of the team who received honorable mentions include fullback Jason Marrow '02, defensive end Tom Kuhn '02 and kicker Christopher Lundberg '03.

Marrow is finally back in action after missing all but two games last year with a fractured ankle. "Marrow is going to be a great senior leader," Powell said. His presence will be felt on the field just as much as in the locker room, as Marrow has proven himself to be a great lead blocker and short yardage runner.

Along with Powell and Marrow on the offensive side of the ball, Todd Wenrich '03 has been tabbed as the starting quarterback. Wenrich has prior experience from last year, but this will be his first full season at the Bison's helm. Jess Brinson '04 should also prove to be an impact player throughout the season at both the running back and wide receiver positions. Brinson proved his abilities last season when Powell went down with an injury for a couple of weeks.

The defensive side of the ball is the big question mark for the Bison this season.

"How the defense comes along is critical," Gadd said. "We've got to replace an awful lot of good players [that graduated]," he said. Robert Young '02 will replace All-American Kevin Eiben at the free safety position. Virgil Rush '04 replaces Justin Lustig in the defensive secondary, while Stefan Pluviose '04 takes over at inside line backer upon the graduation of Vince Ficca.

With Kuhn and defensive back Reed Tunison '02 returning to give these young players guidance, the defense should be able to do the job necessary to put W's in the standings for the Bison.

"We are very excited for Kent State," Powell said. "We will play fast and hard and have fun playing this year, and if we do that everything should work out for us."

Donner takes cross-country reins; prepares to continue success

By Jennifer Ross
Contributing Writer

This university is well known for its athleticism, to the point that it has acquired the label of a "jock school." Right at the top of this jock institution one can find Bucknell's most nationally accomplished sports program—Cross Country.

In the past 31 years, the University has won 68 conference titles, including 18 straight between 1975-92, and three IC4A championships. The Bison men's cross country program qualified for the NCAA Championships nine times in the last 21 years, and at one point accumulated a remarkable dual-meet winning streak of 167, spanning 16 years.

In 1999, for the first time in school history the women earned an at-large selection to the NCAA Championship where they finished 24th in the nation.

This season the expectations are high for the Bison, but the hardest shoes to fill won't be running shoes; they'll be those of former Head Coach Art Gulden who passed away last year. It was Gulden who built this large cross-country empire here at the University and new Head Coach Kevin Donner is hoping to continue the winning tradition.

"I am honored and privileged to have been chosen as his successor. I have large shoes to fill, and I will work as hard as I can to continue the winning tradition here at Bucknell," he said.

So far this season, Donner and his new team have been getting along quite well. "In my mind, the runners have been very adaptive to my personality and most seem to be accepting my methods of training. Taking over for a legend creates some pressure but I do appreciate the athletes great work ethic and making me feel welcome," he said.

Donner believes in high volume training and has his team going through strenuous workouts. The men's team will train to run 6.2 miles and the women to run just a little under four miles. Most of the athletes will run twice a day, once in the morning for three- to five-mile easy runs and again in the evenings for five to ten mile runs of varying speeds. Every Sunday they take long runs with the men taking an 11-14 mile stretch and the women, 8-11 miles.

Based on these strenuous pre-season workouts, Donner foresees much depth on the men's side with the top runners Greg Costello '03, Kevin Weatherill '03, Evan Honeyfield '02, PJ Ward '02 and Bryan Johnston '03. Costello was the number one man in most of last years' races and should continue his success this season.

On the women's side, the Bison return with their pack leader Becki Marshall '02, who just missed qualifying for the NCAA as an individual by one place last year and is a member of the Patriot League's All-Decade Cross-Country team. Following Marshall is Theresa Dennis '03, an All Mid-Atlantic Regional runner. Donner has also been impressed with the fitness levels of Kelly McConnell '02 and Kristen Ferrell '02.

> "I am honored and privileged to have been chosen as his successor. I have large shoes that I have to fill, and I will work as hard as I can to continue the winning tradition here at Bucknell.
> *—Head Coach Kevin Donner

This year's season will have three highlight meets. The first is the Pre-Nationals on October 13th at Furman University in South Carolina where the Bison will compete against nationally ranked teams along with many teams who are almost at the National level. If all goes well at the Pre-Nats, the team receives an At-Large NCAA berth.

Both the men and women's teams are looking to capture the Patriot League title, but in Donner's mind the most important meet is the Mid-Atlantic regional at Lehigh University on November 10th, where all the Division I teams in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia line up to see who will qualify for the NCAA Championships. "This is the meet that we are training the most for," he said.

The first shotgun goes off this Saturday at 10:15 AM here in Lewisburg. Approximately 18 minutes later, the first runner will cross the finish line, with all the experience from Donner and a little push from Gulden.

at who is available to compete and adequacy of facilities, among other things. Money was a secondary issue."

President Rogers indicated that due to the construction of the new natatorium, coupled with recent heavy recruiting on the West Coast, water polo was not a viable candidate to be reclassified or cut.

According to the administration, adding another women's sport could not be considered as an alternative.

"A lot of people have asked why we don't add another women's sport," Pollock said. "Wrestling alumni have offered help and have helped in the past, but it is a very expensive proposition."

Other possible factors, such as lack of female interest in a new varsity program or lack of Patriot League competition are considerations as well.

The decision to cut varsity programs at the University has been most difficult for the athletes involved with those teams, who must find motivation to finish the upcoming season knowing it will be their last as Division I Bucknellian wrestlers or rowers.

"The athletes aren't happy, but they have to live with it," wrestler Jeremy Weller '04 said. "I'm going to go hard and have fun. When there is nothing to look forward to, you just do the best you can."

Certain alumni of the University's wrestling program have been vocal in their opposition to the University's decision regarding Title IX, albeit eager to do anything they can to help save the program.

"Some alumni are understandably upset - guys that have gone through the program may have hard feelings toward the university," Head Wrestling Coach Tim Wittman said. "Wrestling has a strong, long tradition in this area."

President Rogers is optimistic that the steps the University has taken will provide Bucknell with a more equitable athletic environment under Title IX provisions without necessitating any further action.

"With good roster management in the future, that should be the end of it," Rogers said. "The process has been so painful for everyone."

Men's soccer welcomes new recruits, returns seven starters

Team drops road opener against Penn State, 5-1

By Scott Kloss
Staff Writer

Focused on the Patriot League crown, the men's soccer team is busy with preperations for the upcoming season. Feeding off a loss to Lehigh University in their final game of the season last year, the Bison look to get a quick start in the Patriot League tournament, their first time in the tournament in seven years.

The team is optimistic that their seven returning starters and 16 letter-winners can provide the needed boost to contend once again, despite the loss of five seniors. Adding to the mix this year are eight solid freshmen. "This is our best recruiting class in my five years with the program," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. While these changes will affect team chemistry, a solid leadership core still stands.

Andrew Aurand '02 is looking to fill the shoes of two-year captain Bill Epley '01, who was one of the departing seniors. Aurand, coming off an outstanding season in which he netted four goals and two assists, has the second highest point total on the team. His leadership skills will be tested as the lone captain of the team, but no one has more confidence in him than his own coach. "Andrew will continue to improve to make our team strong throughout the season," Nash said.

This is our best recruiting class in my my five years with the program.
—Head Coach Brendan Nash

Playing alongside Aurand is Nathan Hopfinger '02, who, after taking last season off, is ready to resume his career on the playing field. As a sophomore he tallied three assists and was named to the All-Patriot League Second-Team. Anchoring the defense will be Greg Stunzenas '02 and Ryan Weber '02, who are both three letter-winners and lead an already imposing defense that recorded six shutouts last season.

The offensive threat this year comes in the form of midfielder Nick Taylor '03. Last year he led the team with four goals and four assists. Taylor will be expected to continue his All-Patriot League First-Team performance this season and lead Bucknell's attack.

However, when one searches for the heart and soul of any soccer team, one must look no further than to its goalie—Steve Whitaker '04. Whitaker, who became a starter six games into his sophomore season, played like a champion, earning national rankings in saves—per—game and goals—against—average, while also receiving The Bucknellian's "Men's Rookie of the Year" award last year.

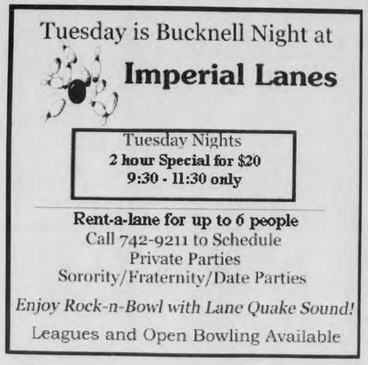
"A goalkeeper determines how far a team advances in this league and we have a great one in Steve. We look forward to his added presence in the net this season," Whitaker said.

Keeping with the youth movement Bucknell welcomed nine freshmen to the team. Headlining the new recruits are Ori Adrabi '05 and Mike Lookingland '05 who can both challenge for starting positions this season. Unfortunately, one career got off to a rocky start when Matthew Arias '05 tore his ACL in preseason. But the strength of any team is its ability to overcome setbacks and continue to have players step up and contribute.

The Bison opened their season Aug. 31 at Penn State, where they were handed a 5-1 defeat. Taylor got the team rolling with a baseline volley to Alexander Far '05, who promptly placed the ball in the back of the net for his first career collegiate tally. Whitaker made six saves for the Bison who were out-shot 19-1 in the match. The team looks to bounce back Sept. 5 when they travel to Mount St. Mary's.

The team may seem younger and less experienced than in years past, but after a very successful summer camp and promising youthful vigor, the men's soccer team is in great position to move ahead to the top of the Patriot League. "Our team has a great deal of potential and skill and we are hard workers focused on one goal—the Patriot League title. I look forward to working with the solid group of returnees and am excited for this season to get underway," Aurand said.

The Bison kick off their first home match on Saturday, Sept. 8, with a 4 p.m. game against Robert Morris.



Men's polo tests waters at Navy Invitational; finishes 1-3

By Barb Morgan
Contributing Writer

Despite a 1-3 finish at the Navy Invitational this past weekend, the men's water polo team remains optimistic about the upcoming season.

Competing in the Southern Division of the Collegiate Water Polo Association, which includes George Washington, Princeton, Slippery Rock, Navy, Johns Hopkins, Salem-Teikyo University, Washington and Jefferson and Grove City College, the Bison finished third last year behind Navy and Princeton. They also took seventh place at Easterns, with a 22-20 overall record.

While the team lost five seniors to graduation, Head Coach John Ziegler has a positive outlook. "I am pretty optimistic that we will be at the competitive level we were at last year," he said. "Realistically, it will take a while to get to that level as we have a lot of new players and thus new team dynamics."

Jamie Saettele '04 is ready to help lead the team this year.

Senior co-captains Dave Kennedy and Ryan McCarty will be critical in providing leadership and consistency. Kennedy is a three-year starter who supplies the team with incredible defense from his goalkeeping position. He has marked his presence in the Bucknell water polo history books, as he set the single season record for saves last year with 393.

With 322 goals against, Kennedy's save percentage for last season was .550 and he posted a career average of .529.

"Defensively, Dave is going to be a very key player for us," Zeigler said. "He had a very good season last year and we hope to see him play up to that same level this year."

McCarty returns for the Orange and Blue as the leading scorer from last season. With 72 goals and 14 assists, his total of 86 points was third best on the team. McCarty also posted 21 steals and 33 ejections drawn.

McCarty's strengths lie in his ability to shoot from the outside as well as being a strong two-meter player. "As Ryan was our leading scorer last year, we are going to need him to have that same type of season for us this year," Zeigler said. "He is going to have to be a steady offensive force."

McCarty is also confident in the team's abilities this season. "It is obviously going to hurt to lose five seniors, four of whom were starters, but there is a new team chemistry," he said. "Instead of only a few people stepping it up, it will be more of a group effort."

Other key returning players include Chris Saxton '03, Dan Lonnerdal '03 and Jamie Saettele '04. Saxton and Saettele will be looked upon to contribute to the scoring tally as they put 22 and 48 respectively in the goal last year. Defensively, Lonnerdal will be a force to be reckoned with as last year he posted 59 steals and looks to dominate again this season.

More veterans to watch are Adam Yerkes '03, John Kearney '04 and Scott Afzal '04. "With fewer upperclassmen, they are all going to be vital to our team's success," Zeigler said. "Everyone on the team will see a lot of playing time."

With rookies comprising nearly half the roster, they will be expected to carry much weight this year. Look for starters Aaron Platshon '05 and Elliot Benoist '05 to make an impact both offensively and defensively.

Other rookies include James Danforth '05, Nick Ferring '05, Ernest Martin '05, Sam Sullivan '05 and Paul Yerkes '05.

The Orange and Blue opened up their season over the weekend at the Navy Invitational and finished with a 1-2 record, giving them an eighth place finish. After an intense preseason, this was the first opportunity that the men had to see where they stand within the conference.

"The weekend went pretty well being as young as we are, as well as it being our first time in a big pool," Kennedy said.

In the first game against Boston College the Bison dominated 12-4. Despite a slow first quarter, the Bison played well defensively and had good scoring production. Yerkes contributed three goals and three steals, while McCarty and newcomer Benoist each posted two goals.

In their second game against UMass the Bison fell 11-5. After the first half the score was 5-4 due to strong defense and two first quarter two-meter goals by Lonnerdal and second quarter goals from Saettele and Ferring. The team was not intimidated by UMass, who is predicted to be tops in the East this year.

In the third quarter, however, a more experienced UMass squad pulled away, taking advantage of Bucknell's inconsistencies in ball control.

Bucknell fell in their third game to Johns Hopkins, 7-6. Again a slow first quarter proved to be the demise of the Orange and Blue as they outplayed Hopkins in the remaining three quarters but just could not make up the deficit from the first quarter. Saxton had two goals, along with Saettele, Platshon, Ferring and Danforth with a goal apiece. Kennedy had five saves.

Bucknell ended the weekend playing Puerto Rico in a non-countable game. Despite some tough play the Bison dropped a 12 -9 decision.

"Our biggest problem was that we were not coming out ready to play in the first quarter," McCarty said. "However, when we played Puerto Rico we played well despite losing by three. Many of the Puerto Rico players have experience on the national level and we kept up very well."

Zeigler walked away very positive from the challenging weekend. "Although maybe not reflected by the record book, the weekend was one leaving much promise for the season."

"We are going to be a deep team, which is a very positive attribute, but it is also why it will take a while to become cohesive as a group," he said.

Kennedy echoed Zeigler's sentiments. "It is going to take a lot of work and effort, but there is no reason that by the end of the season we should not be competitive," he said.

The Bison return home the weekend of Sept. 15-16 for the Bucknell Invitational. Games are against Gannon at 11 a.m. and George Washington at 8 p.m. on Saturday.

GULDEN from A1

In 1975, the men's cross country team won Gulden his first conference title, and kept it for the next 18 years. Other important achievements during that time and those to follow came in the form of three IC4A championship teams, nine NCAA qualifiers and a winning steak of 167 dual meets in 16 years. His most recent success came with an impressive women's cross country squad in 1999 who earned a trip to the NCAA championships for the first time in school history.

Guldin did many things that translated from his time as a professor to his job as coach.

"Certain things he did, he often didn't explain; it was as if he wanted you to figure it out," Joe Klim, Gulden's assistant coach for five years, said. "He was a teacher and people often didn't know they were being taught. In almost everything he did there was a lesson involved, and a lot of people picked up on that later in life."

Of all the challenges that Gulden faced in building a cross country and track and field dynasty, none rivaled that which he faced in Oct.1993. That was the first time Gulden discovered that he had cancer, specifically B-cell Lymphoma. After six months of chemotherapy, the cancer disappeared, but only temporarily. It re-appeared in July 1999, and Gulden went through five months of more intensive chemotherapy before the cancer went into remission again. When in Sept. 2000 the cancer once more came back, Gulden and his family made the decision to attempt the difficult procedure of a bone marrow transplant in Jan. 2001. In March, after a successful procedure, he returned home from Johns Hopkins to be with his family.

"For the rest of the family and I it was so incredibly tough watching someone you love and care about go through what he went through," son Artie Gulden said. "For Dad, the effects were physical, but he never lost the positive mental attitude and it never brought his morale down. Even the team was positive for him."

Gulden recieved calls almost daily from alumni offering words of encouragement. But perhaps the most memorable and remarkable act of support came during the fall of 1999 when, as intense chemotherapy had caused Gulden to lose all of his hair, the entire men's cross country team shaved their heads.

After 31 years of coaching, Gulden compiled 68 conference championships with his teams, was named Coach of the Year 20 times in the 11 year history of the Patriot League conference and produced nearly a dozen Academic All-Americans due to his stringent academic standards. His teams annually produce among the highest grade point averages of any sports organization on campus because Gulden believed that in order to be a successful athlete, one must also be a successful student.

Stephanie Bango '02 summed up what will be missed the most about Gulden. "The privilege of having Art Gulden as my coach for three years was an experience I would never change," Bango said. "All in all he is comparable to no one. He has taught me to strive for excellence, to give more than 100 percent and to turn disappointing performances into learning experiences that resulted in strength and confidence. He had more faith in myself than I did and because of this he was the one person who made me want to train harder and compete tougher. If you knew this man, consider yourself lucky. If you didn't, I'm sorry to say that there will never be another like him."

Schmicker's NFL predictions

Ravens scavenging for leftovers as Kearse, George lead Titans to Superbowl win

By Rob Schmicker
Staff Writer

A wise man once said, "Offense wins games, but defense wins championships." Nowhere is this more apparent than in the present day National Football League. For years, outscoring opponents guaranteed championships rings (i.e. San Francisco 49ers of the 1980s, the Dallas Cowboys of the 1990s and most recently, the 1999 St. Louis Rams), but last year the Baltimore Ravens showed that a dominating defense is as good as, if not better, than a high-powered offense. The Ravens defense scored just enough points and let their defense do the rest on their way to the title. So in the off-season, teams focused on the very thing that brought Baltimore success—defense. In fact, five of the first ten picks in the 2001 NFL Draft were defensive lineman.

With quarterback Aaron Brooks and running back Ricky Williams (pictured), the Saints are poised to challenge the Rams for NFC supremecy.

The franchise that seems to understand this new philosophy best is the St. Louis Rams. In 1999, the Rams steam rolled their opponents by scoring early and often, but one year later, with Kurt Warner injured and their high powered offense eating cheeseburgers at Wendy's, they were unable to stop their opponents from giving them a taste of their own medicine. To put it simply, their defense stunk. As a result the Rams brought in seven new starters on defense, including perennial Pro-Bowler Aeneas Williams in hopes of creating a more balanced team.

But even with their new defense, the Rams offense will still be the reason why they are successful. An early season injury to Marshall Faulk or Kurt Warner could be impossible to overcome. If this comes to be, look for New Orleans to win the division as the Saints are out to show that last year was no fluke. Aaron Brooks has won the starting QB job and along with a healthy Ricky Williams, will be the key to the offense. La'Roi Glover and Joe Johnson are the NFL's best defensive line tandem and look to lead their dominating defense to another successful year.

In the Central, Tampa Bay knows they must get it done this year, or else Tony Dungy may be out of a job. Tampa's biggest question is which Brad Johnson they signed in the off-season. If he can regain his 1999 form, the Bucs will finally have an offense to match their incredible defense. But it will not be easy in the so-called 'NFC Norris' as Green Bay, Minnesota and Detroit all have very solid teams. The Vikings are lacking a decent defense and their tragic offseason will be on their mind all season long. If they can come together after the loss of Korey Stringer then they have a chance. If not, look for the Packers to be the NFC's surprise team. Brett Favre has looked great in the preseason and their double threat backfield of Ahman Green and Dorsey Levens will be hard to handle.

In the East, the Philadelphia Eagles and New York Giants will battle for the bragging rights. Donovan McNabb hasn't forgotten that the Eagles were 0-3 against their Turnpike rivals last year and will do anything to bring a title to the City of Brotherly Love. But hopes are at an all time high in The Swamp, where the defending NFC champs have a slimmer Ron Dayne dable defense led by Jevon Kearse and newcomer Kevin Carter will need to carry the team.

this year. He has lost forty pounds and is in the best shape of his life, which is great for the G-Men. They will rely on the solid running game and a devastating defense as the clock will strike midnight on quarterback Kerry Collins, who has been masquerading as a decent quarterback for some time now.

Like the NFC, the AFC also has several contenders. The front-runner seemed to be the defending champs after their offseason signing of Elvis Grbac. But the loss of Jamal Lewis has brought the team back down to earth because Terry Allen is not the solution. While they are not as strong as they once were, their defense is still the best in NFL history. Ray Lewis continues to play with a chip on his shoulder and will stop at nothing to tame the rest of the NFL.

The Ravens may not even be the best team in their division, though, as the Tennessee Titans are ready to make up for last year's playoff collapse. Steve McNair and Eddie George have been banged of late and will need to stay healthy if Tennessee wants to remain serious contenders. If the offense struggles, their formi-

Denver, Oakland and Indianapolis are all waiting in the shadows, hoping for a slipup by both Tennessee and Baltimore. While all three have solid teams, there are some glaring weaknesses. Denver and Oakland both may have problems with chemistry as they actually have too much talent on offense. In order to win, they will have to learn that there is no 'I' in team. Indianapolis on the other hand has a perfect blend of talent, but coming out of the always tough AFC East will leave them physically and emotionally drained by playoff time.

Of course, all of the above is just speculation. To make it to the Super Bowl, teams need to stay healthy since many are of the same talent level this year. Instead of 'defense winning championships,' the wise man should be smart enough to upgrade his saying to 'a balanced offense and defense wins championships.' After all, that is what the two defending Super Bowl Champions have done to their teams. With that in mind, here are a few predictions:

St. Louis will defeat Tampa Bay in the NFC Championship as Tennessee shuts down Baltimore in the AFC Championship. In Super Bowl XXXVI, 2001 NFL MVP Eddie George will lead Tennessee over St. Louis.

Men's golf awaits first match under Cotner

By Dwight phelps
Contributing Writer

This looks to be a very interesting season for the men's golf team.

The team finished last year with a fourth place finish in the Patriot League Tournament, where Jimmy Freeman '03 and Nick Leibowitz '02 played extremely well, garnering All-League honors.

Unfortunately, the Bison have lost their senior leader from last year, Ken Kosteva '01. He just missed All-League honors last year, but was still the inspirational leader of the team. To continue to be successful, one or more of the returning upperclassmen will have to step into the leadership void created by Kosteva's graduation. Either Leibowitz or Freeman and possibly one of the other returners, Nick Perini '03 or Dan Gale '02, are the prime prospects to take on that responsibility.

Two other returning golfers from last year's League Tournament, Charles Markey '04 and Scott Leeder '04, also look to contribute this season.

Three wild cards on the team are the freshman, who are showing good potential and look to be the ace in the hole for an already strong team. Both Tyler Braun '05 and Alexander Dolle '05 hail from Massachusetts, while Brent Bramnick '05 comes from New Jersey. This strong set of up and coming golfers look to help this year and lead the program into the future.

In Patriot League competition, the Bison should fare well. Having lost only two seniors from the fourth place squad from last year, the team is very experienced and ready to take on the challenges set before it. Last year, the Bison finished a mere 28 strokes behind the winner of the League Tournament, Navy, and they expect to improve upon that this year.

The biggest question mark for Bison golf this year is at the coaching slot.

After 20 seasons under former Head Coach Temmy Thompson, an all-time Bucknell great, the Bison are now guided by first year Head Coach Jim Cotner.

Although Thompson will be missed, Cotner should be able to fill his shoes nicely. Over the past 30 years, Cotner has been a staple in the educational community of Lewisburg, as well as in the golf community of Pennsylvania.

Just this past year, Cotner was inducted into the West Branch Chapter of the Pennsylvania Athletic Hall of Fame. For the past 28 years, Cotner has either been a coach or athletic director for Lewisburg Area High School.

Cotner's golfing background is just as great as his background in coaching and teaching. He has been a member of the USGA Committee for Regional Golf Associations for the past eight years and has been the President of North Central Pennsylvania Golf Association for the past nine.

Cotner and the Bison Golf Team will get its first taste of competition this weekend at the Colgate-Cornell Invitational, which is played in Ithica, N.Y. on Saturday and in Hamilton, N.Y. on Sunday.

Coming up the following weekend is one of the better events perennially for Bucknell golfers, the Bucknell Invitational. This event is attractive to Bucknell golfers because it is played at their own Golf Club, where the team practices and hones its skills on a daily basis.

On the weekend of Sept. 23, the team will travel back to New York to play in the St. Bonaventure Invitational. That tournament will played over the course of two days in St. Bonaventure, N.Y.

The Bison golf squad is very excited about the upcoming season, as well they should be. All of the signs point to the fact that team will have a prosperous season, and that they will definitely be a force to be reckoned with when League Championships come around next spring.

In a pennant race of the mediocre, Bronx Bombers win it again

By Pierre Hernando
Contributing Writer

What is so significant about the month of September? Someone's birthday? Anniversary? Start of classes? Maybe. Or how about the beginning of the stretch run for Major League Baseball? Sounds about right. With the baseball season dwindling down, many teams are out of the hunt, some still in the hunt, and some, well, are set.

With every team but one playing under .600 ball, the teams have been battling all year for play-off positioning. Every division, as of September 2, has at least two teams that are at .500 or better. The National League West even boasts four teams that are playing at or better than .500.

With several players having unbelievable, historic seasons, the luster has been somewhat taken away from the pennant races that has been brewing for a couple of months now.

Barry Bonds' godly homerun pace has received a lot of attention since he has been on pace to break Mark McGwire's single season homerun record of 70, which was set in 1998. Sammy Sosa and Luis Gonzalez have been hot on his heels as they too have been smashing bombs all year long. Through 136 games, Bonds has 57 dingers, compared to Sosa's 53 and Gonzo's 51. At this point in '98, Big Mac had 54 homeruns.

Lets try to forget about the power guys for one second here and recognize one of the small guys. Ichiro. One name says it all and it isn't even his last name. The first-year wonder from Japan has taken the baseball world by storm. Standing only 5'9" and weighing only 160 pounds adds to the story. How's this guy doing it? 200+ hits, 30+ doubles, and 44 stolen bases. And add to that his .352 batting average. He's been the catalyst all year for the best team in baseball, the Seattle Mariners.

Since the "sluggers," powerful or not, have been praised, it wouldn't be fair not to mention some of the hurlers that have also been having great seasons.

Fastball. Roger Clemens and Randy Johnson. These two pitchers have had great seasons. Clemens, in his third year wearing Yankee pinstripes, currently owns an unbelievable 18-1 record. He leads the American League with his win total and he also has a slight lead on Boston's Hideo Nomo for the league's strikeout lead. Despite being 39 years old, Clemens still baffles hitters with his pitches and is well on his way to adding another Cy Young Award to his Hall of Fame credentials. Johnson's season, on the other hand, can be described as overpowering. It's almost unfair to the hitters. He owns an 18-6 record as of September 2 and his ERA is a tidy 2.40. But perhaps the most impressive stat about Johnson's year is his 312 strikeouts in 206.2 innings. That gives Johnson four straight years of 300+ K's.

OK, OK. They got their due. Let's get back to the point of this article-the pennant races.

Barry Bonds is on pace to break the single—season home run record of 70, but only time will tell if he can.

The American League East is pretty much set as far as first place is concerned. The current three-time champion New York Yankees have a somewhat comfortable eight game lead on the rival Boston Red Sox. The Sox have held their own for the most part this year, even owning first place for a little bit, and they deserve credit for battling considering they were missing All-Star Nomar Garciaparra for most of the first part of the year. But of course, the Bombers from the Bronx end up on top. The Green Monster is nice but Monument Park is, well, much better. Goodnight Boston.

The American League Central has been taken over once again by the powerful bunch from Cleveland. Juan Gonzalez has powered The Tribe past the Minnesota Twins into first place. The upstart Twins shocked the world by coming out of the gates fast but have been in a downward spiral during the past month. The 6.5 game lead the Indians own will likely be enough for them to head into the playoffs with ease.

The West in the American League has been the most lopsided race all year. The Mariners are on pace to surpass the 114 wins that the '98 Yankees set. They are currently playing .715 baseball, owning a 98-39 record. They own an 18 game lead over the boys from Oakland and it's safe to say that this race has been won.

So that makes the Yankees, the Indians, and the Mariners. Who will be the last AL team to make it into the postseason? As of now, the Oakland Athletics own a nice 7 game lead over the Red Sox in the American League Wildcard race. The Yankees have beaten the Sox recently so that gives the A's an excellent chance to be the fourth and final AL team. Their season was almost thrown away around the trading deadline as they pondered about trading away their All-Star, Jason Giambi. Luckily, they went against that and traded for another star, Jermaine Dye. Their season has been un the rise since then and they are on their way to their second straight postseason appearance.

Switching leagues, the National League East is a close battle. The Braves have been picking on everyone the past decade but this year is a different story. The once lowly Philadelphia Phillies have put together a strong season and they are only currently 0.5 games behind the first place Braves. The Phillies have been very good with Jimmy Rollins, Scott Rolen, and Jose Mesa but the Braves still have Greg Maddux, Tom Glavine, Andruw Jones, and Chipper Jones...

The Central division in the National League is another competitive one. The Houston Astros currently own a 3.5 game lead over the Chicago Cubs. The Cubs have been strong all year with Jon Lieber and Sosa's power binge so this race is not over yet. Jeff Bagwell, Lance Berkman, and Wade Miller of the Astros or Sosa and Lieber of the Cubs? They hold the key to baseball's "second season."

As far as the West in the National League is concerned, the race is pretty tight also. The 3 game lead the Diamondbacks have over the San Francisco Giants is still surmountable. Who knows, maybe Bonds' HR streak will be enough of a push to nudge the Giants past the powerful pitching of Arizona.

So in the NL, there really isn't one "set" team. The races for first place are still alive and the battle for the wildcard is also a crazy one. Five teams are within 4 games of each other- the Cubs, Giants, LA Dodgers, Saint Louis Cardinals, and the Phillies. The NL is obviously still up for grabs with several weeks left in the regular season.

If there seem to be some uncertainty about who is definitely in and who is out in the NL, then a prediction on the playoffs wouldn't hurt.

To recap, let's say the Yankees, Indians, Mariners, and Athletics in the AL. And as far as the NL is concerned, let's go with the Braves, Astros, Diamondbacks, and the Giants.

How about the Yankees "upsetting" the Mariners in a tough seven game ALCS and the Diamondbacks winning the NLCS with Johnson and Curt Schilling? Sound OK?

World Series...4-3 series, NYY wins. Again. Four rings in a row. Five in six years.

Making the most of it

Welcome back my friends to the show that never ends, we're so glad you could attend, come inside, come inside. We've been apart for so long and so much has happened that I've been meaning to share, so with the summer over and more money being spent on textbooks than on a non-functioning missile defense system, I'm finally able to regale you with a few observations. So sit back and enjoy.

We'll start our journey with the NFL, where the league has been struggling with the loss of its marquis players at the most important position, quarterback, for the past three seasons. Losses like hall-of-fame bound Steve Young, Dan Marino, John Elway, and Troy Aikman, have been replaced with the likes of Jeff Garcia, Jay Fiedler, Brian Griese, and Quincy Carter. You could ask who these people are, but except for asking their direct lineage, it would be hard to get a straight answer.

True, young stars are rising. The emergence of Daunte Culpepper and Peyton Manning has been spectacular, a case could even be made for Donovan McNabb. However, these few are overwhelmed in the pool of no-names and ne'er-do-wells. Let me ask you a question, why does Charlie Batch still have a starting job? Or how about answering why Jon Kitna still plays this sport. In hindsight, it's easy to say that perhaps he should have pursued his roller derby career or maybe foxy boxing.

The fact of the matter is, the NFL is no longer looking to its quarterbacks to be the stars they once were. If you need proof, just look at last year's SuperBowl. Trent who? Trent Dilfer is a wannabe hack. He's been striving his whole life to be a nobody. Now he finds himself to be an over-appreciated SuperBowl champ. And what's worse is that he's bought into his own hype and he's wondering why he still doesn't have a contract for this year. Trent, listen to me. You're about as useful as a suggestion box in the Bison. Get over it.

What this means for viewers is less pomp and more circumstance. Fewer amazing catches and more grid iron football. It's great watching Eddie George pound the ball down the field, but at the expense of seeing Culpepper to Moss? Or Brad Johnson to Keyshawn Johnson?

In the NBA, things are slightly different. With rumors of a Michael Jordan return flying through the air like so many AA batteries at John Rocker, I'd like to reference the movie "Space Cowboys" starring Clint Eastwood and Tommy Lee Jones. I don't know if you've seen it, and perhaps you're better off for it. Basically it's about four astronauts who pioneered an entirely new technology back in the 60s, and when that technology goes awry in the 90s, NASA brings them in because they're the only ones who know how to fix the problem.

Crappy movie, but is anyone else seeing a striking resemblance between that movie and the rumors of a Jordan comeback? In an age where the league is becoming more and more dominated by uni-dimensional stars like Kobe, Iverson, Carter, et al., all made in the image and likeness of Jordan, like some divine rib bone and life-giving clay, it makes me wonder whether Jordan is returning to the NBA in order to put a rest to his apostolic following of stat-chasers in the same year that the new zone defense will be allowed.

Could it be that Jordan, the "old-fogey" of the NBA drama that's unfolded over the past season is returning, not to dominate, but to save the ailing NBA of its own statistical nightmare as its viewership declines faster than President Bush's integrity? Or maybe Jordan just refuses to fade quietly, well relatively quietly considering he is the sports icon of the 90s, into the night.

It seems that a Jordan comeback would only be detrimental to the league in the long run. If Jordan comes back and brings with him more viewers, then when he leaves again, it will prove that the game is not exciting unless he is playing, and it will leave fans missing the "good ole days" when Jordan and Pippen entertained millions with their Globetrotter-esque handling of opponents, although step ladders have been banned on the court since Jordan's departure. If he returns and it's a bust, then fans will lose even more respect in the league because he will have shattered the Herculean image that has hung like a glowing halo around his reflective bald scalp.

Baseball teams seem to be following the same logic as the NBA: the "if we focus all our efforts on one person, the team HAS to be good" mentality. Unfortunately, as the Rangers and Red Sox are learning the hard way, paying that much for a player isn't in the best interest of the team. Baseball, like football, is a sport that relies upon team participation. Barry Bonds can hit 59 home runs, but if the other hitters in the lineup don't get on base, that's only 59 runs in 120 games. Roger Clemens can only go 18-1 if his team is bringing runs across the plate.

Unfortunately, there are two problems inherent in this backwards thinking. First, players for some reason feel that they are entitled to the amount of money that they receive. I doubt a day goes by where Alex Rodriguez doesn't wake up to his own hit single playing on his clock radio, go downstairs in his A-Rod slippers and PJ's, eat a bowl of Cheerios with his picture on the front, read the morning paper with his highlights and stats from last night's game, pull out a carton of milk that has a Missing Person's report talking about who to contact in case you find A-Rod's lost humility, as he leans back in his chair and thinks to himself, "Man, I really am worth all this."

Then there is the management who, for some ludicrous reason, feels that signing these players at such outrageous prices will be a good thing for its team. How do the Texas Rangers expect to address their pitching problem in the next ten years if they've already devoted twice as much money to one man for a year as the Montreal Expos spend on their entire team? Who is filing these team's tax returns, Andy Dick? The fact of the matter is, they don't expect to address their pitching problem. They think that parading A-Rod around, sitting horseback on some trusty steed waving a cowboy hat is great because it will boost attendance and people will come out to see him and it will be super. Well that worked for Whoopi Goldberg in "Ed", but what happens when the novelty runs out? The truth is, people would rather see a competitive team challenging the Yanks and the Mariners to get to the World Series. Give me that over an A-Rod homer ANY time.

So yes, sports, like Amelia Earhardt, have run slightly off course in recent months, but there's nothing to suggest they won't find their way back. I mean, if Zippy Chippy can win....

Bison split first two games,1-1

Bison rally from opening loss with lopsided, 5-1 victory over Towson

BY AARON DEROSA

Statistically, athletes tend to be extremely superstitious. If you've ever seen the movie "Major League" you'll know what I'm talking about. Fortunately for the 2001 Field Hockey team, superstitions don't hold much weight. In four scheduled games thus far this season, there have been two postponements due to severe weather, and one lightning delay.

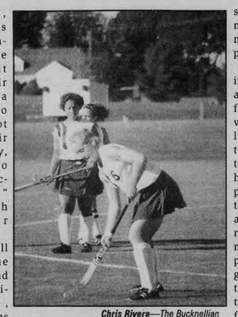
This year's Field Hockey team returns with a core group of strong players who helped carry the Bison to two Patriot League Championship games, and the team only looks to gain momentum, barring inclement weather.

With ten seniors returning, including Monica McCorry '02, a first-team All-Patriot League selection, and Lauren Campbell '02, the Bison look to start the season off with sturdy leadership from superior veterans.

"Certainly, the leadership of this program rests with our ten seniors, a class capable of extraordinary achievement. However, the success of our season will be dependent upon their ability, as a whole, to raise not only their level of play, but also their expectations," head coach Heather Lewis said.

In a poll of league coaches and athletic directors, Bucknell was picked to finish fifth in the eight team division, however the team hopes to not only raise their own expectations, but the expectations of, those around them.

With a solid goalie tandem of Sonja Wettergreen '03 and Mel Rhoads '02, and superior scoring talent in Dena Ebert '02 and Melissa Maher '03, the Bison look to step up and notch as many wins as possible.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian
The Bison field hockey team practices for their next match in NY on Saturday.

Also joining the roster are nine freshmen who add athleticism and talent to a team that hopes to compete for years to come. With a great team ready to play now, and plans for a great team for the future, the Bison field hockey team is only looking forward to this season.

In their season opener last Tuesday, the Bison fell to Drexel 2-1, with Campbell scoring the only goal of the game. Midway through the game, play was stopped for a lightning delay. In total, keeper Wettergreen notched 8 saves in a stellar performance, but the Bison were unable to keep up against a poor shot differential, with Drexel outshooting the Orange and Blue 16-7.

In their third game, the Bison blanked Siena 3-0 with goals scored by Lisa Bingaman '04, Amy Marvel '03, and Maher, with Campbell making two assists. The Bison held Siena to only six shots and Wettergreen made two saves to keep them scoreless in a 29-6 shot differential.

The Bison's fourth game against Towson was postponed until this Wednesday and the rest seemed to have done them good as they walloped Towson 5-1 in the highest scoring effort of the Field Hockey team since 1999. Scoring for the Bison were Maher, Bingaman, McCorry and Kate Ruda '04 with assists tallied for Ebert and Meiko Boynton '05.

V-ball looks to defend Patriot League title

BY PAT EVANS
Staff Writer

Coming off a stunning year last season where the Bucknell volleyball team earned an NCAA bid for the second time in three years, the team has worked hard to get back to that coveted spot and repeat.

This weekend the Bison opened their season with a 2-1 record at the Marist Tournament and tried to prove that they could out-shine last season's record. The team came out fired up for its first match, and handled Marist 3-1 (30-28, 25-30, 30-18, 30-22).

Towson University proved to be much more difficult than the Herd's first match, and the eventual champions of the tournament took care of the Bison 3-1 (30-25, 30-23, 23-30, 30-25). Bucknell finished the tournament strong, coming back and beating Central Connecticut State 3-2 (27-30, 30-20, 30-24, 24-30, 15-8).

If the Bison want to repeat one of their all-time greatest seasons, they must replace a very strong, departed senior class. The Bison will sorely miss last year's co-captain Brooke Bader '01, who holds a place in Bucknell's record books for a number of stats, and who was selected to the All-Patriot League first-team last year.

Head coach Cindy Opalski is confident in this year's seniors' ability to replace last year's leadership, and liked her team's early success. "It was a good weekend overall, and I was very pleased with how our veterans played," said Opalski, who won the "Coach of the Year" award last year in the Patriot League.

Whitney Williams '02 sets the volley as the Bison take 2 of 3 at Tournament

This year's seniors are very comfortable leading the team, and provided major contributions in years past. Last year, co-captain Shannon Walker '02 was the Patriot League's "Offensive Player of the Year", leading the League in kills (404) and hitting percentage (.291). Walker will continue to be assisted by Whitney Williams '02 who led the Patriot League with assists (10.49), also breaking Bucknell's all-time record for assists in a season (1,175).

Walker and Williams proved in the Marist tournament that they would once again be doing their part to achieve last year's mark. Walker tallied 42 kills in the first two matches against Marist and Towson, while Williams racked up a total of 69 assists in the same contests.

The third match, against Central Connecticut State, was just as indicative of the leadership that the Bison has this year. Walker finished the final match of the tournament with 20 kills, and Williams dished out 44 assists.

Maybe more important than how the seniors played was the support they received from their younger team members in the Central Connecticut State match. "For the first tournament I was very pleased," Walker said. "A lot of young people stepped up, and it was a good learning experience for future play."

Brandi Trapasso '04 continued what she started last year, recording 17 digs, 10 kills, and six service aces. Trapasso won "Rookie of the Year" and "Defensive Player of the Year" awards for the Patriot League last season, leading the League in digs (421).

Jackie Leahy '05 tallied 15 kills in the final match of the tournament and proved that the freshmen came ready to play.

Co-captains Melanie Gray '02 and Walker will try to help the talented freshmen class get acclimated into the NCAA game. Opalski believes that Gray, a 6'2" blocker, will have her best season yet this fall.

"I couldn't be happier with the leadership," Opalski said. "We have a group of seniors that have had some great experiences and they do an outstanding job mentoring our young people."

One new regulation in NCAA volleyball this year will change the pace of play. Last year games were played to 15, and now the first four are played to 30. Only if there is a fifth game in a match will it be played to 15. This new rule will make it difficult to string together a lot of points on serves, and momentum will not be as much of a factor in matches.

The Bison do not see the change as a problem. New rules will not stop the Bison from playing hard in their quest to keep the Patriot League crown. With uprising talent and great leadership, the women's volleyball team feels that if they focus on the improvement of the team they will get the job done.

"If we keep on working the whole season and pull together and use our depth," Trapasso said. "I think that we can repeat the Patriot League championship."

Professor Faden turns spotlight on the Campus Theatre

BY NATALIE CASP
News Editor

As one of Lewisburg's timeless fixtures changes ownership for the first time after 60 years of business, the University adds yet another link to its growing resumé of downtown connections. Eric Faden, assistant professor of English and film studies at the University, bought the Campus Theatre in June and will continue to operate the single screen movie theater at its current location on Market Street.

Renovations and special programming—including a two-week film festival in October—are just two of the changes the local community will experience at the historical, 700 seat theater.

At 8,000 sq. ft., the Campus Theatre is undergoing extensive renovations for the first time since it opened in 1939. Comfortably accommodating patrons, expanding the concession area and adhering to current building code requirements are among the challenges that Faden faces in assuming ownership. In making these business decisions, though, Faden emphasizes his desire to maintain the traditions of the Theatre.

"Part of the vision I have on this project is to keep it historically accurate as possible. It's an old movie theater and it needs to be preserved," Faden said.

Construction is underway in the theater to add a café and create alternative seating for patrons.

"We don't need all 700 seats, so we're taking out the last ten rows and building platform seating," Faden said. "We're adding love seats, coffee tables and chairs. Patrons can take the concession food from café into the theater and have dinner and a movie. That still leaves 400 'regular' seats."

Construction occupied much of Faden's time this summer as he worked with architects to come up with feasible plans for renovations.

"Construction takes up an enormous amount of time. It's like walking through a minefield—every decision costs about $10,000 and you want to think and contemplate each decision," Faden said. "I didn't sleep at night for the month of August—I was in ADA (American Disability Act) Hell. The architect, contractor and Department of Labor and Industry have honestly worked out a solution that was respectful of the historical currency of that building."

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian

As a member of the community and owner of the Theatre, creating a new social environment downtown also appeals to Faden.

"We're going to add a café in the lobby to make the theater a social space," Faden said. "If it's a social place where people hang out and talk, rather than leave, it's also more viable as a business."

The University helped Faden to shape the business aspects of the Theatre, both in supplying him with a grant and in providing him with the necessary resources to make informed decisions.

"The University has obviously been very interested in the project because the Campus Theatre is a focal point of downtown. They want to support anything that creates intellectual opportunities for students and faculty, but also social ones, Faden said. "Financially, the University has provided small grants. I think they realize how prohibitively expensive restoring a historic buildings is. From a business point of view, it's economically suicidal to do a project like this unless you have lots of support in grant money.

"The University is full of resources—from management professors to people who work in Public Relations. The Small Business Development Center has also been very supportive. I've received lots and lots of good advice and support, Faden said."

Charles Pollock '70, vice president for student affairs and president of the board of the Lewisburg Downtown Partnership, and Jim Rice, assistant vice president for academic affairs, served as administrative liaisons in presenting Faden with the grant from the University.

"The intent [of the grant] was not to buy control over the project, it was to help make it happen, with confidence in Professor Faden's ability to make choices about the social and intellectual interests being served," Pollock said.

A loser finally wins

BY CECILY CAIRNS
Staff Writer

The year 2001 has already produced several scintillating one-on-one showdowns within the world of sports. Laila Ali versus Jacqui Frazier-Lyde. Rickey Henderson versus Davey Lopes. Randy Johnson's fastball versus a dove. There's nothing the media loves more than two evenly-matched, dignified competitors slugging it out in front of a crowd of intelligent and respectful fans.

Except, of course, an arguably tasteless, sensationalized and haphazard showcase of the bizarre, designed solely for the purpose of selling tickets to casual fans who are out to see a freak show. One such event was sorely overlooked this summer, its profundity underestimated in the mere two-minute clip designated to it by Sportscenter. At least that's the way you'd see it if you were Zippy Chippy.

Zippy who? Every sports fan ought to be familiar with this one-in-a-million creature. Of all the equine athletes to touch our lives in the past few years, Zippy Chippy has done it like no other. The key to his fame is a rather unconventional consistency. Forget Cigar and Citation. Forget Joe DiMaggio. Forget Cal Ripken. Zippy Chippy, a thoroughbred racehorse (in the loosest sense of the word), has The Streak to end all streaks. The ten-year-old gelding has officially gone to the post 89 times, and has lost every single time. That's 89 losses in a row, folks; a modern record according to all sources. En route to setting this elite record, Zippy managed to be banned from a racetrack (on account of being too slow), mocked on Comedy Central and featured several times on Sportscenter.

Zippy's trainer, Felix Monserrette, doesn't seem to mind the fact that his horse isn't exactly the second coming of Secretariat. "If he don't win today, he win next time," Monserrette said.

Over the past couple of years, the Rochester Red Wings (AAA) of minor league baseball's International League have had to adopt a similar, "wait 'til next time" line of thinking. The squad's 60-81 record fades in comparison to Zippy Chippy's 0-89, but nonetheless, things haven't been pretty for the Red Wings. In fact, it's been so bad that the team is looking to abandon their Major League affiliate, the Baltimore Orioles, and search for greener pastures. In the meantime, they've been getting a little creative in finding ways to win. Enter Zippy Chippy.

After a few phone calls and a little rearranging, the stage was set for the duel of the century. The setting: Frontier Field. The conditions: 50 yards, no holds barred, winner-take-all. Aug. 8, 2001. 7:05 p.m. EST. The showdown was entitled "Man vs. Beast II". That's right—MVB II—Zippy Chippy actually lost a 40-yard race against outfielder Jose Herrera last year. But Monserrette brought his horse back for a second swing at the MVB title.

In the Red Wings' corner, speedy outfielder Darnell McDonald prepared to take on his four-legged foe. "My main motivation comes from trying not to be the first person to lose to this horse," McDonald said before the race. When asked if he was concerned about the 1000-pound Zippy Chippy going off-course and into his path, McDonald shrugged it off and mentioned that he might have to throw the horse a little forearm. Zippy was unavailable for comment before the race.

The race itself only accentuated the tremendous hype. After the zealous crowd at Frontier Field counted down from ten, Zippy and Darnell were off and on their way to the "sports oddity" history books. And finally, on this lovely evening in Rochester, Zippy Chippy actually won a race. Barely. In the last five yards, the horse overtook McDonald to win by about a length.

The feeling was indescribable. There were handshakes, hugs and congratulations galore. The Zippy Chippy entourage even broke out a 25-pound bag of carrots to celebrate. Monserrette and Co. were presented with a large trophy by Wings GM Dan Mason and mascot Spikes.

After the celebration died down, Zippy Chippy would head back to his barn, his horizons seemingly limitless now. A dejected Darnell McDonald would head out to the field to take on the Ottawa Lynx, mumbling about a rematch.

But both knew that they had been a part of something special. After all, how often can you find a pre-game publicity stunt that requires a man with a shovel standing in the background?

Perhaps there will be a rematch. Perhaps the Red Wings will send out a new representative. Perhaps Zippy Chippy is ready to once again face four-legged competition. But one thing is for sure: The Baltimore Orioles may want to take a good, long look at Zippy Chippy when it comes time for September call-ups.

A glimpse of the First Year experience

By T. Patrick Halley III
Staff Writer

Yes sir, I am a freshman. You may have seen me around campus this past week. I was the one traveling down Sixth Street in a pack of 15, drawing all possible attention to my prospective social activities. I've been spotted in the "caf" (note the use of Bucknell lingo), loading mounds of pasta onto my plate regardless of the effect it may have on my gastrointestinal tract.

You laughed at me in the mailroom, and tried to explain that it's three turns to the left. I wear a Bison football T-shirt with Bucknell mesh shorts, a BU hat, orange and blue socks and a lanyard hung from the pocket for all to see. I still think Smith Quad is the one with the big clock, and I don't know where Tustin is at all.

Maybe I've got a few things to learn about life here at Bucknell, but members of the class of '05 have done nothing but process information, rules, concepts, point systems and song lyrics ("Dear Bucknell, oft of thee we're thinking ...") since we got here.

As I sat in my room by candlelight last night, organizing the receipts from the road signs I stole, I paused to reflect on the past week. It began when my parents finally dropped me off, and brought every last bag, trunk, crate and life-size cardboard Mandy Moore cutout I had up to my fourth floor penthouse. By the way, I do understand the Amish influence in this area, but is an elevator entirely out of the question?

After briefly meeting my RA and assuring him that I really would use the table I brought for ping pong, I set out for the BOF program, which I read was at Bucknell's "Brown Conference Center." I envisioned a Holiday Inn, and myself on a chaise lounge sipping iced tea with the ladies of Hunt Hall. But after driving to a part of the state with a 4 :1 cow-to-person ratio, we turned onto a dirt road and pulled up to a small house that had an eerie Green Acres vibe to it.

As I sat here in my room by candlelight last night, organizing the receipts from the road signs I stole, I paused to reflect on the past week.

It was homely enough, with bunks, a full kitchen and a mildly defective hot water heater. I didn't complain; it certainly got the job done. Instead of a front desk wake-up call, for example, we were stirred to life by the smell of freshly scooped manure. This odor apparently can find its way back to Lewisburg as well.

After pulling over for the obligatory Beer Barn photo, I was returned to campus to join the rest of my class. The next four days were a blur of orientation activities. We had numerous dorm meetings, were treated to streakers (tan lines and all), covered ourselves in paint and soothed our hot wax burns during Convocation. We even suffered through illegal freshman hazing—they called it "Playfair."

After putting those traumas behind me, I settled into a groove of classes, meetings and avoiding homework that suits me just fine. I am still learning the ropes here, for the Bucknell experience provides something new every day. Who knew that 'Rush' was more than just a bad seventies rock band? Not I.

And so, as this first issue of The Bucknellian hits newsstands, many upperclassmen will no doubt turn to this journalist for advice, inspiration, and a glimpse into the freshman psyche. Others may use this particular page to line their cat boxes, but they aren't important right now—and they shouldn't have pets in the dorm anyway. I ask you, the elders, to share your knowledge with us. Give us a hand, we all need it. And if you see me reaching for the pasta again, smack me.

Letter to the Editor

To the Editor:

As September approaches and the evenings start to cool, it's natural to think back to my Bucknell days.

One of the most enduring memories is of the hours spent training in preparation for the eight minutes spent competing in the middle of Davis Gym in front of what were usually sparse crowds.

Wrestling has never been a great spectator sport. Since this has been the case for thousands of years, it's probably a safe bet that this will never change.

The situation was exacerbated at Bucknell in the '70s by a quaint concept known as "Jan Plan" in which 85 percent of the student body spent the month of January elsewhere. This was not a bad thing because it meant that there were plenty of open slots working on the BU Physical Plant crew for the month of January, removing snow and spreading rock salt, for the princely sum of $1.75 per hour. Spending January in Lewisburg was part of the price to be paid to be a winter athlete at BU and we accepted that reality.

The current reality is a bit more difficult to rationalize. The basic premise seems to be that equality of opportunity is irrelevant in today's politically correct and federally mandated world. The only meaningful metric is equal, or should we say, "proportional" results as mandated by the Congress.

The fact that Bucknell offered an equal number of athletic opportunities to men and women, by offering an equal number of teams, is meaningless. The only fact that matters is whether women accepted those opportunities in numbers proportionate to men.

Intercollegiate athletics offer wonderful physical, emotional, and, even, intellectual developmental opportunities to young men and women. Thanks to the efforts of government, the opportunities for student athletes to compete in games has been reduced to a numbers game governed by Orwellian logic.

The sad thing is that it's a never ending game with no winners. Because even today, as we achieve "proportionality," we run the risk of needing to make further adjustments if we do not maintain the status quo. If ten women were to arrive on campus this fall and decide that they no longer wished to compete as student athletes, then a proportional number of men would have to be denied the opportunity to compete. Perhaps not immediately, but eventually.

Should we apply similar standards to other campus activities? Imagine limiting the number of women who might participate in theatre or dance because insufficient numbers of men auditioned. Perhaps we should carry this concept into the classroom and force an adjustment to the number of education or engineering majors to insure gender proportionality in each of these disciplines. If the concept makes sense, then why stop with athletics?

Perhaps the saddest aspect of this issue is the fact that, if we could set aside the gender issue for a moment, then wrestling is arguably the most egalitarian of all sports. It is the one sport where size, natural speed and even coordination matter least.

By definition, each wrestler is matched with someone of his own size. And the nature of the sport is such that each competitor can win based on whatever natural gifts they bring to the contest. Some wrestlers win because they are quicker, others because they are stronger. Some excel because they are tall and lean and they have learned to take advantage of their body type, others because they are more compact. And, some wrestlers excel because they outsmart their opponents.

Tom Rivoire, a wrestling team captain during the '70s, was not our best athlete. But he was a Rhodes scholar and he was a champion because he was a better student of the sport than his opponents. But regardless of their body type or strength or natural quickness or intelligence, wrestlers win because they have huge hearts and are willing to work harder, in practice and in the match, than their competition.

Perhaps, this last issue is at the heart of the unspoken debate. It seems these days, that in striving for fairness, there should be no winners and losers. Everyone should have high self esteem regardless of effort or accomplishment.

Wrestling is one of the oldest forms of competition known to man. The ancient Greeks wrestled at the first Olympics using essentially the same equipment that we use today, their bodies and their desire. There are no high technology rackets, bats, balls, clubs, poles, shoes or playing surfaces to alter the competition. It's one-on-one pure competition and may the best man win. And at the end of a match, the referee raises the victor's hand in triumph for all to see.

Wrestling is perhaps the purest reflection of the competition that exists in life. I suppose that makes some of us uncomfortable. I suppose that is why we are so willing to penalize the young men who would dare to compete in such a fashion.

Venues will provide community interaction

During the summer break, two new businesses opened on Market Street, both of which inherently appeal to the student and local constituencies. These two venues, owned and operated by individuals each with a link to the University, present promising opportunities to improve the relationship between the campus and the borough. The Highlands Pub and the Campus Theatre will, ideally, draw the two historically divided factions together.

In the past years, students and members of the community have worked hard to mend tensions between the University and downtown. The presence of these two new businesses will create further opportunities for the two communities to blend as one.

These are the two groups that have been struggling and fighting over controversial issues such as student-living downtown, noise and parties on Sixth Street. With these two new venues, The Bucknellian hopes that students and borough residents alike can indeed socialize in informal settings and stereotypes of each group will begin to dissolve.

Employment opportunities, too, will provide a hands-on, immediate interaction between students and residents. As student employment increases (both venues seek student employees), the student presence downtown also increases. The Borough Council has welcomed and marketed toward bringing students downtown for years, but the opportunities provided by The Highlands Pub and the Campus Theatre make this proposition more realistic.

The Highlands Pub, co-owned by a recent alumnus of the University, has already drawn significant business to the east end of Market Street. The "far" end of Market Street has been struggling to maintain business in recent years—however, The Highlands Pub seems to have a strong draw from both the local residents and University students. It is an interesting situation to observe students and residents alike interacting in a social location. The economic benefits are obvious, but The Bucknellian hopes to see social benefits also by bringing students to a relatively-untouched section of the Borough.

The Campus Theatre, which was recently purchased by a professor at the University, will also draw students and residents together in a social setting. The addition of a cafe in the lobby and a selection of art films for viewing promote social and intellectual interaction for the communities. An upcoming film festival, too, will bring the communities together to celebrate classic American cinema. The Bucknellian is curiously anticipating the grand reopening of the Campus Theatre in order to see what Professor Faden has worked hard to "resurrect" with the historical landmark of Lewisburg.

The success of last Friday's First Annual Lewisburg Pub Crawl shows us that it is indeed possible for students and residents to interact in a social setting. Stereotypes were broken down and businesses were supported for a charitable cause.

The interesting issue about these two new social venues in the borough is that no one is necessarily imposing or enticing students and residents to try to "resolve their differences." Students and residents will simply interact together over a beverage at The Highlands Pub or in a new cafe part of the Campus Theatre.

While The Bucknellian feels these environments will not naturally solve all problems or grudges between the two communities, we hope that bridges can be crossed and the two communities can both call this town their home.

I awoke to my alarm, ten minutes before sunrise. My roommate and I pulled on jeans, grabbed our cameras and climbed to the top deck of our ship. We stood in the thick, cool air that would soon be 90 degrees and looked over to the lights shining on the shore.

The sun exposed itself in a brilliant display of orange beams. Slowly, the other passengers joined us as we pulled closer into port. Fishermen waved from rocks; we began to hear music in the distance. In an hour's time, I would be stepping onto the soil of Havana, Cuba where not only did the people understand that life is a celebration, but welcomed us to join them with open arms.

Last spring, my semester began onboard the S.S. Universe Explorer. I spent 100 days traveling on University of Pittsburgh's "Semester at Sea" program with seven other Bucknellians and 650 students from around the world.

Our voyage began in Nassau, Bahamas and took us along part of the east coast of South America, across the Atlantic Ocean, up the east coast of Africa, through South East Asia and across the Pacific Ocean to Seattle, Washington.

We took classes on the ship while we traveled. Professors from numerous universities taught a variety of disciplines in both the arts and sciences, allowing "wisdom seekers, or senior passengers to audit their classes. The professors also brought their families along creating a unique shipboard community.

I remember promising myself school that I would never take anything for granted, not even a moment of my life, and traveling abroad reminded me how fortunate I truly am. Two of the best days of my life occurred last spring while I was participating in the "Semester at Sea," and I would like to share them with you.

My cabin mate and kindred spirit, Holly, often shared adventures with me. In Cape Town, South Africa, Holly and I had an exciting race against time that tested our strength and willpower.

I had taken the spring voyage of "Semester at Sea" specifically to visit Cape Town and climb Table Mountain. Unfortunately, the weather was stormy, the winds whirled through the valley that led up the mountain and the guide warned us not to climb. She told us to look out of our window in the morning, and if we saw a "tablecloth" on top of the mountain, it was too dangerous to climb. The "tablecloth" was actually a cloud brought by heavy winds that sat upon the plateau. Holly and I saw this cloud everyday until it was time to depart.

As we walked up the gangway to leave, the crew notified us that the wind was too strong to leave, and we would stay until 12:00 the next day. We set our alarm for sunrise once more and woke up to a vivid, cloudless sky and five hours to climb the mountain. The guide directed us to a 45-minute trail and sold us tickets for the cable car down. With a ton of energy we began our ascent. A child sitting on a rock where the trails split wished us good luck.

After an hour and a half, the hike became rather steep, and our morale began to slip when the peak did not seem to look any closer. We still saw the trail markers, and we had plenty of time until the ship left for Kenya, so we picked up the pace and enjoyed each other's company. Forty-five minutes later we rounded a bend to see the cable cars at the top of a cliff.

The people climbing this cliff were using ropes and chains, neither of which we had. There was no way we could climb back down and make it to our ship in time; we had to get to the cars.

The two of us, powered by major adrenaline rushes followed initial panic attacks, began climbing bit by bit, pulling one another to safety. At this point I became more worried about plummeting to the depths below than I was about making it to the ship on time. We reached the peak at 11:30, took a quick glance at the magnificent scenery and a sign behind us that read, "Treacherous Hike; Advanced Climbers," and jumped in the next car down, (a very kind couple let us take their place at the front of the 50 person line). We hopped in a cab at 11:43 and ran through the port and customs, punching into the ship with 36 seconds to spare.

Our adrenaline continued pumping for the next two hours, and the smiles did not leave our faces all day. We had just had one of the greatest adventures of our lives, and the day was only half over. We were already traveling to Mombasa, Kenya.

On many occasions, I met people that I could not communicate with verbally, but on one particular day I experienced something that words could never explain.

I had signed up for a service visit in a "Dalit" (formally known as "untouchable") village an hour outside of Chennai, India. I stepped onto a bus with 27 students at nine a.m. on my first day in India. We were only told to wear work clothes, and we would help out with whatever needed to be done.

Eventually, the bus came to a stop because the crowded streets did not allow us to go any further. The buildings and homes were small three walled concrete forms and corrugated metal huts, and there were three extremely thin cows standing in one of the few shaded areas. We got out to walk the remaining few blocks and were greeted with the most joyous singing I have ever heard and the brightest smiles I have ever seen. What seemed to be the entire village was throwing a parade in our honor.

They showered us in jasmine leis, pinned extra flowers in our hair and created a path with the petals. A musical band led us through the streets where adults came up to shake our hands, and their children came to kiss our cheeks. People hung as far out of their windows as they could, smiling and waving, shouting what I later learned meant "so much thanks to you." I cannot explain the feeling I had while walking among these people. They were some of the most beautiful people I had ever met.

We ended the parade at a tent that was set up with a welcome banner and three electric fans facing four rows of chairs. They sat us in the chairs, and parents pulled their children away from the fans, which I don't think they ever used before, so that we could be cool.

We let the children sit on our laps and they placed bindis on our heads for 'good fortune'. Some children performed American style swing dancing to make us feel at home.

Lastly, the director of the village presented our leader with a beautiful silk sari as the tent filled with roars of happiness. The director shouted something that I believe meant, "Get to work" and we all jumped up and began building a school.

The entire community helped out. Women carried gravel, water and cement on their heads to a man, who mixed it right in the road to make concrete. For the next five hours, this concrete got passed along to us in an assembly line. Children sang the entire day, and not a single face was without a smile. At sunset, I could no longer feel my arms and only wondered how these people work this hard every day.

Everybody was reluctant to part, and we had another celebration on the way back to the bus. This time I was thanking each person I met. The day was filled with the simplest beauty. I learned how easy it is to be happy and how wonderful it is to spread that happiness.

I can honestly thank Bucknell for my remarkable journey around the world. Not only was I prepared academically but I had a sense of confidence and adventure that allowed me to have these experiences and live each moment to the fullest.

Returning to Bucknell has been so exciting, as many of my classmates have not seen one another for an entire year. As each of us has changed, abroad or not, the friendships seem even stronger and the enthusiasm that fills the air is contagious as we begin our last year at Bucknell.

Downtown Video opens its doors

Market Street business offers good deals, variety, proximity to campus

By Katy Zachry
Staff Writer

If you have not walked along Market Street since arriving at school, a surprise awaits you: Downtown Video. Located at 429 Market Street, Downtown Video is both Lewisburg's newest storefront and the University's closest source for movies and video games.

Having opened just two weeks ago, Downtown Video houses some of the most recent and popular movies for both VHS and DVD, along with video games for Playstation, Playstation 2, Nintendo 64, Dreamcast, and Gameboy Color.

With an expanding foreign film wall and sections for popular comedy, drama, action, children and the most recent new releases, you will not leave Downtown Video empty-handed.

Situated on the periphery of campus directly next to the Campus Theater, the store's proximity to the University is what owner and manager, Lenny Wagner, attributes much of his store's success.

When asked why he chose Lewisburg as the home of his second video store (he owns and operates Valley Video in Mifflinburg). Wagner said, "The kids needed it; Lewisburg needed it. It's a walking town. Most people come in and say this is great; I can walk here."

In addition to its convenient location and expansive selection, this family-run store boasts affordable prices as well. New releases are $2.75, while all other movies range from $1.40 to $2.25. All video games are $2.00 except for Playstation 2, which is priced at $2.25.

Considering these prices, it is no wonder Wagner reveals, "So far, there has been a good response from students."

It is important for Wagner to appeal to the college, and Downtown Video promises to deliver. "Whatever the students want, we'll bring it. I'm up for any suggestions," Wagner said.

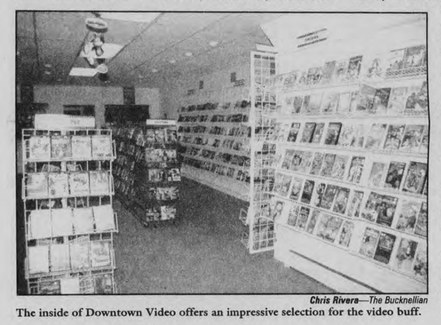
Brian Kuhn '05, can attest to Wagner's eagerness to accommodate his customers. "He (Wagner) asked if there were any movies that we wanted. They have a lot of new stuff, and I also like their specials."

Downtown Video's specials are another benefit. Specials occur on both Sunday and Wednesday. With every two movies rented on Sunday, the third (of equal or lesser value) is free. In addition, all Sunday rentals are due back on Tuesday instead of the standard next-day return. On Wednesday, all movies, including new releases, are only one dollar.

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The store welcomes both students and residents alike.

The store also has a free-membership policy that is offered to anyone who is 18 years or older and has legal identification. Downtown Video's hassle-free membership makes it easier than ever for students and residents of Lewisburg to gain access to popular movie classics.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The inside of Downtown Video offers an impressive selection for the video buff.

Mollie Martin '02 remembers what it was like as a first-year student in Smith.

"We would run all over the dorm trying to find movies, but we were never successful. This video store is in a great location for both freshman or anyone who doesn't have access to a car and wants to rent a good movie," Martin said.

Meh Alan, a first-year student living in Smith, was excited when she first heard about Downtown Video. "We watch movies all the time. If it's that close and there are good movies, we'll go," Alan said.

Whether you are in the mood for "Hannibal," "Traffic," or "American Beauty," or you would rather wait for "Blow" or "A Knight's Tale," two of the fifteen videos scheduled to be released later this month, Downtown Video is worth a visit.

University launches events examining African-American sexuality

By Katie Heise
Staff Writer

Black sexual politics. One may first encounter this rapidly evolving concept on the big screen, in the manufactured world of the sitcom or through late night radio programming. Unfortunately, many never look beneath this surface, beyond the cursory interpretation of American popular culture.

The University hopes to change this through an ongoing investigation entitled "Just Like In the Movies? Representations of Black Sexual Politics," which explores various viewpoints on African-American sexuality. Highlighted events include film screenings, a panel discussion and a culminating lecture by renowned author and scholar Patricia Hill Collins.

On Aug. 30, Spike Lee's breakthrough film "She's Gotta Have It" (1986) set the ball rolling, offering a window into the life of a young, black Brooklyn native caught between her own hopes and desires and the conflicting demands of three very different lovers. As the men jealously compete for commitment, Nola Darling, the heroine of this controversial picture, struggles to understand whether her sexual desires make her a liberated woman or a freak.

Fifteen years after its release, "She's Gotta Have It" remains a powerful commentary on the often-neglected world of educated middle class African-Americans as well as on relationships and gender roles.

"Love Jones" (1997), shown on Sept. 4, has also garnered excellent reviews for its positive, non-stereotypical portrayal of urban Blacks. Set in the coffeehouses and jazz clubs of Chicago, the film traces the turbulent relationship of a smooth talking poet and a beautiful and talented photographer.

Can the two maintain their relationship in spite of the obstacles in their path? And is this a true "love thing" or merely a fling?

This refreshing movie never sinks into the all-too-familiar realm of violence and drugs; rather, the characters are simply a group of friends who enjoy music, poetry and spending time with one another.

Collins aims to provide a new angle of vision on sexual politics among African Americans as well as on broader patterns of sexual politics in the United States.

Taking the study a step further, professors Linden Lewis, Elizabeth Crespo and Eric Faden participated on Sept. 6 in a panel discussion on the portrayal of African American sexuality in film.

The event provided an open forum for all members of the University community to share their views and ask questions regarding "She's Gotta Have It," "Love Jones," film in general and numerous other topics related to gender and race.

The intensity of the series is building as the campus prepares for the arrival of Patricia Hill Collins, the University of Cincinnati (UC) chair and professor of African American Studies best known for her award winning 1990 book "Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment." She will deliver the Ralph Spielman address this Tuesday in the Vaughn Literature Auditorium.

The lecture will challenge the campus community with some very difficult questions: How do different individuals and groups view promiscuity? What does it mean to be Black? To be female? How does the media reflect both truth and prejudice in relation to sexual politics?

Collins may be just the person to synthesize all of these ideas into a coherent whole and provide a new perspective on the ways in which sexuality and sexual practices overlap with race, class, gender and other forms of social inequality.

Collins, the first female in UC history to be named a Charles Phelps Taft Professor of Sociology, received her B.A. and Ph.D. from Brandeis University and an MAT degree from Harvard.

Though her specialties include the sociology of knowledge, organizational theory, social stratification and occupations, Collins' research and scholarship focus on issues relating to gender, race and social class, especially as they relate to African American women. She is widely published on the subjects of Black feminist theory and Black family studies, has held editorial positions with several academic and professional journals and serves as a consultant for a number of business and community organizations.

According to Janice Butler, Director of the Women's Resource Center at the University, Collins aims to provide a new angle of vision on sexual politics among African Americans as well as on broader patterns of sexual politics in the United States.

Streeter has seen all at the University

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Staff Writer

Robert Streeter '38, trustee emeritus, has many stories to share resulting from the diverse experiences of a man who has worn many hats in his lifetime.

Since graduating, he has seen much of the University's evolution. Before attending the University, Streeter worked for the Williamsport Sun Gazette, where he developed his love for journalism.

After enrolling in the University and pursuing a BA in English, Streeter wrote for The Bucknellian and the University's Public Relations Department.

After graduation, he earned his doctoral degree in English at Northwestern University and then returned to the University to teach journalism courses and an introductory world literature course until 1946.

Streeter said he returned to the University because he was impressed by the education the University provided. "I think, on the whole, that the Bucknell education was a good one because they were very serious about exploring general education. The world literature course was very innovative for it's time," Streeter said.

After leaving the University once again, Streeter began a long and well-respected career as a professor and dean at the University of Chicago in 1947. While teaching, he served first as dean of the Undergraduate College for five years and then as dean of the Graduate School of the Humanities for 10 years before retiring in 1986.

Streeter continued his close ties to the University and served as a trustee for 17 years. For the past 12 years he has been a trustee emeritus following his retirement from the board.

"I value the chance to serve on the University's board of trustees because I have spent my life being interested in the continuation of the role of liberal arts colleges among a growing number of professional schools. I also think that it's important to have members of the board of trustees who have fairly broad experience in higher education. That way I could talk to other members of the board about obstacles that face many universities," Streeter said.

As a student, professor, dean and trustee, Streeter has gained a very well rounded prospective of the entire higher education system. He strongly believes in the importance of a mandatory curriculum in addition to students taking classes specific to their field of study.

"I have always taken the idea of general education very seriously," Streeter said. "I think it is important that people not only be educated in their professions, but also as citizens so that people know what the world is like."

Streeter is a witness to the many changes in the University since he first became a student in 1930. At that time, only 900 students were enrolled each year—present enrollment figures have quadrupled.

Many of these changes have not been in the classroom but yet have affected student life. Streeter recalls that in the 1930s, the University provided less services for the campus as a whole. Students bought their books at a bookstore downtown because one did not exist on campus.

The campus also lacked laundry facilities. Most students mailed their laundry home. For example, Streeter would mail his laundry on Thursday to his mother to wash over the weekend, and she would return it to him by Tuesday.

Another stark difference was that male students who did not belong to a fraternity ate at a boarding house downtown instead of enjoying the convenience of the cafeteria.

Many of the campus buildings have changed over the years as well. Streeter took classes in Vaughan Literature when it was just built. In fact, Streeter met his future wife, Ruth Parker, in the Vaughan auditorium during a sociology class, ironically entitled "Marriage in the Family."

Although Streeter is retired, he still enjoys many of the same activities he was once involved in while a student. Writing remains a great focus in his life, which has kept him close to the University. Streeter assisted in the production of every page in the book, "Bucknell Now and Then." He also occasionally writes for The Bucknellian.

Streeter's main interests still lie in studying the theory of education.

"The gist of education is the ability to converse, to discuss and to argue without regarding the existence of argument as a sign of the other person's obtuseness. Wherever the curriculum is centered, it provides the opportunity to address serious topics and discuss them with the appropriate amount of knowledge and good temper," Streeter said.

He believes that the University is unique because it provides this opportunity to students.

Streeter said, "I thought one of the great things about my Chicago and Bucknell experiences was that you had a lot of bright people reading the same books and talking about different questions. So that much of the education took place outside of the classroom."

Abroad perspective: spring "Semester at Sea"

I awoke to my alarm, ten minutes before sunrise. My roommate and I pulled on jeans, grabbed our cameras and climbed to the top deck of our ship. We stood in the thick, cool air that would soon be 90 degrees and looked over to the lights shining on the shore.

The sun exposed itself in a brilliant display of orange beams. Slowly, the other passengers joined us as we pulled closer into port. Brian Kuhn '05, can attest to Wagner's eagerness to accommodate his customers. "He (Wagner) asked if there were any movies that we wanted. They have a lot of new stuff, and I also like their specials."

Downtown Video's specials are another benefit. Specials occur on both Sunday and Wednesday. With every two movies rented on Sunday, the third (of equal or lesser value) is free. In addition, all Sunday rentals are due back on Tuesday instead of the standard next-day return. On Wednesday, all movies, including new releases, are only one dollar.

The store welcomes both students and residents alike.

The store also has a free-membership policy that is offered to anyone who is 18 years or older and has legal identification. Downtown Video's hassle-free membership makes it easier than ever for students and residents of Lewisburg to gain access to popular movie classics.

Mollie Martin '02 remembers what it was like as a first-year student in Smith.

"We would run all over the dorm trying to find movies, but we were never successful. This video store is in a great location for both freshman or anyone who doesn't have access to a car and wants to rent a good movie," Martin said.

Meh Alan, a first-year student living in Smith, was excited when she first heard about Downtown Video. "We watch movies all the time. If it's that close and there are good movies, we'll go," Alan said.

Whether you are in the mood for "Hannibal," "Traffic," or "American Beauty," or you would rather wait for "Blow" or "A Knight's Tale," two of the fifteen videos scheduled to be released later this month, Downtown Video is worth a visit.

University launches events examining African-American sexuality

By Katie Heise
Staff Writer

Black sexual politics. One may first encounter this rapidly evolving concept on the big screen, in the manufactured world of the sitcom or through late night radio programming. Unfortunately, many never look beneath this surface, beyond the cursory interpretation of American popular culture.

The University hopes to change this through an ongoing investigation entitled "Just Like In the Movies? Representations of Black Sexual Politics," which explores various viewpoints on African-American sexuality. Highlighted events include film screenings, a panel discussion and a culminating lecture by renowned author and scholar Patricia Hill Collins.

On Aug. 30, Spike Lee's breakthrough film "She's Gotta Have It" (1986) set the ball rolling, offering a window into the life of a young, black Brooklyn native caught between her own hopes and desires and the conflicting demands of three very different lovers. As the men jealously compete for commitment, Nola Darling, the heroine of this controversial picture, struggles to understand whether her sexual desires make her a liberated woman or a freak.

Fifteen years after its release, "She's Gotta Have It" remains a powerful commentary on the often-neglected world of educated middle class African-Americans as well as on relationships and gender roles.

"Love Jones" (1997), shown on Sept. 4, has also garnered excellent reviews for its positive, non-stereotypical portrayal of urban Blacks. Set in the coffeehouses and jazz clubs of Chicago, the film traces the turbulent relationship of a smooth talking poet and a beautiful and talented photographer.

Can the two maintain their relationship in spite of the obstacles in their path? And is this a true "love thing" or merely a fling?

This refreshing movie never sinks into the all-too-familiar realm of violence and drugs; rather, the characters are simply a group of friends who enjoy music, poetry and spending time with one another.

> Collins aims to provide a new angle of vision on sexual politics among African Americans as well as on broader patterns of sexual politics in the United States.

Taking the study a step further, professors Linden Lewis, Elizabeth Crespo and Eric Faden participated on Sept. 6 in a panel discussion on the portrayal of African American sexuality in film.

The event provided an open forum for all members of the University community to share their views and ask questions regarding "She's Gotta Have It," "Love Jones," film in general and numerous other topics related to gender and race.

The intensity of the series is building as the campus prepares for the arrival of Patricia Hill Collins, the University of Cincinnati (UC) chair and professor of African American Studies best known for her award winning 1990 book "Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment." She will deliver the Ralph Spielman address this Tuesday in the Vaughn Literature Auditorium.

The lecture will challenge the campus community with some very difficult questions: How do different individuals and groups view promiscuity? What does it mean to be Black? To be female? How does the media reflect both truth and prejudice in relation to sexual politics?

Collins may be just the person to synthesize all of these ideas into a coherent whole and provide a new perspective on the ways in which sexuality and sexual practices overlap with race, class, gender and other forms of social inequality.

Collins, the first female in UC history to be named a Charles Phelps Taft Professor of Sociology, received her B.A. and Ph.D. from Brandeis University and an MAT degree from Harvard.

Though her specialties include the sociology of knowledge, organizational theory, social stratification and occupations, Collins' research and scholarship focus on issues relating to gender, race and social class, especially as they relate to African American women. She is widely published on the subjects of Black feminist theory and Black family studies, has held editorial positions with several academic and professional journals and serves as a consultant for a number of business and community organizations.

According to Janice Butler, Director of the Women's Resource Center at the University, Collins aims to provide a new angle of vision on sexual politics among African Americans as well as on broader patterns of sexual politics in the United States.

Streeter has seen all at the University

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Staff Writer

Robert Streeter '38, trustee emeritus, has many stories to share resulting from the diverse experiences of a man who has worn many hats in his lifetime.

Since graduating, he has seen much of the University's evolution. Before attending the University, Streeter worked for the Williamsport Sun Gazette, where he developed his love for journalism.

After enrolling in the University and pursuing a BA in English, Streeter wrote for The Bucknellian and the University's Public Relations Department.

After graduation, he earned his doctoral degree in English at Northwestern University and then returned to the University to teach journalism courses and an introductory world literature course until 1946.

Streeter said he returned to the University because he was impressed by the education the University provided. "I think, on the whole, that the Bucknell education was a good one because they were very serious about exploring general education. The world literature course was very innovative for it's time," Streeter said.

After leaving the University once again, Streeter began a long and well-respected career as a professor and dean at the University of Chicago in 1947. While teaching, he served first as dean of the Undergraduate College for five years and then as dean of the Graduate School of the Humanities for 10 years before retiring in 1986.

Streeter continued his close ties to the University and served as a trustee for 17 years. For the past 12 years he has been a trustee emeritus following his retirement from the board.

"I value the chance to serve on the University's board of trustees because I have spent my life being interested in the continuation of the role of liberal arts colleges among a growing number of professional schools. I also think that it's important to have members of the board of trustees who have fairly broad experience in higher education. That way I could talk to other members of the board about obstacles that face many universities," Streeter said.

As a student, professor, dean and trustee, Streeter has gained a very well rounded prospective of the entire higher education system. He strongly believes in the importance of a mandatory curriculum in addition to students taking classes specific to their field of study.

"I have always taken the idea of general education very seriously," Streeter said. "I think it is important that people not only be educated in their professions, but also as citizens so that people know what the world is like."

Streeter is a witness to the many changes in the University since he first became a student in 1930. At that time, only 900 students were enrolled each year—present enrollment figures have quadrupled.

Many of these changes have not been in the classroom but yet have affected student life. Streeter recalls that in the 1930s, the University provided less services for the campus as a whole. Students bought their books at a bookstore downtown because one did not exist on campus.

The campus also lacked laundry facilities. Most students mailed their laundry home. For example, Streeter would mail his laundry on Thursday to his mother to wash over the weekend, and she would return it to him by Tuesday.

Another stark difference was that male students who did not belong to a fraternity ate at a boarding house downtown instead of enjoying the convenience of the cafeteria.

Many of the campus buildings have changed over the years as well. Streeter took classes in Vaughan Literature when it was just built. In fact, Streeter met his future wife, Ruth Parker, in the Vaughan auditorium during a sociology class, ironically entitled "Marriage in the Family."

Although Streeter is retired, he still enjoys many of the same activities he was once involved in while a student. Writing remains a great focus in his life, which has kept him close to the University. Streeter assisted in the production of every page in the book, "Bucknell Now and Then." He also occasionally writes for The Bucknellian.

Streeter's main interests still lie in studying the theory of education.

"The gist of education is the ability to converse, to discuss and to argue without regarding the existence of argument as a sign of the other person's obtuseness. Wherever the curriculum is centered, it provides the opportunity to address serious topics and discuss them with the appropriate amount of knowledge and good temper," Streeter said.

He believes that the University is unique because it provides this opportunity to students.

Streeter said, "I thought one of the great things about my Chicago and Bucknell experiences was that you had a lot of bright people reading the same books and talking about different questions. So that much of the education took place outside of the classroom."

Transportation of the future

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

Do you love to ride roller coasters? Did you ever question how they are able to work? How are we able to be safely propelled through the air at such unbelievably high speeds? The answer is simple—magnetic-levitation motors.

One kind of magnetic-levitation motor used in roller coasters is a linear induction motor. Stators, or stationary windings, are placed into the track of the roller coaster. When an electrical current is sent out, a magnetic field is formed which stimulates additional magnetic fields in the copper or aluminum of the cars, causing them to move.

Another kind of motor, the linear synchronous motor, replaces the copper or aluminum in the cars with large magnets. The stator windings generate magnetic fields that either repel or attract the cars. The speed of each car is synchronous with the speed of the track's magnetic field.

The difference between the synchronous and the induction motor is that the magnets of the synchronous motor generate less heat, requiring less power to move the cars. Although they are heavier, synchronous motors are also more efficient.

According to The New York Times, linear induction motors are used in sliding doors, airport baggage systems and short-distance people-movers.

Could these magnetic-levitation motors ever be used in mass transportation? In Shanghai, a 20-mile magnetic-levitation train system using German technology is expected to open in 2004. As for the United States, five cities are considering magnetic-levitation transportation systems. Although it will take a decade to complete, cities such as Pittsburgh, Las Vegas and Los Angeles are planning on testing out this new technology.

However, conservatives remain skeptical. The New York Times reported that Sam Gurol, urban Maglev program manager of General Atomics in San Diego, said, "They draw the line at funding an unproven technology." Who knows what the future holds, but it may be sooner than you think that we will arrive at a revolutionary new transportation system that will match the lengths to which we have gone with roller coasters.

Debating the ethics of stem cell research

By Parker Terril
Staff Writer

With recent advances in science and medicine, many believe that modern man is closer than ever to completely understanding the complicated workings of the human body, but these advancements are also a source of great controversy. After much public outcry over the idea of cloning humans, another scientific leap is causing a similar debate.

The argument over stem cell research has raised many questions and none of them have clear answers. Stem cells are the proverbial superhero of human cells. They work by offering your body a blank cell, which can be transformed into any kind of cell that is found in the body.

The arguments over such research run deeper than medical ethics, extending into religion, personal and societal ethics. When dealing with embryos, the line between right and wrong becomes blurred. The ethical dilemma has members of the scientific community at odds with members of the religious community.

The religious argument is that, although the constitution grants separation of church and state, the most basic right it guarantees is the right to life. Their argument raises the question that lies at the heart of the stem cell debate: the question of when life begins.

From a purely scientific standpoint an embryo is not considered alive, because it cannot survive on its own. Therefore, scientists say, the choice to use embryonic stem cells is an easy one—not only morally sound, but also promising immense medical benefits.

"Theoretically, virtually any disease could be treated by stem cells. Every disease that we know of happens because cells in the body either are not functioning right or because they are overwhelmed," said Dr. Aman Shah of WebMD Medical News.

Stem cells would allow doctors to supply an ill person with a "reserve" of cells capable of becoming a virtual copy of diseased or damaged cells. For example, a person with AIDS could use stem cells to produce more white blood cells, thereby strengthening their immune system and impeding or even reversing the effects of the virus.

"Currently replacing cells with stem cells will be limited. The research is very new and it could take years before an advance is made," Biology Professor Josef Novak said.

Novak believes that stem cell research is one of the most promising recent advancements towards curing diseases like diabetes, Parkinson's disease, heart disease and cancer, as well as replacing burned skin and healing spinal cord injuries, to name only a few. Novak added that scientists in Israel have had much success with stem cells used to replace heart cells in laboratory mice.

For most people, the problem with stem cell research comes from the means used to obtain them. The most useful stem cells are those found in newly formed embryos, however, removing the cells destroys the embryo.

The adult body retains a limited number of stem cells, which could potentially be used. However, the more mature the stem cell, the less useful it becomes.

As stem cells develop with age they become more specific, losing the ability to become any type of cell. The second problem is that, while embryonic stem cells are abundant and easy to locate, there is no specific place where they are stored in adults, so finding developed cells would require exhaustive searching.

Lastly, adult stem cells are capable of only limited growth outside of the body. Compared to the accelerated growth rate of embryonic stem cells, time could be the difference between life and death to a person with a serious illness.

A national policy on stem cell research was only recently determined, when, in a speech at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, President Bush announced that he would approve a bill to allow limited government funding for research within the 60 existing stem cell lines.

"He made a clever, political decision," Religion Professor Maria Antonaccio said.

Antonaccio added that several religious figures, including Pope John Paul II, called for a full ban on government funding but Bush made a careful decision which did not alienate either side.

Novak has a lower opinion of the decision, but adds that it will not have global importance. "Fortunately not all nations have a President like Bush. Stem cell research will continue; the United States will just be at a disadvantage."

Many have speculated that, like abortion, stem cell research will be a controversial topic for years to come. However, despite the controversy, stem cell research will continue in the United States and around the world.

Will a new move to content protection end free music?

By George M. Casper
Staff Writer

Within the music industry the rise of the mp3 format among Internet users has become a troubling development in recent years. This file format, more properly called MPEG Audio Layer-3, originally developed in Germany by the Fraunhofer Institute to provide a way to encode music with quality approaching that of CDs in a much smaller file size.

In this way a single audio track reduces to a file only a few megabytes in size. With more and more people gaining access to high-bandwidth Internet connections and large hard drives it becomes easy to exchange these files with others and thereby amass large collections of music.

Such technology is the source of much unhappiness for the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA), as well as many artists.

Since the RIAA's core business is to sell music and since most artists collect royalties from music sales, many become distraught when their music is exchanged free of charge across the Internet. Little can be done to stop the exchange of existing mp3s.

According to The Register litigation against Napster, one of the earliest and most successful file-sharing services, proved successful in shutting the service down and creating it as a more desirable service in the eyes of the RIAA. As a result, most Napster users moved on to other services to exchange files.

Some of these services, including Gnutella and Freenet, are decentralized in nature and thus more difficult to take to court. Suing a corporation such as Napster is a simple matter. Suing a worldwide collection of users with no formal organization, recognized leader or financial assets becomes more difficult.

The RIAA uses "content protection" to fight against piracy. Instead of attacking existing music piracy, the RIAA seeks to prevent future problems.

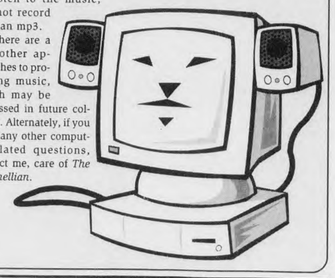
There are a few ways to accomplish this including protection schemes to prevent CDs from being "ripped" or recorded into mp3s and attempts to encourage people to secure (i.e. copy-proof and royalty-paying) file formats.

According to The Register, at least two technologies are used to prevent CD ripping: SafeAudio and Cactus Data Shield. While CD players and CD-ROM drives can both play music from CDs these two devices perform the task in somewhat different ways.

CD players are designed to tolerate smudges and errors on the CD; if the laser encounters an error, it simply ignores it and keeps moving.

On a CD-ROM, where reading exact data is vital, the CD-ROM will re-read the scanned section of the CD several times before failure caused the CD-ROM to give up.

These technologies rely on this fact by intentionally introducing errors a recording that a CD player would normally skip, but a CD-ROM drive would not read. The consumer would then be able to listen to the music, but not record it as an mp3.



There are a few other approaches to protecting music, which may be discussed in future columns. Alternately, if you have any other computer-related questions, contact me, care of The Bucknellian.

Summer movie reviews

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

The Fast and the Furious

You don't have to know anything about cars to enjoy "The Fast and the Furious." This high-speed action movie takes you on a ride along the streets of L.A. to show a day in the life of urban street racers. The audience learns that not everyone has what it takes to race with the best. Without loyalty, respect and pride, even the fastest drivers get burned. Though the story is slightly bland, the excitement and danger of street racing is enough to make even the tamest driver want to get in on the action. Starring Vin Diesle, Paul Walker, Michelle Rodriguez. Rated PG-13 (3.25 stars)

The cast of car racing thriller "The Fast and the Furious."

Legally Blonde

Don't you wish everything in life was as easy as attending Harvard Law School to win back the love of your life? If not, then don't see "Legally Blonde." In this upbeat summer comedy, Elle Woods (Reese Witherspoon) ditches her sorority to study law with the east coast's finest—and on her first try she lands flat on her face. But if at first you don't succeed, do what any Cosmo girl would do and try, try again. Elle learns that anything is possible if girls stick together; she makes friends with a manicurist stuck in the 80s, her ancient college professor, and even a murder suspect. Life may not be so peachy in the real world, but it could be fun to pretend for about two hours. Rated PG-13 (2.75 stars)

Moulin Rouge

Baz Luhrmann's latest production proves to be a dramatic musical-romance. If you make it past the choppy opening scenes, you will be dazzled by an array of lights, music, dancing, singing and more romance and tragedy than you ever thought possible. Paris in 1900 is the perfect place for a poor writer to fall in love with a starlet courtesan, and "Moulin Rouge" brings their story to life. Luhrmann uses an innovative soundtrack of hit songs from today—Madonna's "Like a Virgin", Nirvana's "Smells like Teen Spirit" and The Police's "Roxanne"—in a new and inspiring way. Nicole Kidman and Ewan McGregor have both the screen chemistry and the vocal ability that is needed to make anyone fall in love with "Moulin Rouge." Rated PG-13 (3.75 stars)

America's Sweethearts

You've got to love a parody masquerading as a romantic-comedy. Or in the case of "America's Sweethearts," a parody inside a romantic-comedy. All the elements for the romantic-comedy are there—namely Julia Roberts. Alongside Billy Crystal, Catherine Zeta-Jones and John Cusack, this cast delivers a light-hearted performance about two sisters—one beautiful, and one previously fat. The beautiful one dumps her run-of-the-mill hubby for the replica of a Grecian god, but can't stand to see her now-lean sister happy with her former love. All of that is well and good, but the real genius to this film is that the characters are movie stars. This allows the director, Joe Roth, a chance to take his swing at Hollywood. The story may not inspire the masses, but it will induce a laugh or two. Rated PG-13 (3.5 stars)

American Outlaws

It's been a while since Hollywood has had the guts to make a western, since the success of "Oh Brother, Where art Thou?" was probably just a fluke. "American Outlaws" won't break any box-office records, but it will entertain a few of its viewers. It stars a handful of actors whose names you probably wouldn't recognize, including Ali Larter and Scott Caan ("Varsity Blues"). Jesse James is back and trying to stop a railroad company from taking his family's land after the Civil War. Colin Farrell plays the quiet and polite Jesse, who would rather get married and start a family than rob a bank. But he can't seem to keep himself out of trouble. You will definitely sympathize with the outlaws and not the law in this one, hence the tagline from the trailer— "Bad is good again"—but you won't do much else. Rated PG-13 (2.5 stars)

Uptown kicks off year with Clarks

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Although not a vastly well-known band, the Clarks created a buzz of excitement on campus this past Saturday. Those from Pittsburgh, the band's hometown, were adamant about seeing the 10:30 p.m. show at Uptown. I decided to go after hearing "I've been Chasing Girls," from their latest album Let it Go, and brought along friends as well.

In the first 20 seconds of the show I became extremely aware that my first inclination of lameness was completely unfounded and that, in fact, the band rocked. The Clarks were welcomed by a screaming crowd and performed many popular songs, including "Better Off Without You" and "Born Too Late." Many of the lyrics were insightful, and their music could be considered as that of a self-described rock-and-roll band.

The Clarks went from doing covers at Indiana University of Pennsylvania to the Pittsburgh bar scene and have been a full-time band now for seven years. Incredible vocals, led by Scott Blasey, were only one critical element of the band. The acoustics from guitarists Blasey and James were phenomenal, not to mention the percussion from David Minarik and the strong base line from Greg Joseph. The essence of the band was communicated to the audience through those four vital parts of a rock-and-roll band—vocals, guitars, bass and drums.

> —Ryan Fleischer '05

First time listener Craig Beal '05 said that the band has talent and stage presence.

"It was a great concert environment ... very fun," Beal said.

The small setting allowed for band-audience interaction, which was especially exciting for Joel Bettner '05, who caught a drum stick from Minarik. Even long-time fans were impressed.

"I've seen three of their shows and this was the best one yet," Ryan Fleischer '05 said.

O.A.R. to impress crowd at Uptown

By Alex Costos
Staff Writer

The band Of A Revolution (O.A.R.) will play at Bucknell's own Uptown on Friday, Sept. 7 at 9:30 p.m. O.A.R., consisting of five 22-year-old guys, combines a hint of swing with a touch of rock to create a unique sound unmatched by any other band.

The band started in a high school in Rockville, Maryland. Ben Gershman (Bass), Marc Roberge (Guitar), Chris Culos (drums) and Richard On (vocals) founded O.A.R.

Soon to join was Jerry DePizza on the very exclusive saxamaphone. Together, the five of them recorded two hit albums—The Wanderer in 1997 and Souls Aflame in 1999.

Their first album, The Wanderer, contains popular songs like "That Was A Crazy Game of Poker," "Black Rock" and "Conquering Fools."

The live studio-recorded album provided fresh new beats for a very eager audience. "Crazy Game of Poker" soon became the group's debut hit.

Their second album, Souls Aflame, presented a style similar to the first, but with a new and more mature sound. With songs like "City On Down," "Night Shift," "The Wanderer" and "Hey Girl," the band has grown in experience and tone from album to album. O.A.R.'s thoughts on their albums show their professionalism.

"Our generation is just trying to lose the stereotype as underachievers, when really we are discovering new achievements every day," the band said on their website.

"We've just adapted to the situation past generations have put us in. The music represents the respect our generation deserves when we as a generation have been labeled as questionable in our future success," they said.

To learn more about the band, visit Of A Revolution's web page at www.ofarevolution.com.

WVIA-FM to broadcast Bucknell Music Department Concert

Faculty members join Easterly Chamber Players for performance

By Jackson Hill
Music Department Chair

Bucknell Concert on WVIA-FM will broadcast a Bucknell Music Department concert this Saturday, Sept. 8, at 3:00 p.m.

The concert was recorded in the New Music Building Recital Hall on March 1. It features the Easterly Chamber Players with University music department faculty members Diane Gold Toulson, flute, and Martha Gibbs Hill, mezzo-soprano, with Smith Toulson, clarinet and Hanni Schmid Wyss, piano.

The concert includes music by Florent Schmitt, J. S. Bach, Francis Poulenc, Claude Debussy, Frederic Chopin, and Camille Saint-Saens. WVIA-FM is heard in Lewisburg at 100.1 or 89.9 FM.

"Hard Times" auditions to be held

Department of Theater and Dance to perform adaptation of Dickens classic

By Bob Gainer
"Hard Times" Director

The Department of Theatre and Dance plans to hold open auditions for "Hard Times," an adaptation of Charles Dickens' satiric drama about the mechanizing effects of the Industrial Revolution.

What happens when human beings are deprived of imagination, when life is based solely on fact and not fancy? This drama consists of nineteen characters, all so colorful they could only have been created by Dickens.

Auditions take place in Coleman Hall, Room 252 on Sunday, September 9, between 4 p.m. and 6 p.m. and Monday, September 10, between 6 p.m. and 8 p.m. Students are invited to come on either one of those evenings. Those who audition will be asked to read one or more short scenes from the play and perhaps perform an improvisational piece.

Several perusal copies of the script are on reserve at the Bertrand Library under TH (Theatre). Auditioners should prepare themselves for a sense of the play's story and its characters before they audition. ALL ARE WELCOME!

U.S. and Israel depart UN conference in protest

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

For the third time, a United Nations conference on racism is now taking place without U.S. participation.

Dubbed the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance, this particular conference has been embroiled in controversy even before it began in Durban, South Africa on Aug. 31.

The Bush administration and some European governments have feared that the conference's focus would turn to controversial topics such as a formal apology for colonialism and the slave trade, reparations for slavery, and a return to the so-called "Zionism is racism" doctrine.

Some African nations and African-American organizations have pressed for an apology and reparations for slavery, which the U.S. and some of its European allies oppose.

In addition, Arab and Muslim nations have pushed to label Zionism-the movement that sought the establishment of the state of Israel-racist.

The U.S. boycotted two other U.N. racism conferences in 1978 and 1983 for similar reasons. Amid substantial criticism, Secretary of State Colin Powell, the only African-American to ever hold the post, decided not to attend the racism conference due to Arab and Muslim nations' determination to keep the anti-Israeli language in the conference report. Instead, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Michael Southwick led a mid-level delegation to the conference.

"This was not a question of persuading people. This was a question of an iron wall we were up against, and there was no give.'

—Rep. Tom Lantos

The U.N. General Assembly passed such a resolution in 1975, during the height of the Cold War, but revoked it in 1991.

During preparations for the conference, both the U.S. and Israel threatened to boycott it if, in the words of President Bush, delegates tried to "pick on" Israel.

Powell made the decision despite his earlier desire to attend the conference. Even from Washington, however, he continued to direct the U.S. team's actions.

The U.S. delegation received instructions from Powell on Sept. 3 directing it to leave the conference.

While announcing the walkout Powell said, "I have taken this decision with regret because of the importance of the international fight against racism and the contribution that the conference could have made to it. But following discussions today by our team in Durban and others who are working for a successful conference, I am convinced that will not be possible."

Rep. Tom Lantos, a California Democrat, survivor of the holocaust and member of the U.S. delegation lamented the United States' departure, but added that the refusal of the Palestinians and their supporters to compromise left the U.S. no choice.

While the U.S. team was in Durban, it did attempt to negotiate with the nations that insisted on the anti-Israeli, anti-Zionist language.

The decision to walk out followed hours of heated closed-door meetings, which Norway moderated. Norwegian diplomats proposed new language that merely mentioned the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and blamed no one, which Arab officials said was not enough.

But, as Lantos said, "This was not a question of persuading people. This was a question of an iron wall we were up against, and there was no give."

Powell's decision to not attend the conference personally and his decision to withdraw the U.S. delegation have drawn loud criticism at home and abroad. The Rev. Jesse Jackson made an especially furious speech. Some critics say that by walking away from the conference the U.S. has failed to adequately assert its influence and is hiding from the issue of racism.

Some also claim that the U.S. used the Zionism issue to avoid making a formal apology for slavery, which could pave the way for expensive reparation lawsuits.

After the U.S. walkout, Canada and the European Union threatened to follow suit rather than appear to legitimize an anti-Semitic final document.

Violence interferes with Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations

Israeli rockets wreaked havoc on several Palestinian towns after another suicide bombing in Israel.

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

The past few weeks have seen a startling reversal in Israeli-Palestinian relations. Just this week, Palestinian militants set off a series of bombs in Jerusalem, raising tensions even above what they have been for the past few months.

It appears that relations between Israelis and their neighbors have hit a low point coming off a decade long push for peace, beginning with the Oslo accords in 1993, which began an attempt to create a Palestinian state within Israeli lands. Then followed the Wye River Agreement, in which a timetable for Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian territory was agreed upon.

Implementation of the plan went well, until late 2000, when fighting broke out again amongst the two sides and has continued frequently since. The fuse that set off the fighting was a failure of the two sides to come to an agreement when they met at Camp David with Former President Clinton to discuss restarting what had been agreed upon at Wye River.

Until recently the fighting had been street battles between Palestinians and Israeli soldiers. Palestinians killed since the latest outbreak (Sept. 2000-Sept. 2001) number about 400, while Israelis killed number a bit more than half that. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has increased strikes by the military on those Palestinians claimed to be dangerous to the state by attacking them by helicopter, usually as they ride along in vehicles. Israel states that when the Palestinians stop the violence, so shall they.

Recently, the suggestion has again arisen to separate the two into two distinct states, to end the fighting in one fell swoop. This was the original intent of the United Nations mandate in 1948, which, because of wars between Israel and her Arab neighbors, never worked out.

In the new proposal, Palestine would be granted statehood with territory along the lines of those already agreed upon. Israel would further tighten its security, allowing Palestinian crossings only through specially built and designated checkpoints while Jewish settlements within Palestinian-held lands would remain in Israel's hands. Other proposals floated include reducing Israel's lands to those it held before having seized any in the 1967 Six-Day War with Jordan, Egypt, and Syria.

Michael Eitan, a member of Israel's ruling party, the Likud, puts a more likely proposal forth. He states that all of Jerusalem, the most hotly contested site in Israel and a majority of Jewish settlements in Palestinian lands would be ruled by Israel. This would likely cause a problem, as Jerusalem is a religious city for both Israelis and Palestinians. Fences would be raised around the major Palestinian settlements to keep the two apart.

Palestinians object to this new plan of segregation saying that it would both devastate their economy and convince their youth to join militant groups which would bring the two sides back to where they are now.

There seems no easy answer to this decades old conflict. What the U.S., under new leadership, will do to promote peace between these sides also remains unclear, but will develop in the coming months. The waiting game continues, but with the hope that it will resolve itself through reason and common interest.

Hewlett-Packard buys Compaq for $20 billion

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

In a move that will undoubtedly shake up the ailing computer and information technology sectors, Hewlett-Packard announced late Monday that it will buy rival Compaq Computer.

The combined firm will be a titan in the industry, rivaling IBM in size, and taking the top spot in personal computer sales from Dell Inc. The combined firm will have approximately 150,000 employees and $87 billion in annual revenues.

The deal is not expected to be completed until the first half of 2002 and still faces some regulatory hurdles.

Nevertheless, Carly Fiorina and Michael Capellas, CEOs for HP and Compaq respectively, insist that the merger is a good match and that the new firm will enjoy many cost-saving opportunities.

In a news conference on Tuesday, Fiorina explained that the deal "vaults us into a leadership role, with customers and partners-together we will shape the industry for years to come."

Wall Street did not share her optimism. Traders drove down the price of HP stock 18.6 percent leaving it at $18.89/share. Due to the decline, the $25 billion stock swap is now only valued at $20.3 billion.

Shares of Compaq were met with similar distaste, driven down 10.3 percent despite the fact that shares of a target company typically rise after the deal is announced. Both stocks continued to struggle in Wednesday's trading.

The two companies have been struggling recently, and many analysts see the merger simply complicating matters. While there may be some potential in the deal, it is buried beneath tough decisions involving layoffs and cost cutting.

This has lead many to question whether the new company has what it takes to realize the potential, and how long it might take. "This is a deal driven by weakness, not out of strength," stated one arbitraguer.

Dell Computer managed to ride traders' disapproval for the deal to a 4.4 percent gain in trading on Tuesday. While many analysts feel that the merger is a bad idea for HP and Compaq, most see it as an opportunity for Dell to expand its success in the personal computer market.

The new company would still be known as Hewlett-Packard, and the headquarters will remain in Palo Alto, California, although they will maintain a large presence in Houston, Compaq's current headquarters.

After completion of the deal, current HP stockholders will own 64 percent of the company while Compaq holders will own 36 percent. Both companies are currently in the midst of major restructuring programs, and there is a great deal of doubt whether the deal will actually be completed or be abandoned later this year. With such a negative reaction from the market, it would probably not take much trouble in the integration process to destroy the whole deal.

Despite the fact that this deal is being met with quite a bit of skepticism, Cisco CEO John Chambers says that the market can expect more consolidation in the technology sector in the future.

The University Crisis Response Team reacted immediately to the terrorist attacks by creating a support system and providing resources for the campus community, writes News Editor Natalie Casp

Less than an hour after two planes deliberately crashed into the World Trade Center in New York City, the University's Crisis Response Team (CRT) convened to discuss the ramifications of the attack on life at the University. The CRT immediately established a crisis center on campus, scheduled faculty and town meetings and offered various religious services, as well as preparing several additional resources for the campus community.

During the faculty meeting Tuesday afternoon, University President Steffen Rogers acknowledged that the CRT never previously established emergency protocol for a national disaster, but assured the members of the faculty that the University will do everything in its power to aid students and all members of the campus community in this tragic time of need.

"We've been making this up as we go along," Rogers said. "I am extremely proud with how the Emergency Response Team has reacted, as well as faculty and students. So many people have asked me, 'How can I help?'"

Help for students and the campus community was implemented immediately. By 11 a.m., the CRT designated Walls Lounge in the Elaine Langone Center as the crisis center on campus to provide information and counseling for students and the campus community. Psychological Services staff, Dean of Students staff, Chaplains and faculty volunteers were available as students arrived and tried to locate family members who could have been in lower Manhattan.

David Flinchbaugh '82, director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers, said his office is aware of over 50 alumni and parents of current students with business addresses inside the World Trade Center. Flinchbaugh, who is acting as the off-campus communications liaison during the tragedy, also said he is aware of several hundred workers with University connections in the Financial District of New York City.

"People are known to be missing, but we have no confirmation of any deaths right now," Flinchbaugh said.

Vice President for Student Affairs Charlie Pollock '70 said that the CRT has been in contact with more than a dozen students who potentially have family members in the attacked areas.

"The number of students waiting to hear has been narrowed down considerably; most of our students have learned of the safety of their family members," Pollock said. "But there are members of our community who have likely lost close family members and it's almost impossible to say we haven't lost any alumni."

Rogers, too, fears the worst is yet to come, in terms of casualties of members of the campus community.

"I am absolutely convinced we're going to get a list of names that will be extremely bad news for us," Rogers said. "I hate to predict that and I hate to think about it, but I just don't see how we could not be impacted considering the number of Bucknellians in the area."

Rogers said that all members of the Board of Trustees are accounted for, though some are still stranded.

Pollock said faculty members have been rushing to volunteer to help students in any way possible.

"Faculty support is so important because of the connections students have to faculty," Pollock said.

During the faculty meeting, Assistant Professor of Education Steve Knotek and Assistant Professor of Psychology Bill Flack guided the faculty, via a presentation and a comprehensive handout, in applying 'psychological first aid,' triage and risk screening to students.

"Professors Steve Knotek and Bill Flak came forward, proving to be extraordinary resources for Bucknell," Pollock said. "It really became apparent how fortunate we are to have them in our midst; it's been a blessing in the midst of this challenge."

University establishes resources for students

By Andrew Burr
Sports Editor

Indicative of communities both around the nation and the world, this campus felt the harrowing effects of Tuesday morning's attack as it suffered to come to grips with the terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington, D.C.

Activities around the University, both athletic and academic in nature, came to a virtual standstill following news of the attacks. University President Steffen Rogers maintained the regular schedule of classes, in an effort to avoid students leaving the campus "without a purpose," during this time of crisis.

Despite the cancellation of most normal University events and activities, the administration has been hard at work since the early hours of the tragedy, putting forth effort to provide students with counseling, guidance, familiarity and emotional outlets.

"I was impressed by how quickly the University responded to this tragedy and how the students and faculty came together," said

Campus evaluates attack

By Rachel Laskow

On Tuesday, terrorists attacked two of America's greatest political symbols—the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Although there are still many unanswered questions, University faculty, staff and students are beginning to see the effects throughout the world, the country and even the campus.

One of the first responses to the attacks occurred in the Middle East when Palestinians celebrated in the streets. However, most of Europe is continuing to support the United States in what officials are calling "a war on terrorism."

Tom Travis, director of international relations and professor of political science, believes that the attacks will gain support abroad, especially in terms of President Bush's missile defense plan.

"Most countries will support and sympathize with the United States, and for a while be more reluctant to criticize the United States," Travis said. "The bombing might increase support or understanding abroad, such as in Europe or Russia for the Bush Missile Defense plan. More cooperation between the United States, Europe, Israel and Russia on a common plan to combat terrorism may occur."

Travis also believes that the attack will influence America's relationship with Israel.

"Israel will attempt to use the incident to solidify its strong relationship with the United States, painting both countries as 'besieged' by terrorism. Where citizens in countries or entities applaud the attack on the United States, the U.S. government could diminish its support for their governments," Travis said. "For example, the parades of Palestinians celebrating the bombings will antagonize the U.S. government and not help the Palestinian cause. If the United States discovers that any countries supported and aided the attackers, these governments should expect re-

Bush: United States feels 'quiet, unyielding anger'

WASHINGTON (CNN) — President Bush responded Tuesday night to the events of a day of unfathomable death, destruction and heartbreak in America's centers of commerce and government by expressing the "steel" will of the United States to heal her deep wounds, and to administer justice to those responsible for carrying out the most shocking simultaneous acts of criminal violence in U.S. history.

"Today, our fellow citizens, our way of life, and our very freedom came under attack in a series of deliberate and deadly terrorist acts," Bush, speaking from the Oval Office, said of the destruction of New York City's landmark World Trade Center, the attack on the Pentagon in Arlington, Va., and the crash of a hijacked jetliner in rural Pennsylvania on Tuesday.

Israeli troops enter West Bank city

JENIN, West Bank (CNN) — Israeli forces entered Palestinian-controlled Jenin in the West Bank early Wednesday, sparking a gun battle and destroying a Palestinian Security Forces compound in the city's center, an Israeli military spokesman said.

United Nations begins pullout as Taliban denies role

KABUL, Afghanistan (CNN) — The United Nations began evacuating staff as Taliban condemned the violence. Afghanistan's ruling party was swift to deny any involvement in the terrorism attacks in New York and Washington.

Taliban officials also denied that Osama bin Laden, the millionaire Saudi fugitive blamed for past terrorist attacks against American targets, was behind the attacks.

1,400 feared dead: toll will climb

NEW YORK (CNN) — The city that never sleeps struggled to wake up from its unimaginable nightmare, one day after bearing the brunt of the deadliest terrorist attack ever in the United States.

The fatalities from the Tuesday calamity will reach well into the thousands, but authorities cautioned that the final number will not be known for weeks, if then.

Another Serb mass grave found

The grave is believed to contain bodies of ethnic Albanians killed during the 1999 war in Kosovo.

A Serbian police statement on Sunday said, "Twenty-six unidentified bodies and body parts were exhumed on Saturday near Lake Perucac, not far from the town of Uzice."

Jury decides on life sentence for embassy bomber

NEW YORK (CNN) — A federal jury Tuesday decided that convicted U.S. Embassy bomber Khalfan Khamis Mohamed will be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole.

Mohamed was convicted in May of killing the 11 people who died in the Aug. 7, 1998, bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. A near simultaneous bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Kenya killed 213 people.

All flights stopped nationwide

The first-ever grounding of all flights in the United States remained in effect from Tuesday until 11 a.m. Thursday due to security concerns following the hijackings of airliners that were then crashed into buildings, the Federal Aviation Administration said.

Wife of Solicitor General alerted him of hijacking from plane

WASHINGTON — Barbara Olson, a conservative commentator and attorney, alerted her husband, Solicitor General Ted Olson, that the plane she was on was being hijacked Tuesday morning, Ted Olson told CNN.

His wife said all passengers and flight personnel, including the pilots, were herded to the back of the plane by armed hijackers. The only weapons she mentioned were knives and cardboard cutters.

A short time later the plane crashed into the Pentagon. Barbara Olson is presumed to have died in the crash.

Federal Reserve makes money available after attacks

The Federal Reserve requested Wednesday that central banks overseas limit the trading of dollars. The move comes as Chairman Alan Greenspan returns to the United States to help the central bank cope with money supply issues in the wake of terrorist attacks on major targets in New York and Washington, D.C.

Rabbi Serena Fujita believes that this event will affect the Middle East in two ways.

"The first is people will say it's Israel's fault because the United States supports Israel. Some might say, 'Look what Israel has been through.' Israel is a focus. The Jews are focused on for good or for evil," Fujita said.

"My first reaction was 'Welcome to terrorism.' I lived there and there is a deep down fear of everything safe, of suddenly not being safe ever again. That's how people feel every day in Israel. There is always an edge," Fujita said.

John Peeler, professor of political science, agrees that these attacks have made Americans more aware of what is going on in the Middle East.

"We have now been brought fully into the perverse logic of retaliation that affects the Middle East: when you are hit, you retaliate. That retaliation then justifies your opponent's response, and so on. If you choose not to retaliate, it will be interpreted as weakness, and the opponent will hit you again," Peeler said. "There is no escape from this dynamic until both sides want to escape."

Peeler also believes that the United States needs to reach out to others in the Middle East, not just to Israelis.

"Pursuant to getting out of this vicious circle, we should also reach out to the Palestinians and others in the Middle East, making it clear that we support Palestinian self-determination and do not support Israel's continued occupation," Peeler said. "Until we break free of our policy of unquestioning support of Israel, we will be seen as enemies by many in the Middle East. Our policy should be that Israel and a viable Palestinian state must coexist."

University Chaplain Ian Oliver believes that people will now take a closer look at the complexities of the Middle East if that region's struggles were connected to terrorism. However, he also reminds people to think of all victims of terrorism.

"We can sympathize with all places in the world where there are victims of terror. Perhaps we can better put ourselves in their shoes. It's not just Israel, but Ireland, Sri Lanka, Columbia and many others," Oliver said.

Although this act of terrorism is affecting many parts of the world, many see its potential to unify the people and government of the United States.

"The bombing will unify the people and the Congress around President Bush and in the short term make more of our foreign policy bipartisan," Travis said.

"Politically, the terrorist bombings have unified the people and the government of this country. It is a common reaction for people to rally behind a president or country in times of crises. In this instance, all Americans feel that they have been touched in some way," Massoud said. "On a governmental level, both the Democrats and the Republicans will set aside their political differences and offer the president support in dealing with this tragedy."

Although Peeler agrees that this tragedy is bringing the country together, he also questions why it happened.

"It will probably bring the country together. It ought to cause us to ask what we might have done over the last half century to cause people to hate us," Peeler said.

Despite the numerous leads as to who committed the crime, this problem is not close to being solved. In the mean time, Americans look to the government for answers.

"As can be expected, there is tremendous pressure on the President to punish the guilty, once they are identified. I hope the response will be carefully thought out—not simply an emotional reaction to the tragic events. Although we can expect some military strikes to degrade the capability of terrorists groups, we also need to address the issue on a continuing basis," Massoud said.

> "The United States needs to address all aspects of this issue and not simply its consequences. Terrorism knows no boundaries.
> —Associate Professor of Political Science Tony Massoud

Massoud believes that the United States will not solve the problem alone.

"The United States needs to address all aspects of this issue and not simply its consequences. Terrorism knows no boundaries. The United States cannot by itself resolve this problem. America should lead a multicultural effort in this direction. Already, a number of countries and organizations have offered to work with us in this area," Massoud added.

Travis also addresses the issue of terrorism.

"We also must recognize that terroristic acts have political objectives and usually occur to manifest frustration over alleged injustices and deprivations. The United States causes many problems for peoples and states around the globe and plenty of people and societies have grievances against the United States. President Bush should consider ways to address these grievances which could reduce the frequency of terrorists actions against the United States. Of course, this is easier said than done," Travis said.

Although the attacks were hundreds of miles away, the repercussions are being felt on campus.

"It will certainly raise people's awareness of international affairs," Peeler said.

Travis does not believe that the event will have major political effects on campus.

"Most Bucknellians are concerned about the crisis but are politically apathetic with a low level of political efficacy. I doubt the effects on campus will be significant," Travis said.

Catholic Campus Minister Father Marty Moran believes that there is a relationship between the effects on the world and students.

"There are pockets of Catholicism in the Middle East. Retaliation is no answer. Students want answers now. They are used to everything being solved in 24 hours. Students are afraid," Moran said.

Throughout campus, students are reacting differently.

"We can't have hysteria and that's what I've seen with students," Moran said.

"It is easier to feel anger than grief. People are allowing anger to take over," Fujita said.

Fujita also believes that minority students are being looked at differently.

"All minority [students] are looked at as a whole. People across the country are feeling it too. It's anyone who looks different," Fujita said.

Oliver urges everyone to continue to support those with losses.

"I'm concerned that we will lose the focus on the people in our community who have suffered a loss," he said.

Oliver summarized an emotion that seems to be felt throughout the country and campus community.

"The taking of innocent lives is always wrong," he said.

Community bands together

Kari Conrad, assistant dean of students and director of campus activities and programs. "This institution will continue to respond in every way possible to all needs of the students."

The administration wasted little time in generating a number of events catering to a multitude of different needs for the campus. Despite the enormity of that task and the severity of the crisis, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro felt the campus "...came together with good spirit."

"I am very proud of us all," Ferraro said.

Among those events offered to students was a town meeting, a crisis team in the Walls Lounge, special Catholic and interdenominational vigils and an opportunity to donate blood at an upcoming blood drive.

Many of the deans voluntarily made themselves accessible for much of Tuesday night in an effort to calm students and answer any questions. Additionally, Rogers asked faculty members to "... meet with those students who wish to attend classes and counsel them as best we can to understand what is happening."

While each event was aimed at comforting students during such an unusual and stressful tragedy, each event fulfilled different needs for students.

> "Us gathering as a community is a key element. At a time like this, prayer is something that is needed,
>
> —Catholic Campus Minister Father Marty Moran

The vigils held at Rooke Chapel afforded students the opportunity to gather and pray for those involved with the crisis.

"The atmosphere was very somber [inside the chapel] and you could tell people were upset," said Theresa Newhard '04. "I felt a very warm and comforting feeling though, because so many people came."

The campus' religious leaders have been available for the community since early Tuesday morning.

"Us gathering as a community is a key element," Catholic Campus Minister Father Marty Moran said. "At a time like this, prayer is something that is needed."

The crisis team in the Walls Lounge of the Langone Center was one of the first services the university offered, and will remain open over the next few days, according to Rogers.

"The crisis center was created to be a central meeting place on campus where students have access to counselors and psychological services around the clock," Conrad said.

Students also have access to food, ribbons (representing solidarity) and telephones for national or international calls from Walls Lounge.

The town meeting, held on the Academic Quad on Tuesday evening, was an opportunity for not only members of the University, but members of Lewisburg, to comfort each other and lend helping hands.

"I couldn't believe how much it [the town meeting] brought us together as a community and how fortunate we all are to be on a campus like this," Jen Mellon '04 said. "It is impressive that on such short notice, the administration has so many services set up for students, despite the fact that they must be grieving themselves as well."

Many students attempted to give blood at local hospitals, but were turned away due to an overwhelming response by the local community. Ruth Burnham, associate dean of students and campus representative for the American Red Cross, has established a blood drive on campus for Oct. 3.

In a campus-wide email, Burnham said, "There will be a need for blood donations well beyond these first days of response to yesterday's disasters, and donors must wait 56 days between donations of whole blood, so even if it is frustrating not to be able to give right now your gift of life will be needed and appreciated in the future, as well."

The focus of the CRT's response, Pollock said, has been to help students and strengthen the campus community.

"A common theme throughout the large and small elements of our response has been creating opportunities to be a community and not be alone," Pollock said. "That drove, of course, the town meeting idea, worship services, the decision to encourage having class and to continue with scheduled routine events like athletic practices and classes."

The CRT met several times since its initial meeting and continues to assess the needs of students, as well as provide numerous resources for the community.

"We simply have to be there for one another, proactively as well as responsively. This is a time that we are fortunate to be at Bucknell—the resources and ethos of caring on this campus has amazed me," Pollock said. "It's amazing how a community— especially this one—can mobilize, focus and draw on the intelligence and inner resources to conceive of what it needs to get through this. Bucknell is a place that can get through this. We will spare no effort."

Partial list of efforts by University Crisis Response Team:

- Crisis Response Team convened Sept. 11: 10 a.m. and noon, Sept. 12: 8 a.m.
- Walls Lounge Crisis Center established; counseling, information and outgoing long distance phone access provided
- Psychological Services remains open as usual
- Dean of Students and staff identify and maintain contact with students known to have family members missing
- Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers identifies constituents in target locations, begins efforts to ascertain status
- Presidential all-campus e-mails: 11:09 a.m., 11:13 a.m., 1:56 p.m.
- Town Meeting Sept. 11 at 6 p.m. on Academic Quadrangle
- Guidance for faculty and residence advisors in applying "psychological first aid," triage and risk screening, featuring Assistant Professor of Education Steve Knotek and Assistant Professor of Psychology Bill Flack.
- Faculty encouraged to meet with classes, to aid students in processing tragedy and provide stability
- Administrators and residence hall staff periodically check student gatherings in hall lounges, fraternities, academic departments, etc., creating awareness of Crisis Center and other available resources
- Deans Robert Midkiff and Gerry Commerford identified as respondents to incoming phone calls (parents especially)
- University response web site established, linked to Bucknell home page
- Flags lowered to half-staff
- Religious services scheduled
- International/multicultural student leaders meet, joined by key staff, to process events
- Ribbon campaign to signify unity of campus community launched
- Many co-curricular events postponed or cancelled; some routine events held
- Director of Reservations/Information/Conferences Judy Mickanis takes responsibility for coordinating volunteer drivers for students needing to get to families
- Provisions made for emergency loans to students in need
- Alumni Board and Parents Board each offer assistance
- Students donate blood locally, but waiting for Oct. 3 drive encouraged
- Anticipation of need to deal with changes in enrollment plans—early return from study abroad, etc.

Bucknellians share horror of attacks Tuesday in mid-town, NYC

North of the towers

By EJ Crawford '99
Former Editor-in-Chief '98

I got out of the subway at Lafayette and Canal Street at about 9 a.m. to return to my cousin's apartment on the corner of Varick (the continuation of 7th Avenue, where I'm currently living) and Canal Street, about 20 blocks from the twin towers. As soon as I emerged from the subway I heard sirens and saw a truck and an ambulance going south down Broadway. While curious, sirens aren't that rare and I didn't think that much of it until I saw smoke from between the buildings (while walking west on Canal). Then I got to West Broadway and saw a gigantic hole in the northern tower of the World Trade Center.

On the street people were all stopped, with many taking pictures or with video cameras. I asked the woman next to me what happened, and she said a plane had hit the tower. My first thought was what could have happened for a plane to range that far off course and to hit the World Trade Center. It never occurred to me it could be intentional.

Then, ten minutes after I heard the sirens screaming down Broadway, I saw another explosion. At first I thought it was on the same tower, but someone (I don't remember who they were) pointed out it was on the other tower. At this point I went back to my apartment to watch the news and find out what was going on. There I learned it was a second plane. With a neighbor I rushed to the roof of our building, where we had a clear view. It was the most astonishing thing I've ever seen—both of the towers were on fire and surrounded by smoke. It was completely surreal. The worst part, by far—in fact, possibly the worst thing I have ever seen—was watching people jump from the top windows of trade towers to avoid the fire and smoke. It nearly made me literally sick to my stomach. At first I thought it was debris falling from the building until a neighbor on the roof pointed out otherwise.

After that I went back downstairs and, as most of the country was probably doing at the time, watched the news—flipping between local New York news and national news to find out more about the Pentagon. It was then I heard screams outside my cousin's 5th floor apartment, where people on the ground were scattered on the sidewalks and street, some screaming and most standing stock still with their hands over their mouths. The first of the two towers had collapsed.

At that time I went back up to the roof, where I saw the other tower fall; it was completely numbing, awful. I cannot explain in words the pit in my stomach looking at the skyline where the towers once stood and seeing only blue sky and smoke.

Later on in the day my building was evacuated after a car was left unattended outside the building. At that point I walked two hours to the Upper East Side, where I stayed the rest of the day, checking on family and friends—which I'm happy to say are all accounted for. I hope everyone else can say the same.

Tuesday in mid-town, NYC

By Brian P. Watson '01
Former Editor-in-Chief '00

Tuesday morning turned into a surrealistic nightmare for so many New Yorkers, including those who were nowhere near the World Trade Center. For me, an ordinary walk from Penn Station to my office on East 28th Street and Park Avenue became the beginning of a terrifying day of fear and uncertainty.

As I crossed Broadway at 30th Street around 9:15 a.m., I came upon a hundred or so people staring downtown at the massive clouds of smoke gusting upward from the North tower of the World Trade Center. Most people were unsure of what had happened. I kept walking and stopped into a deli where I could here a radio station reporting that a plane had crashed into the upper floors of the tower.

At first, everyone thought it was a fluke. By the time I arrived at my office, a second plane had crashed into the South tower, sending new surges of fire and smoke into the air.

My first impulse was to run out onto our balcony and see for myself. And what I saw was beyond my wildest imaginations: The Twin Towers, arguably the most imposing landmarks of New York City were alight with flames and darkened by massive clouds of black smoke.

I rushed back to my desk and called my father, who worked only a few blocks from Ground Zero. Luckily, his office was safe but had become enveloped in smoke and debris. From his reports and the view from our balcony, the city's financial district had turned into night.

Phone and data services, especially wireless, were sporadic at best, leaving hundreds without any consistent means of communication with family and friends.

Many of my colleagues left our office and headed uptown, and I followed shortly after. My friends and I stopped at a bar on 50th Street, where dozens had regrouped and tried to find a safe place to go. My friend went upstairs to the women's bathroom, where she found a note claiming that suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden was "not finished." Police officers arrived in minutes and reported that similar messages were found across the city.

A shroud of silence filled the room. People looked at each other with blank expressions, their hopes ostensibly crushed by this short message.

We left soon after and made it to my friend's apartment on the Upper East Side, where I stayed until almost 8 p.m. At that point I hailed a cab and headed toward Penn Station. I arrived home around 8:45 p.m. and found my parents glued to the television.

The horrific events of the day had seemed so far way, but it wasn't until I was safe, away from the city, that reality set in. My father—who had finally left his office and joined hundreds on a mass exodus across the Brooklyn Bridge—was fielding phone calls from family and friends, some of whom brought bad news. A number of his friends and associates were in the towers when the planes struck, and at that point many were still missing.

When I awoke on Wednesday I began contacting my Bucknell friends. I was glad to hear that most of them had escaped the disaster, some only by a few minutes. I wish I could say the same for so many others.

I spent the day watching updates on various TV stations, staring at gruesomely destructive images, hoping that the hundreds of rescue workers on the scene would be able to rescue those who were still trapped under the rubble.

But, as the hours passed, my hopes dwindled. While I have no idea of the thoughts and emotions of those that had family and friends in the towers at the time of the attacks, I can only hope that they will find some comfort in this time of tragedy.

No one will ever walk across Manhattan with the comfort that they once did. The landscape changed forever in only a few hours, but not just in the city.

New York lost a monumental landmark. Washington showed its vulnerability. Families lost loved ones. And, perhaps worst of all, Americans across the country were driven to fear, unsure of what could follow, and what this tragedy will mean for our future.

American University in Washington, D.C.

After the initial shock of Tuesday's terrorist attacks passed, I was amazed to see the extraordinary concern and compassion among my fellow students an American University's Washington Semester Program in Washington, D.C.

Though our campus is several miles from the Pentagon, my initial reaction after receiving word of the attacks was a degree of fear—especially since there were reports of other hijacked planes still possibly flying over the city. But I was still on campus since my seminar was cancelled, so my concern was deeper for classmates who had internships in the downtown area or who were taking field trips to hear speakers there.

By the early afternoon, most people had returned to campus—many having to walk two hours because the Metro subway system was closed down—and the threat had diminished.

The next priority was trying to reach family and friends and let them know I was fine; this proved somewhat difficult and frustrating because the phone lines weren't working the first few hours after the attack. Many students from the Midwest and West Coast and international students had to calm frantic parents who weren't aware that our campus is several miles from the Pentagon.

Once family and friends were reached, most students gathered together and shared their experiences. Some talked about how they saw the smoke spreading into the downtown from the office windows at their internship, and were quickly evacuated—some working in government jobs even had CIA escorts out of their buildings.

The concern and togetherness my fellow students displayed was remarkable. People were going around to friends, making sure they were fine, listening to their emotional evacuation stories.

Everyone's doors were open, many watching the news broadcasts in large groups and discussing theories about the attacks and just thinking about ways to help. I had many friends go to hospitals hoping to donate blood, only to be told that there was an overload of donors and were asked to come back Wednesday.

There was a prayer service on campus followed by an open discussion on the tragedy. People just seemed to be going around asking, "What can I do to help?"

This terrible tragedy restored my faith in college communities and college students. I've witnessed a great degree of political consciousness and selfless concern and compassion among the students here—students who are drawn from 45 states and dozens of countries and have only known each other for two weeks.

From across the Hudson River, in Hoboken, N.J.

By Brett Tomlinson '99
Former Editor-in-Chief '98

Tuesday morning looked like a Saturday in Frank Sinatra Park, with Hoboken, N.J. residents quietly sitting on the curved concrete bleachers of the park's amphitheatre, as if waiting for a concert to start. But all eyes looked past the stage toward the eastern bank of the Hudson River, focusing on a tragic show miles in the distance, as the remains of the World Trade Center billowed a massive cloud of light gray smoke into the blue September sky.

Five blocks away at the Hoboken Terminal, emergency personnel saw the effects of the two plane collisions at the twin skyscrapers as they treated injured victims of the disaster on disembarking boats in the ferry docks. Ambulances from towns in Hudson, Union and Essex counties gathered on Hudson Place and River Street, leaving periodically with sirens screaming.

Residents like Renee Whitaker, an institutional equities trader who was in the World Financial Center when the World Trade Center was struck by the first of the two airplanes, gathered on the sidewalk behind police lines, trying to call loved ones with cellular phones but often failing to make connections.

Whitaker said a co-worker looking out the window was the first person to report the disaster to her. "She said 'that plane's not going to make it,'" Whitaker recalled. "Then I felt [the impact]. The whole building just shook."

As Whitaker relayed her traumatic story, crowds on Newark Street ran to River Street in response to shouts that the second Twin Tower had collapsed. She followed the crowd, and said, "Thank God I got out of there" as she gazed at the dust cloud on the horizon.

Whitaker said she saw 12 people jump from the burning skyscrapers as she fled to the ferry docks. She returned home to Hoboken less than an hour after the disaster.

Martin Egan, who also said he saw people either falling or jumping out of the buildings, was reading the newspaper on a World Financial Center-bound ferry when the first plane hit the north tower. "It sounded like a propeller and then a pop, like a firecracker," Egan said.

Ed Flynn and Brian Surdoval, co-workers on the 41st floor of the World Financial Center, left the building after the first plane crashed and stood outside a nearby restaurant when the second plane struck the south tower.

"Everybody was just in panic, in awe and bewildered," Flynn said. "We didn't know what was happening."

Surdoval said, "We were just standing there talking and you hear this big jet engine. You look out, you're watching this thing go, thinking there's no way it's going to hit ... looked like it turned sideways. Then the explosion hit and we just ran."

According to Officer Richard Koschig of the Hoboken Police, the PATH trains from New York to Hoboken were shut down shortly after the incident, but ferries continued to carry passengers to New Jersey. Koschig said tugboats and private crafts also were transporting people across the Hudson.

A steady stream of passengers slowly filed through the Hoboken Terminal in the late morning and early afternoon, looking dazed and solemn. Some carried towels or shirts, while others had handkerchiefs tied around their necks. A man walked with two young children, draped in blankets. White dust was visible on the clothing and shoes of several people.

Flynn and Surdoval joined scores of volunteers who supported the emergency medical personnel, delivering ice from nearby bars to the triage center near the train station.

Employees from local businesses left their offices and went toward the Hudson to get a view of the fractured skyline, and in the skies above, a pair of fighter jets patrolled the area.

Donald Fontana, a worker at a riverfront construction site, was on a coffee break when the first plane crashed into the Twin Towers. He said he tried to return to work, but he could not concentrate.

Some outraged residents at the train station hoped for quick American retaliation against whoever was responsible for the attack. "This is war," said John Schmidt, whose college friends worked in the World Trade Center.

Whether by design or by coincidence, this day, marked "9-11" on the calendar, generated an emergency that touched millions in the New York City area.

Back in Sinatra Park at 6:00 p.m., hundreds of people gathered to view the darkened dust in the distance. In the early afternoon, people discussed news reports over a continuous buzz of news radio, and two men even swam into the Hudson and treaded water to get a better view. But as the sun moved to the west, the buzz was replaced by a lull.

"It's eerie," said Patricia Stroebel, who came to the park because she was tired of watching television coverage of the event. Her friend Alethea Spanos agreed, noting the strange background noise of sirens, helicopters and church bells.

"I think this is a wake-up call that we're not invincible," Stroebel said. "It's hard to figure out what expression is appropriate. Silence is the best we can muster right now."

Field hockey advances to 3-2

4-3 overtime victory over Monmouth follows 4-3 overtime loss to Columbia

By Jen Giania
Staff Writer

With five solid games under its belt, the field hockey team is already setting the pace for a successful season. Although it has had its fair share of cancelled games, lightning delays and tough overtime matches, the team has come through fighting harder than ever.

Lauren Campbell '02 said, "I'm extremely excited about how we started off this season. This past weekend I think we really came together and played as a team with a lot of energy and confidence. We've got an amazing mix of girls, with ten seniors and ten freshmen, combining experience with a lot of new players, and I think that everyone is stepping up to fill their roles."

After a weekend of traveling to Columbia on Saturday and Monmouth on Sunday, the Bison came out with a winning record of 3-2. Both of these matches ended in a 15-minute overtime period.

In their fourth game of the season, the Bison managed to hold the Columbia Lions at a 3-3 tie by the end of the game.

Melissa Maher '02 is credited as having scored two goals, with assists from Lisa Bingaman '04. Veteran tri-captain Annie Hunsicker '02 scored the second goal of the game off an assist by fellow tri-captain Campbell. When the game went into overtime, the Bison were just unable to find the back of the goal. The Lions banked a final goal during this sudden-death period to end the match in a 4-3 score.

Melissa Maher '02 scored two goals in an overtime loss against Columbia.

After that heartbreaking game on Saturday, the Bison were determined to come out on top when they found themselves in the same position the very next day against Monmouth.

"Physically we were tired, but mentally and emotionally we wanted this win. We were not coming back to Bucknell with two losses on our record," said Hunsicker. Tri-captain Dena Ebert '02 was able to start off the momentum for the team with a pair of goals just two minutes apart to give the Bison the lead at 2-0. With 20 minutes left in play, Bingaman scored unassisted to bring the team back into the lead. Monmouth responded to these goals with three of its own. Finding themselves entangled in a 3-3 tie by the end of the game didn't discourage the team in the least. Hunsicker dug deep with eight minutes left in overtime to score the winning goal for the Bison.

Head Coach Heather Lewis said, "What Sunday showed me was this team has courage and an inner tenacity to meet any challenge put before them. Over the course of the weekend, we had so many players compete well as well as compete hard. Our scoring is spread out which makes it difficult for a team to key in on one or two players. The flexibility I have as a coach is wonderful."

The Bison have their biggest game of the year coming up this Saturday against former Patriot League victors Holy Cross at the mod fields at 12 noon.

Lewis said, "They're the defending Patriot League Champions and the team that we lost to in the tournament finals last year. I would expect this group to be highly energized and not lacking in any intensity or emotion. I would expect the game to be very entertaining to watch and fun to compete in."

Powell rushes for 69 yard TD in loss

By Cory Nadler
Staff Writer

Turnovers proved to be the difference in the Bucknell Bison's 38-17 opening loss to division 1-A Kent State University. "I feel we beat ourselves," said cornerback Reed Tunison '02.

The Bison received the opening kickoff and were unable to produce the points necessary. After a Bucknell punt, the Golden Flashes scored on their first play from scrimmage with a 44 yard touchdown run by David Alston. Both offenses were quiet for the remainder of the first quarter, although the Bison showed some ability to move the ball, simply an inability to convert drives into touchdowns.

To open the second quarter, Bison quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 threw the first of his two interceptions, one which would prove to be costly. On the ensuing drive Kent State quarterback, Joshua Cribbs, connected on a 28 yard touchdown pass to put the Golden Flashes up 14-0.

The Bison were able to answer back on the next drive. Running back Jabu Powell '02 finished off an 80 yard scoring drive with a 69 yard touchdown run to make the score 14-7. However, the Flashes answered on the following drive with a 44 yard touchdown pass by Cribbs.

The Bison were forced to punt on their next drive, but the Flashes fumbled the punt, and the Bison recovered the fumble in the Kent State red zone. Bucknell could not take advantage of their best field position of the day though. On the first and goal play, Powell fumbled the ball, and it was returned 89 yards for a touchdown by the Flashes. Kent State was able to tack on a field goal with nine seconds remaining in the half to give themselves a 31-7 lead going into half time.

On the first drive of the second half, the Bison defense showed that they should be able to fill the gaps left by the many seniors that graduated last year. Linebacker Vic Cole '04 came up with one of his team-leading seven tackles, stopping the Flashes on a fourth and one down. Bucknell moved the ball efficiently on the ensuing drive, going 45 yards in ten plays. Chris Lundberg '03 capped off the scoring drive with a 30 yard field goal.

Neither team moved the ball for the remainder of the third quarter, and the score remained 31-10 going into the final period of play. The Bison defense held yet again, but Tunison fumbled the Kent State punt on the Bucknell 10 yard line, and the Flashes recovered. On the following play Alston scampered 10 yards for his second score of the day, making the score 38-10.

The Bison scored on their final drive of the game. Wenrich connected with Jess Brinson '04 for a seven yard touchdown pass with only nine seconds remaining in the game, to make the final score 38-17 in favor of the Golden Flashes.

"I don't think we were overmatched," Head Coach Tom Gadd said. "We didn't play as well as we needed to play," he continued.

The Bison committed five turnovers, and this led to very good field position for Kent State. In many other aspects of the game Bucknell out played Kent State. The Bison had more total yards than the Flashes, as well as more first downs, better time of position and less penalties. The Bison offensive line also did not allow a sack in 51 pass attempts by Wenrich. "Besides the turnovers we played well," Powell said. "We are going to get those things fixed, and everything will be okay," he continued.

The turnovers definitely seemed to be the difference in the game. "They capitalized on our mistakes," Powell said.

"It was the first game, and we made some first game mistakes," Tunison added. Even though the Bison did not come out on the winning end of this game Gadd said, "I was not surprised by the game, and I was pleased with the effort."

Kent State was the first division 1-A opponent the Bison have faced since 1986. Gadd said, "This should give our players some confidence."

"Playing against an athletic team like this will help us for the rest of the season, even though our league schedule gets pretty tough," Powell added.

The Bison play in Ithaca, N.Y. on Saturday, Sept. 15 against Cornell University. Bucknell handed the Big Red a 38-15 loss last season. "Cornell will be ready for us," Gadd said, "they will probably play us harder physically than Kent State did."

Athletic construction continues on schedule

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

After the groundbreaking ceremony on Oct. 28, 2000, the construction of the new Bucknell athletic complex, designed by architect Ewing Cole Cherry Brott has been well underway.

Some new features to look for this year are the new natatorium that will have a 50 meter pool plus bulkheads with a four lane shallow end, a deep end 25 meters long and 25 yards wide with diving boards and platforms.

"Having the new pool will make scheduling practices much easier as we could conceivably have polo, swimming and diving all practicing together, though it would be kind of a stretch," said John Ziegler, Head Coach for the men's and women's water polo teams.

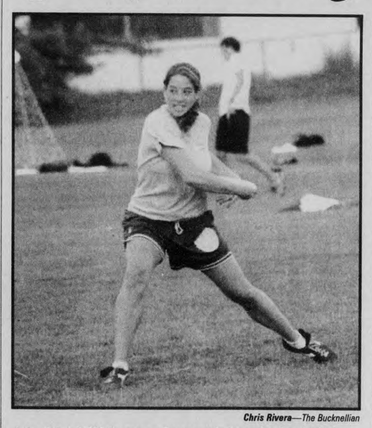
In addition to the new pool, there will be two new gymnasiums added to the complex. One will be a new varsity gym for men and women's basketball and women's volleyball games. The other gym, planned to be built where the old pool is now, will be used for recreational purposes and for team practices.

The old Davis Gym will be used for practices as well, making scheduling for these teams much easier.

As of now, construction is right on schedule, and is still expected to be finished for the fall of 2002.

Women's basketball player Katie Hettler '04 said, "I can't wait for the new gyms because practice will be at much more convenient times since we won't have to fight for gym space and time."

Women's ultimate frisbee quietly becoming a success



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian
Julie Gabrielli '02 focuses on her target before releasing the frisbee.

By Brian Klotz
Staff Writer

As the 2001—2002 school year begins, classes resume, organizations meet, and sports hit the fields. But for the women's ultimate frisbee club team, this is just another year. Another year of being kicked off practice fields by other teams, having a small team whose size dwindles over the course of the year, and making it to the national competition and having nobody know nor care. The women's ultimate frisbee team has a predicament that many of the club sports at Bucknell share, lack of recognition and lack of respect, but that is all about to change.

The women's ultimate frisbee club has its roots about 8 years back when it had its first complete team. However, according to the three captains Sara Gifford '02, Katy Kagle '02, and Debra Lowry '02, the team wasn't that competitive in its early days. "When we started, there were two veteran players and we never heard of it being that big," said Kagle. "Our freshman year is when we really got serious."

In 1998, when Kagle, Gifford and Lowry began playing, they had a large group to work with, and over the course of the ensuing years, the team learned to play together, to "know each other inside and out." During those times, the frisbee club team earned top places at numerous tournaments and competitions. First place finishes at the Chesapeake fall league championship, the Chesapeake invitational, the Lehigh tournament, and the Hightide tournament, a week-long competition over spring break in Savanah, Georgia, are just some of the highlights.

The most significant of the achievements which the team has under its belt, however, has been two consecutive trips to the national ultimate frisbee tournament, a first for both the team and Bucknell. The surprising part is that very few Bucknellians know of the women's ultimate frisbee team's success. In fact, many people who are involved with administration in club sports don't know either.

"Nothing comes my way saying when a good accomplishment takes place," said Nate Sorber '02, president of the Bucknell Student Government, which allocates funds to club sports. "I think it would be great though to get people in club sports on board to get word out on accomplishments."

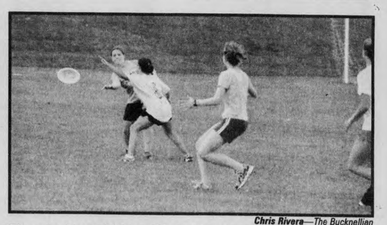
The first step towards improving the recreational sports program at Bucknell was the hiring of Joe Santorine as the new Coordinator of Recreational Services by the Athletic Department. This means great things for intramural and club sports. "The university is taking a very productive role by hiring me as the first full-time recreational professional the university has ever had," said Santorine. "I effectively become the 'clearinghouse' for club sports in that presidents of the clubs come to me to assist them in getting scheduling done, advice, etc."

Some of the other responsibilities that Santorine will have is getting information out on accomplishments and goings on in the 13 club sports, making sure fields are marked and available, and vastly improving the organization and rules governing the way club sports operate.

Assistant Dean of Students Kari Conrad communicated further Bucknell's commitment to improving opportunities for recreational sports. "There was a new field allocated this year to deal with the loss of space to the new residential building," said Conrad. "Are we still tight on space? Yes, but we are trying to respond."

Through Santorine's help and the new resources being allocated to club programs, some of the burden should be taken off of club athletes so that there can be more concentration on the important aspects of the sport: having fun. "There is only a certain level we can reach without more help," said Kagle.

"We all put in a lot of time," said Gifford. "To get ten girls to leave at the same time, pay tourney fees, get transportation, and be away all weekend is very difficult."



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian
Women's ultimate frisbee will be looking for a third consecutive trip to the national ultimate frisbee tournament this year.

This fall the team is already playing other teams from colleges and schools not in their division to get some playing time before the official season begins in the spring.

"We begin training in January indoors with strength and running workouts until practice can move outdoors," said co-Captain Debra Lowry. "Our first tourney is in February and we play through May, practicing every day to work on skills and strategies."

The captains expect good things out of the team this year, and with a new group of freshman who are getting involved, also look forward to some growth in the program. Their sites are set on another run at the national tournament in the Spring, and this year, the recreational sports department will make sure students hear about it.

Williams sisters square off in U.S. Open finals

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

It only lasted 69 minutes. The tennis match viewed by 23 million households was, in itself, nothing short of anticlimactic. Yet, despite its technical mediocrity, the 2001 U.S. Open women's final will not be soon forgotten.

We've seen the Niekros, the Giambis and Romulus and Remus. But as the era of the Williams sisters slides into the spotlight, sibling rivalry could be reaching its pinnacle.

It was the kind of match-up that traditionally sends the presses reeling, and in addition to its natural appeal, this event was steeped in subplots and historical significance.

When 21 year—old Venus Williams and 20 year—old Serena Williams took down Jennifer Capriati and Martina Hingis, respectively, in the semifinals on September 7th, the stage was officially set for the first sister-versus-sister Grand Slam singles final since 1884. One hundred seventeen years ago, Maud Watson put away her sister Lillian in the Wimbledon final, and the ensuing century would not see another such event materialize.

The Williams' were not unfamiliar with head-to-head competition; the two had faced each other six times, with four of those decisions going to the elder sister. But this time, the showdown would be in the spotlight event—the U.S. Open final which, incidentally, was making its primetime debut.

Also of note was the fact that the match would mark the first time in history that two black players faced each other in a Grand Slam singles final. Although the race card took a back seat to the sibling rivalry theme, its significance was not diminished. Among the many television viewers of the match was Althea Gibson who, in 1957, became the first black to win the Wimbledon singles title.

Courtesy Reuters Online

There were the usual rumors that the sisters would not have the heart to put their best efforts into defeating one another. Yet there was little question that Venus and Serena were each dead set on victory. Both came out swinging, but it was not long before Venus' more-refined nerves gave her a clear advantage. Through most of the match, Venus continued to pummel her little sister mercilessly. Her composure won the first set 6-2, and she continued in that manner through the second set. There was one wavering moment in the second set where the older sister appeared to be stricken with a sudden lapse of pity, as she double-faulted and then tanked two backhands to bring the second set to two-all. Venus got right back to business, and although there were a few tense moments in the set, it yielded the same result for her, and won her the U.S. Open title for the second straight year.

Errors were the story of the match, and Venus simply made fewer mistakes. Serena dealt up 36 unforced errors, while Venus harnessed her own mistakes to a more reasonable 19.

It was bittersweet for the winner - "I don't exactly feel like I've won," commented Venus after the victory. Certainly she would have been more jubilant had she faced a different opponent. "I'm the big sister," said Venus. "I take care of Serena."

Perhaps on Saturday she took care of her little sister a bit too much.

The result of the match will probably fade into irrelevancy, if it has not already. What will stand out is the tremendous class of these two young women, towards each other, towards their opponents, and even towards their detractors. The fact that they're only 19 and 21 years old makes it all the more impressive and legitimizes the assumption that the future is limitless for these two. After a match where style overshadowed substance, the tennis world has been left with a lot to look forward to in the future.

Men's soccer edges Robert Morris, 1-0

By Tara Utchl

A soccer player's worst nightmare is the sound of a soccer ball smacking off a goal post. Bucknell junior men's soccer player, Nick Taylor, was haunted by this nightmare Sept. 5 in Emmitsburg, Md.

Physical play, between the Bison and Mount St. Mary, led the game to a 0-0 tie at the end of regulation, forcing the match into overtime. Taylor got a shot off early in the first half of OT that nearly won the game for the Bison. Instead of hearing the swooshing of a net, however, the orange and blue cringed as they heard the pinging of the post. The Colonial's were able to capitalize on a free kick in front of the net with 5:09 left in the first overtime half to steal a win from the Bison. Bucknell was out shot 15-13 and goalkeeper, Steve Whitaker '04, tallied nine saves from the loss.

After their two-game losing streak on the road, the men's soccer team earned a big "W" in front of a home crowd this past Saturday. Assisted by Greg Buzzell '05 and Nick Taylor '03 , Michael Lookingland '05 rifled a shot past the Colonial's goalkeeper to net the first and only goal of the game. Lookingland's game winning goal was also the first of his college career. Buzzell also accrued his first assist and point wearing the orange and blue.

The young talent is stepping up to their new roles on the team, but one cannot forget about the veterans. Andy Aurand '02 made a significant presence on the field, after being sidelined by a torn meniscus in his knee.

During Saturday's game, however, Andy proved that knee surgery was not enough to alter his play. The senior captain continued to razzle and dazzle the crowd, from the outside mid-field position, with a few rocket shots off the post and cross bar. The 1-0 defeat over Robert Morris College moved the team's overall record to 1-2.

"It was good to win the home opener," Aurand said, "especially in front of such a great crowd." Bison fans cluttered the sidelines and packed the bleachers at the West Fields, which are located across Route 15.

The Bison will battle Holy Cross on home turf Saturday, Sept. 15th. Game is at 3 p.m. This match will be the first of seven Patriot League games, and it is crucial that the Bison earn the win. A 1-0 start in the league would put the team back on a winning track. "We are really focused on Holy Cross right now. Last year we sparked the season with a win against Holy Cross. This game will set the tone for the season," Tom Ryan '03 said.

Former Bucknellians take next step into minor leagues

Baseball. America's Pastime. A game won hurling a Rawlings' ball over the plate and swinging a Louisville Slugger bat to connect with that Rawlings' ball. A game which Bucknell has a rich tradition in. So it's no surprise to find out that some our own ballplayers are excelling at the next level of competition—the minor leagues.

Kevin McDowell, Eric Junge, and Russ Lindberg make up our contingent of dreamers turned ballplayers in the minor leagues.

McDowell, a junior pitcher hailing from Cheswick, Penn. was drafted by the Detroit Tigers in the 15th round of the 2001 Major League Baseball draft. A 'southpaw' that can throw in the mid 90's consistently was coveted by an organization that is looking to rebuild its pitching staff for the future. Last season Kevin was 2-5 with a 6.44 earned run average playing on Bucknell's Patriot League championship team. He owns a career record of 14-11, has fanned 145 batters, and was an All-Patriot League First Team selection in 1999. Currently he is pitching for the Oneonta Tigers, an affiliate of the Detroit Tigers in the New York-Penn League. McDowell has pitched 12.1 innings, and is 0-1 with a 1.46 ERA this season.

Coach Drew Depew said, "It's a real tribute to Kevin that he could come back from Tommy John surgery in 14 months and be drafted. Usually it takes 16-18 months to come back from that type of injury. He has a real live arm and a real good fastball."

Our second bison turned pro is Eric Junge. Junge was taken in the 11th round of the 1999 draft by the Los Angeles Dodgers. He is currently pitching for the AA Jacksonville Suns, an affiliate of the Los Angeles Dodgers. Junge leads his team with 10 wins (10-6), 129.2 innings pitched, and 88 strikeouts. He has started 21 games and has a 3.61 earned run average, showing his leadership and great potential to make it to the majors.

Last but not least is our most recent member to 'take it to the next level,' Russ Lindberg, who hails from Cleveland Heights, Ohio. Former first baseman for the Bison, Russ has recently signed on to play with the Florida Marlins affiliate in the Gulf Coast Rookie League. Lindberg has seen time in three games to this point, and is one-for-seven with a pair of RBIs and is looking strong in his initial take as a minor leaguer.

Lindberg led the Bison to the 2001 Patriot League title and a berth in the NCAA Regional with a .367 batting average. The 6,4" first baseman played in and started 48 games, and was an All-Patriot League First Team selection and a candidate for Patriot League Player of the Year honors. A solid athlete, Russ led the team and the conference in hits (61), home runs (9), RBIs (59), total bases (100), and sacrifice flies (6), and was among the top-five in four additional categories. His 59 RBIs rank as the fifth-best single-season total by any player in conference history. He closed out his collegiate career in style by slugging 4—5 against Miami, the number 1 team in the nation, at the NCAA Regional last season.

Being a five—tool ballplayer Lindberg was not just limited to making waves with the bat. Russ maintained a .991 fielding percentage with just four errors in 432 chances, setting the school single-season record for putouts (405).

Lindberg was also selected as a Verizon Academic All-American, becoming the 26th Bucknell baseball player to earn Academic All-America honors, and the 12th under current head coach Gene Depew.

Bucknell's baseball tradition is alive and well, as illustrated by our present "graduates" in the minor leagues. While McDowell, Junge and Lindberg may be playing on separate teams from here on out, each will be united under the fraternal brotherhood of Bucknell bison baseball.

Bucknell Athletics postponed over weekend, resume Tuesday

President Steffen Rogers announced early Thursday that all Bucknell athletic events through Sept. 16 have been cancelled or postponed. University participation in athletics will resume Tuesday, Sept. 22. No events have been assigned make-up dates as of yet.

Correction

The Bucknellian sports section apologizes for mistakenly referring to the 2001—2002 men's crew reclassification as a club sport. The correct term is club—varsity sport.

introduction of American University into the Patriot League.

Last year Bucknell struggled early but overcame their slow start. However, this year the team believes that it has the potential to compete all season long. "I think this is the best team I've played for in my career here," Walker said.

Nevertheless, it is too early too draw comparisons and talk about the distant Conference schedule. There is a lot of volleyball to be played, and the Bison know that they will have to continue their improvement if they want the success that they're capable of having this season.

"Eliminating unforced errors especially in serve and serve return will be an area of emphasis for us," Opalski said. "Statistically speaking we are where we need to be, but we still have a lot to work on."

The Bison open the Bucknell Invitational Tournament against St. John's on Sept. 14 at 8 p.m.

Busy NHL offseason has fans anticipating exciting October

By Rob Schmicker
Staff Writer

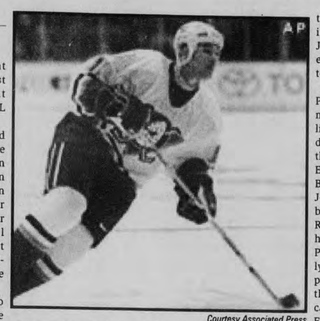
With the World Series right around the corner and football just underway, I can not help but thinking about the upcoming NHL season already.

Major free agent signings and blockbuster trades highlighted the NHL's most active offseason in years. This means that the season should be even more exciting than last year, which is refreshing for those of us who have to suffer cheering for horrible football teams. But the offseason wasn't great for everyone, as only a handful of teams took a dip in the free agent pool.

The team that did the most to help its Stanley Cup hopes is the defending champs, the Colorado Avalanche. While they did not sign any new faces, they made sure that the familiar ones were not going to leave town. Management dished out a handful of money to keep All-NHL First Teamers Rob Blake, Joe Sakic and Patrick Roy. The only casualty was Ray Bourque, who promptly retired after his emotional Stanley Cup victory. It took the Avalanche five years to make it back to the Stanley Cup Finals after their 1996 victory, but keeping their nucleus together will enable them to stay at the pinnacle for years to come.

Knowing that, the West's other powerhouse teams retooled in hopes of knocking the Avalanche out of the limelight. Detroit made headlines by trading for aging All-World goalie, Dominic Hasek. His arrival may only be a short-term solution as Hasek has one or two years left in him and has left backup Chris Osgood with a bitter taste in his mouth. On offense, the Wings signed snipers Brett Hull and Luc Robitaille, which should give them the most explosive offense in the league. But the loss of Martin Lapointe to Boston will hurt, as they will need to replace his "griminess" come playoff time.

The Stars saw Brett Hull leave town after a few tumultuous years, but made up for his loss by signing Valeri Kamensky, Pierre Turgeon and Donald Audette. Turgeon is a perennial All-Star and his departure left a big hole in St. Louis. The Blues quickly made up for his absence by trading for Doug Weight, who is one of the league's brightest young stars. They also traded Roman Turek to Calgary after a two-year collapse in the playoffs- Brent Johnson now is expected to lead this talented team to the Cup Finals.



Courtesy Associated Press

In the East, the Philadelphia Flyers' made the biggest headlines in their quest to dethrone New Jersey, the two-time defending Eastern Champs. GM Bobby Clarke resigned John LeClair, and then brought in Jeremy Roenick who was so happy to be out of Phoenix that he virtually did cartwheels at the press conference. But the Flyers best move came when they traded Eric Lindros to the Rangers for future stars Pavel Brendl, Jan Hlavac and Kim Johnsson. With the Lindros distraction out of the way, the team can focus on the greatest goal, the Stanley Cup. Meanwhile up the Turnpike, the Devils stood still, but a source close to the team expects a big trade to go down soon after the offseason has died down.

Across the Hudson, the Rangers are still in big trouble. GM Glen Sather was criticized for not signing any of the big free agents and was virtually forced into the Lindros trade. They are still spiraling downwards and may be worse than the Islanders this year who signed disgruntled free agents Alexei Yashin and Michael Peca in the offseason.

The biggest move of the summer was the Jaromir Jagr trade. The Pittsburgh Penguins sent Jaromir Jagr to the nation's capital for three untested NHLers. Obviously Washington made out in the deal, but it will be interesting to see if their defensive approach changes at all with Jagr on the same line as Adam Oates and Peter Bondra. As for the Penguins, only time will tell if the three youngsters will be able to match the production that they will miss.

The apparent theme of all the moves is that of the rich getting richer. Detroit, Colorado and Philadelphia all improved greatly, while teams like Edmonton ended up on the short end of the stick. That means that while we will have a great race towards the Stanley Cup again this year, it will be a race of only four to eight teams. So, while the regular season may be boring, the playoffs will more than make up for it.

Mussina just pitch away from perfect

By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

Twenty-seven up, 27 down, zero errors, no batters plunked in nine innings. Sounds impossible right? Close but not really. In all the years Major League Baseball has existed, there have been 15 official perfect games, the last one being thrown by David Cone on July 18, 1999 as the New York Yankees beat the Montreal Expos 6-0. There were also two other perfect games thrown prior to the year 1900 but those are not listed in the official record book.

Most pitchers who have throw perfect games are not widely known. In fact, save Cy Young of Boston, Kenny Rogers of Texas, David Wells and David Cone of the Yankees, Sandy Koufax of Los Angeles, and possibly Catfish Hunter of Oakland, most have fallen into baseball historical obscurity. Without mentioning the 1956 perfect game New York Yankee Don Larsen threw in the World Series, these are the 15 perfectionists in Major League Baseball regular season history. Not bad.

The feat is one of the rarest accomplishments that an athlete could achieve. The first perfect game in the American League history was thrown by Young. This happened May 5, 96 years ago. He retired all 27 Philadelphia Athletics batters that came to the plate as he pitched a 3-0 win.

That comes out to 15 perfect games in just about 96 years. That averages out to one perfect game every 6.4 years. Thirty teams, 162 games a year. That means that there are 4,860 chances every year for a perfect game to occur. In six years, there are 31,104 chances. One perfect game out of 31,104 chances.

This past week, New York Yankee right-hander Mike "Moose" Mussina flirted with a perfect game. In fact, he was one pitch away from the rare feat. One pitch. Pitching at Fenway Park against rival Boston Red Sox was what made this game all the more special. On Sunday, Sept. 2, Mussina was one strike away from a perfecto when Boston's Carl Everett ruined the occasion with a clean single. The Yankees ended up beating the Sox 1-0. Mussina dueled all night with Boston's Cone (yeah, ex-Yankee and last perfect game Cone) before the Yankees finally scored a run very late in the game to get the win. Mussina's game was a memorable one but it would have been a great one if he had completed the perfect game. Baseball's 16th perfect game was one pitch and one strike away from being born.

What makes the past few years stand out as far as perfect games are concerned is the fact that there were two perfect games on two consecutive years. And to add to that, they came from the same team, the Yankees. David Wells blanked the Minnesota Twins 6-0 in 1998 before Cone duplicated the feat a year later.

Mussina came close to adding perfect game number 16. Moose threw goose eggs across the board except for that "1" sitting under the "H" column on the scoreboard situated on The Green Monster. He just wishes he could get that 9th inning pitch back.

Mussina shouldn't feel as discouraged as he most likely is, because he did pitch an amazing game. Not perfect but amazing. Another reason why Mussina shouldn't worry too much about losing the perfecto is that there have been numerous pitchers throughout history who have come close as well.

One pitcher hits a batter here, a batter there, and the masterpiece is gone. Just like that. Or a teammate on the field boots a grounder here, a grounder there, or just throws a ball away. Just like that, an "E" is charged and one can say 'adios' to 'perfecto.'

If you think Mussina feels bad, listen to some of these stories about some oddities concerning a perfect game. These pitchers should feel worse than the Moose. They have to. Ready?

In the late '50s, Pittsburgh's Haddix threw 12 perfect innings before losing the game in the 13th inning. Ouch. What made it bad was how he lost the game. After 12 perfect innings, the opposing lead-off batter reached on an error before being sacrificed to second. Haddix then intentionally walked all-time home run leader Hank Aaron before giving up a home run to Joe Adcock. This is where it gets weirder, which makes it a little worse for Haddix. Adcock was only credited with a one-run double because he was called out for passing Hammerin' Hank on the basepaths. 1-0 loss. That's a tough one to swallow.

Another weird story in regards to a perfect game occurred in 1922. The Boston Braves' starter was Babe Ruth. The first batter of the opposing team reached base on a walk. Ruth thought it wasn't ball 4 so he slugged the home plate umpire after arguing it and got ejected from the game. The runner ended up getting caught trying to steal second base before Ruth's replacement, Ernie Shore, retired the next 26 batters of the ballgame. It isn't listed as a perfect game because Shore didn't start the game officially. Again, bad luck in Boston (an omen of things to come? ... The Curse of the Bambino?). Nah.

A third oddity involved Hooks Wiltse in 1908. He had two strikes on the last batter of the game, the pitcher, before plunking him with the third pitch to lose the perfect game. Yes, the pitcher. That has to sting. If there's any consolation, he ended up retiring the next batter to get a no-hitter.

Back to Mussina. It's safe to say a perfect game would have been a little better. Just a little....

NFL Predictions

Chris Perrella

Buffalo at Miami
Miami played excellent defense last week and looks to square off against a Buffalo team that scored six points against the Saints. Look for Rob Johnson to throw a couple of picks and the Bills defense to give up a lot of points as the Dolphins win this one handily.

Denver at Indianapolis
This looks to be the game of the week as two AFC powerhouses go head to head. Both teams have excellent defenses, but I believe this game should shape up to be a shootout.

Cleveland at Pittsburgh
Pittsburgh plays their first game at new Heinz Stadium against their long time rival Cleveland in a clash of offensive juggernauts. The Browns scored six points last week and the Steelers managed just one field goal. Pittsburgh should win this one easily as the Browns "expansion" label is not leaving anytime soon.

Arizona at Washington
The Cardinals are coming off a stellar bye week and should carry that momentum into their game against the Redskins. Washington is looking for their first win of the season after losing badly, to the Chargers. Essentially this game is for the cellar of the NFC East as both teams are looking to rebuild.

Minnesota at Baltimore
A high-powered offensive team faces the best defense in the NFL. This would have been a good game last year, but this year the Vikings managed to score a grand total of 16 points against the Panthers in a pathetic display of offensive talent. The Ravens might have had an offense this year if Jamal Lewis had not gotten hurt, so look for a low scoring, i.e. boring, game.

Tennessee over Cincinnati, Detroit over Dallas, New York Giants over Green Bay, Carolina over New England, Tampa Bay over Philadelphia, New Orleans over San Francisco, St. Louis over Atlanta, Chicago over Jacksonville, Seattle over Kansas City, Oakland over New York Jets.

Justin McCarthy

Miami at Buffalo
Miami is led by an unrespected QB, and the Bills' defense better be prepared for Fiedler, after allowing 17 points in just 12 minutes last Sunday. If Rob Johnson plays like he did last week the Bills are going to begin thinking that they made the wrong choice in keeping him over Flutie. Ultimately, the Dolphins will over power Buffalo on both sides of the ball.

Denver at Indianapolis
This is a match-up of two of the best offenses in the league, therefore the defenses may determine who wins this match-up. Indy has stronger leadership at the QB and RB. And the loss of WR Ed McCaffrey only limits Griese's options now. However, the fact that Davis will not be 100% for a couple weeks is not as detrimental as some would think, for with Rod Smith and Mike Anderson coming out of the back field after Davis defenses will be tired out by a punishing ground game. I want to see the Wishbone!

Arizona at Washington
Washington is full of disappointments and well Arizona is full of nobodies (on offense at least). Maybe Jake the Snake can salvage part of the season for the Cardinals, but it's not going to be this game. Basically, this game will be a competition for who will not be in the cellar of the NFC struggling with Dallas.

Cleveland at Pittsburgh
Pittsburgh has got to win their stadium opener, and I do not care how horrible Bettis did last week, he is sure to bounce back. The Steelers have many questions to answer most notably can Stewart regain his composure from years past when he was actually a threat to throw the ball, as well as run it. The young Browns will be no match for the emotional Steelers in this age-old rival taking place at brand new Heinz Field.

Minnesota at Baltimore
This match-up pits arguably the best defense against one of, if not the best offense in the NFL. The Ravens had doubters when second year RB Lewis went down for the season, especially with their inept passing game last year. The Ravens will need to rely more on the arm of Grbac, than on the legs of Terrell Davis. However, with their defense on the other side of the ball and the way the Vikings struggled on offense last week the Ravens should have no trouble in this game.

Tennessee over Cincinnati, Detroit over Dallas, New York over Green Bay, Carolina over New England, Tampa Bay over Philadelphia, New Orleans over San Francisco, St. Louis over Atlanta, Chicago over Jacksonville, Seattle over Kansas City, Oakland over New York Jets

Aaron DeRosa

Buffalo at Miami
Because Buffalos were wiped off the prairies over a century ago, and Dolphins are now protected so they do not wind up in our tuna fish sandwiches (thank the Lord for that); I'll have to pick Miami. This team has delighted me ever since Jim Carrey and Courtney Cox starred in "Ace Ventura," and my life has never been the same since.

Denver at Indianapolis
I like Denver because they're more balanced. But if the sum of the squares of any two sides of a football game equals the square of the hypotenuse, than this prediction sucks. I'll take my chances with the Broncos ... hey, it worked for OJ.

Cleveland at Pittsburgh
In the battle for last, I take Cleveland to lose because I like the color black better than brown. Anyone else notice that the Cleveland Browns wear orange? Why? If you're going to call them the "Browns," you might as well be consistent. Or maybe while picking the colors for the helmet, the guy forgot to check the crayon box to double check his work. Maybe that's what's wrong with the team, everyone's looking to pass to the guy in brown and all they see is orange and they have no idea what to do.

Arizona at Washington
The Cardinals take on the Redskins and I couldn't care any less. Do you? But for arguments sake, Washington.

Minnesota at Baltimore
Daunte Culpepper and Elvis Grbac need to star in a Wheaties commercial together. They are complete opposites. Bulky—scrawny. Strong arm —weak arm. Good—Elvis Grbac. Anyway, I'll pick Minnesota because Minnesota is closer to Canada, eh.

Tennessee over Cincinnati, Dallas over Detroit, Green Bay over New York Giants, Carolina over New England, Tampa Bay over Philadelphia, New Orleans over San Francisco, St. Louis over Atlanta, Jacksonville over Chicago, Seattle over Kansas City, New York Jets over Oakland

When the tie that Bonds becomes the knot that kills

Commentary

Aaron Derosa
Sports Editor

Mark this moment. September 14, 2001. Today is the day I officially jump on the bandwagon. Move over Tom Verducci, move over Bob Costas. Tell Ma, Pa, Cletus and the rest of the sports-loving world I'm on my way. I've been holding it off long enough, but it's finally time for me to sell out so I've grabbed my pitchfork and a bale full of hay and I'm ready to take a seat in the back of the "winners" bus.

There comes a time in everyone's life where they need to stop wishing upon a shooting star, or believing in the notion of tapping ones heels together for a miraculous awakening where everyone gets what they deserve. Steven Spielberg moved past his Peter Pan phase, so why can't I? How long did it take for Christopher Robin to finally ditch Pooh and Tigger for the cute brunette in gym class?

Well I've finally reached that moment, the crossroads. I no longer believe in the day where Jordan is not an NBA player, or the world where the Buffalo Bills will be anything but "not quite good enough," or where any New England team in any sport is good.

I no longer believe that the Red Sox can catch up to the Yankees, or that the Mets still have a shot at the division title. Instead, I will sound my trumpet with a resounding cry that I, Aaron DeRosa, sports aficionado and baseball connoisseur, stand up and declare my admiration and respect for two men: Roger Clemens and Barry Bonds.

What can I say, other than that these two men are the greatest men in baseball history. Forget Babe Ruth, Roger Maris or Cy Young. They all pale in comparison to the likes of two elderly go-getters who have stolen my heart like so many victories from their opponents.

Roger Clemens is the best man in the world and a true role-model. Sports Illustrated ran an article this past week which convinced me. Just look at him. He loves his kids and his wife, and on his off days flies his private jet to Texas to see them. Sure he makes sixteen million dollars a year, but he's going to see his wife and kids. You don't see Mark Redman doing that, do you? Who knows, he's not 19-1.

He's a fierce competitor who gets this fiery look in his eyes whenever he plays. Remember when he threw that broken bat shard at Mike Piazza in the World Series? Man, "The Rocket" was unstoppable. I haven't seen a competitive nature so strong since Mike Tyson, and HE was a role model.

And now he's 19-1. Who says that wins and losses mean nothing? They mean everything. Who cares that the Yankees are averaging 6.3 runs per game while he's on the mound... He's the guy who's pitching. I mean, he could have the worst ERA in baseball, anything under 6.3 for that matter, and the Yanks would still win it for him. So what that no other starter in baseball has an ERA over 6.3. He's the greatest pitcher ever.

And Barry Bonds? Well he's the best batter who ever lived. He's going to obliterate Mark McGwire's record. Did you see how easily he passed Roger Maris' record? He's dominant. And he was born under Lyndon B. Johnson's administration. He lived through disco AND techno. If we can't worship him for his slugging prowess, then at least we can bow to his ability to survive two horrible decades of music. I wonder if he ever sported an Afro or got to meet Joe Piscopo. He deserves to have met Joe Piscopo.

So how many does he have now, sixty three home runs? My friend once commented that Babe Ruth HAD to hit home runs because he was too fat and unhealthy to run around the base paths. I thought that was an interesting point and wondered whether Barry Bonds has to hit so many home runs because his ego is too large for him to turn around the bases without collapsing to one side. I've seen starving wildebeests more selfless than Barry Bonds. But then I remembered, I'm on the bandwagon and he's the greatest player alive.

When Bonds hit his 500th home run, only one person came out of the dugout to congratulate him; the bat girl. So what if his teammates don't like him, teammates don't matter in the long run. It's winning that counts, because after all, it's just a sport. It's not about the heart, it's about the "W."

Have you ever heard the expression "no man is an island?" Well Bonds is that exception to the rule, only he's not an island, he's a continent. He has a lifetime .417 on base percentage and has hit 557 home runs in 16 seasons.

He is the second coming of Christ. In fact, if Christ were to come back as a baseball player, he'd be worse than Bonds. Christ would be to Barry Bonds, what Sammy Sosa was to Mark McGwire; good, but not as good. He's the Diet Coke of Bonds, just one calorie, not Bonds enough.

Maybe I've gone too far. Perhaps I've jumped so high to reach the bandwagon that I've simply jumped over it. But at least I've finally given in. I'm on the bus now. Let the undeserved praise for these players wash over me like the floods of Gilgamesh.

Women's soccer remains undefeated; starts 3-0

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The women's soccer team huddles at halftime during a 3-2 win against Marist Sept. 5. Savannah Rennels notched a hat trick in the game.

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

With just over ten minutes remaining in the second overtime of Bucknell's home opener against Marist this past Sunday, senior tri-captain Ali Chandler lofted a shot from the top of the box over the outstretched arms of the opposing keeper. Chandler's exceptional shot gave the Bison a 2-1 win, and improved their record to 3-0 on the year.

Marist got on the board first, scoring with just over 18 minutes left in the first half. The Orange and Blue equalized with 28 minutes left in the contest thanks to an Emily Keber '03 shot into the left corner of the net from the right wing. The Bison poured it on offensively in this contest, outshooting Marist 35-10 but had difficulty beating the Red Foxes' goalkeeper, who recorded 17 saves. Kristie Simon '04 assisted on both goals and goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 made five saves in net.

"We were determined to set the tone in our home opener. We knew they posed a formidable challenge with three good defenders and a great goalie. We had to have good shots," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

"Lauren Schwarz ['03] had a real presence in this game on the field with her size. Also, Melissa Lawson ['03] has been playing a solid game for us defending, leading, and distributing over the past couple of games," Findlay said.

"The double overtime win was such a good win for our team. We dominated their half almost the entire game ... with so many close shots on goal ... when we didn't score in the first overtime, we were very wound up ... we came out the second period of overtime determined to walk off the field with a win," Purse said.

Last Wednesday the Bison traveled to St. Francis for a tough non-conference matchup in which they battled back from an early deficit to defeat the Red Flash, 3-2.

"The game was what we expected in regards to a predominantly defensive team. They have an exceptional player up top and thus play long ball and they have a strong goalkeeper," Findlay said.

Rennels notched a hat trick with 34:26 left in the game when she scored off a feed from Ashley Dincher '05. Rennels was voted the team's player of the week last week for her efforts.

"Savannah is a consummate goal scorer. She has become more comfortable understanding her role and she can score goals more consistently than any other player I've seen," Findlay said.

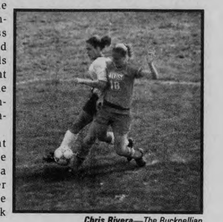
Purse had another solid performance in goal, making five saves.

"Our success against St. Francis was due to persistence. When they scored on us first, it only made us push harder as a team," Schwarz said.

While Findlay is happy with her team's undefeated start, she says there are still areas that can be improved.

"We are doing a good job of possessing the ball in the beginning of games but we need to work on finishing earlier in the game. We want to avoid an overtime because you never know what can happen," Findlay said.

The Bison continue their homestand with a non-conference matchup against Duquesne this Friday at 4 p.m.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The Bison will defend their 3-0 start against Duquesne this Friday at 4 p.m.

"We have gone into overtime the past two years with them and have been able to win. They are a hard-working physical team under a new head coach and they will be looking for revenge," Findlay said.

Volleyball optimistic despite 1-2 record

Defending Patriot League champs leave tournament pleased with progress

By Pat Evans
Staff Writer

On paper, the volleyball team's 1-2 record at this weekend's Virginia Commonwealth Tournament seems almost disappointing. But considering the strength of the opponents and the competitiveness of the matches, it becomes apparent that the defending Patriot League champions had a very productive outing.

The Bison picked up their only win of the weekend in the opening match against host of the tournament, Virginia Commonwealth 3-1 (23-30, 30-23, 30-18, 30-27). Powerhouse San Francisco proved not so easy, sweeping the Bison 3-0 (30-25, 30-18, 30-21). Bucknell came back strong, outscoring Elon overall, but falling 3-2 (30-28, 23-30, 22-30, 30-28, 15-13).

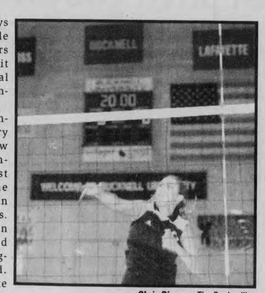
The most positive aspect of the tournament was that Virginia Commonwealth was one of the Bison's early season losses last year. The dominating win over the host this year is a good indication of where the team is headed.

Bucknell always loads its schedule with heavy hitters early on before it gets into its final Patriot League contests.

Head Coach Cindy Opalski is very pleased with how the team has improved from last year and become more competitive in these early matches. "The preseason should be dotted with big challenges," Opalski said. "If we can compete in these, we're going to be that much better in the end."

Shannon Walker '02, who was selected to the Virginia Commonwealth All-Tournament Team, feels the same about the path the Bison are taking. "I was disappointed that we didn't do better," Walker said. "But it's not Patriot League, so it's a good learning time right now."

Walker tallied 12 kills in the win against Virginia Commonwealth, and had 10 kills and just one error on 17 attempts in the San Francisco loss.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Volleyball opened the Virginia Commonwealth tournament with a win over host Virginia Commonwealth.

Whitney Williams '02 was once again consistent racking up 32 assists, 5 service aces and 9 digs in the opening match. Defensively, Brandi Trapasso '04 led the way, recording 12 and 14 digs in the San Francisco and Elon matches respectively.

An outstanding performance from Jackie Leahy '05 was another bright spot of the weekend. In the Virginia Commonwealth match, Leahy added 14 kills and ten digs to the winning effort. She again had a "double-double" in the Elon contest with a match-high 17 kills to go with 11 digs.

Leahy believes she owes her early success to her teammates. "The girls have helped me out a lot and are the reason that I've been able to adjust," she said.

Despite the losing record, the Bison remain confident. "The win against Virginia Commonwealth is an excellent barometer of our improvement as a team," Opalski said.

Bucknell will have to continue its efforts to fight hard in the opening of the season if it wants to take the Conference title again, especially with the

Bowen brings enthusiasm and experience to Provost/VPAA position

By Paul X. Benedetto
Staff Writer

The beginning of the semester marked a time of significant transition for the University's administration with the welcoming of Steve Bowen, provost and vice president for academic affairs. Bowen comes to the University after 23 years in higher education; he shares with the University the benefit of his experience and efforts to improve the quality of academic life.

According to Bowen, the provost and vice president is "the person who is responsible for the organization, oversight and leadership for all of the academic activities of the university." It is a demanding job, but Bowen feels that he is fully capable of meeting all of the challenges that await him.

"One of the things that attracted me to the University," Bowen said, "was the enthusiasm and commitment of the faculty and the fact that it is possible to be an active scholar, a very dedicated and effective teacher, a contributor to the University community and a sane person all at the same time."

He feels that a reasonably balanced academic life is not only possible but is already existent at the University.

"It is not a pressure to be a scholar, it's freedom to be a scholar," Bowen said. And it is this freedom and balance in the teaching and academic lives of the professors that create the well adjusted community of which Bowen speaks so highly.

His goal is to nurture this balance and to strengthen the relationship of students and faculty in the face persistent and ever-changing pressures. It is through his efforts to create a partnership between faculty and students that he hopes to have more contact with the student body. Bowen admits that he does not have as much interaction with the students as he would like because of the administrative nature of his job, but he is committed to changing that.

"I have to make a special point to get in contact with the students, so I go to the Bison for lunch and invite myself to student tables," Bowen said. "And I talk to students when I'm walking across campus or on the bench out in front of the Langone Center sometimes. I have certainly enjoyed the impromptu conversations I've had."

Bowen comes to the University after 23 years at Michigan Tech, Michigan's engineering school. He is enthusiastic about the University and finds Lewisburg beautiful, but says there is a lot of hustle and bustle here.

"Lewisburg by comparison to where I have come from is very crowded," Bowen said.

Located on the Keweenaw Peninsula, Michigan Tech is surrounded by mostly commercial, state and national forests. Some areas of the peninsula are inhabited by fewer than five people per square mile.

It was at Michigan Tech among the forest and aquatic life that Bowen started out as an assistant professor of biological sciences. With a background in aquatic ecology, Bowen studied fish populations in Africa, Venezuela and Argentina and spent a brief sabbatical at a federal research laboratory in Benicasin, Spain. It was also at Michigan Tech that Bowen recently demonstrated his leadership and ability to produce results by creating a new General Education curriculum for the university.

With a doctorate in zoology, years of teaching experience and overflowing enthusiasm, Bowen is more than qualified to meet the demands that await him. He assures us that "no one who has a vice president for academic affairs position would be qualified without having had lots of teaching experience."

Brenda Choy—The Bucknellian

Steve Bowen, the University's Provost and Vice President for Academic Affairs, has 23 years of experience in higher education.

Fortunately for the University, that is not a problem for Bowen.

"My aspiration is to strengthen the sense of community that lets the Bucknell education be so successful," Bowen said, promising to draw from his experience to achieve this goal.

According to University President Steffen Rogers, Bowen's experience already shows by the smooth transition he has made to the University.

"I have actually been amazed that he's picked up on the nuances of the University so quickly," Rogers said. "He's settled in and taken over the position much more quickly than I could have anticipated."

Rogers's remarked that Bowen distinguished himself so deftly on their preliminary meetings together with his pensive and collective demeanor. It was his "calm, thoughtful approach to answering questions" in the interview that Rogers remembers clearly.

"Steve doesn't rush into an answer, he thinks his way through it... I like that!" Rogers exclaimed. "My gut reaction was that we would fit together very well, that the chemistry was right, and so far that's panning out."

Bowen arrived in Lewisburg just this summer without having known anyone at the University prior to his arrival. But if that was ever an issue for him, he has certainly forgotten all about it by now. He described his interaction with the faculty as "delightful." He also seemed grateful for the support of his family. Bowen made the move to Lewisburg with his wife Nancy, three children, two cats and a Golden Retriever named Charlie.

In spite of his enthusiasm for being here at the University, if Bowen had to choose something he will miss from his life in Michigan, it would be the beautiful sailboat he and his family used to take out on lake Superior. He probably won't have much of a chance to miss it, though, considering the rigor and time demand of his new position.

"I used to have time for hobbies," Bowen said pensively and rather ironically. In his more carefree days, he was an avid sailor, hiker and woodworker (cabinetmaker). But he assures us that having less free time is not a negative aspect of the job. He looks on his work and the University's educational system as a challenge, yet very gratifying.

The day the US was hit

I recall years ago when I had asked my parents where they were when President John F. Kennedy, Jr. was assassinated in Dallas, Texas in 1963. Like it had happened only the day before, my parents easily remembered where they were, what they were doing, and their immediate reactions.

Without a doubt, I (along with everyone else) will always remember Tuesday, Sept. 11, 2001 and the enormous tragedies that took place in New York City and Washington, D.C. for the rest of my life.

Tuesday morning, I turned on my computer around 8:50 a.m. and immediately received an instant message from our news editor telling me that the World Trade Center had just been hit by a plane. Still half-asleep, I was in disbelief. I tried logging onto CNN.com, but to no avail, the network was busy. She urged me to turn on my TV. At first, my thoughts were, "A plane must have crashed into the World Trade Center by accident," considering two major NYC airports are across the East River. After rushing to the TV, I did take notice of the clear blue skies contrasting with the dark, black smoke billowing out of the top floors of the North Tower. Seemingly perfect weather for piloting an aircraft.

To my absolute amazement, my jaw and heart dropped when I watched a commercial airliner fly across the screen and blast into the South Tower—erupting into an enormous fireball that honestly looked like a Hollywood special effect.

This was far from fantasy.

While I cannot even begin to imagine the terror of the victims who were experiencing the terrorism first-hand, I was certainly feeling that gut-wrenching, chest-tightening feeling that President Rogers mentioned on Tuesday while my eyes were glued to the TV set.

The nightmare continued when the Pentagon was hit and an airplane crashed outside Pittsburgh, Pa. The news anchors were furiously reporting numerous alleged incidents—including events speculating that Capitol building and State Department buildings were subjected to car bomb explosions.

Throughout the whole ordeal, my fraternity brothers were coming into the room in a rush asking frantically, "What happened? What's going on?"

The Bucknell Bubble didn't shield students from the news of this catastrophe. Many of the students who left for their 9:30 a.m. classes weren't aware of the incident until other students arrived in class talking about the attacks. Several of my brothers arrived back to the fraternity house in a frantic rush asking, "What's the latest news?" The Bison was also supposedly packed with students sitting in awe watching the events unfold on the big-screen TV.

Watching the South Tower crumble to the ground was a sight that I know I will never forget. Moments beforehand, World Trade Center employees were jumping from astronomical heights out of windows to their death. The moment when the building began to tumble 110 stories to the ground left me with an absolutely empty feeling inside. I was rendered speechless. I lowered my eyes and began to imagine the scores of unfortunate souls trapped in the devastation. About 20 minutes later, we watched in horror as the second tower virtually imploded into the ground.

The terrorists had taken away the icon of American financial strength. They had struck the epitome of American military dominance. Our lives will never be the same again—our sense of security and safety within our shores has been damaged. Our children and the generations to follow will never understand the sense of security that we had taken for granted.

Throughout the rest of the day, University President Steffen Rogers offered words of condolence, displayed leadership and acted swiftly in time of the worst national crisis of our time. The Critical Response Team at the University responded immediately and effectively, setting up a crisis center in the Walls Lounge of the Langone Center and offering many religious and psychological resources for the students. A town-hall vigil was set for 6 p.m. on the Academic Quad for "mutual support."

Scenery in mind, it was a beautiful end to a tortuous day. The picturesque mountains to the west of the Susquehanna Valley blended with the colors of the setting sun provided an atmosphere of relaxation. The somber and quiet mood of the crowd created an aura of shock and disbelief.

Several University officials spoke to the campus crowd, including University President Steffen Rogers, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and University Chaplain Ian Oliver, among others. Oliver concluded with a prayer—with Bucknell uniting together to mutually support ourselves in the midst of this terrible tragedy and especially to support those who have lost a friend or family member.

Some say that this is our generation's Pearl Harbor—or that this is our generation's JFK Assassination. I don't think this tragedy can be "given" to a specific generation, because the event that we all experienced on Tuesday will reverberate for many, many generations to come. But I will say that I will never forget the emotions that were evoked on the eleventh of September, two thousand one.

The Bucknellian offers its condolences and heartfelt sympathies to members of the "Bucknell Family" who were affected by this terrible national tragedy.

Letters to the Editors

U.S. reaction to terror can't be more terror

To the Editor:

On the radio first thing this morning, I heard a young woman crying out in anguish and concern that her husband was among the victims at the World Trade Center Tuesday. She felt she should be scratching in the rubble for him: "What if he is dying and I can't hold his hand?" she agonized. "I just want to hold him!"

Then I received "a sharing" via e-mail from a friend (native of Pittsburgh) in Nicaragua, who extended compassion for her fellow survivors here in the States.

"It feels out of sorts to write to you from a third world country with its too-fresh history of war, earthquakes, hurricanes, and to feel safer here than in my own country. We feel as helpless here for you as you do for yourselves."

She also passed on reflections of a television film editor in Washington, D.C. as he headed for his studio early Wednesday:

"It's very quiet outside the house this morning, many people staying home ... I couldn't watch TV this morning—trying to hold off till I get to work ... seeing it come in like that—so many cameras — so many views—so many stories—it's emotional overload ... I'll deal with the images at work—I need to escape them at home."

He added, "Bush, Dick and Colon are back in town-God-[Just think] we gotta back 'em up—there are no Democrats or Republicans today—just Americans. Gonna be a busy day today." With reason he observed, "I fear Afganistan will soon be history."

LETTERS

These seemingly desperate reactions, agony, compassion, dread, are bound up together in their common humanity. Each express suffering in confronting realities of hate and perpetrated violence.

Each emanates from individuals with unique perspectives and their own responsibilities. Furthermore, each of these individuals embraces and vents the reality and pain of human helplessness before acts of terror.

Permit me to focus upon this sense of helplessness briefly. It appears to be one shared and common ground for everyone confronting acts of terror.

I believe that if we aspire to be agents against hate and violence, we must accept the reality of our helplessness in the face of acts of terror.

If we confront and accept that helplessness, then we can try to move beyond mer acknowledgment and endeavor to comfort victims (which means all of us) even as we struggle to become agents for taking away occasions for terror in our world.

I fear that our government and public representatives share one quality with all terrorists; that is a willingness to embrace, rather than confront, helplessness.

When a government declares "war" on terrorists—and "those who harbor them"—they deny their own words and deeds of terror. Many, if not most, Americans do not want the U.S. government to adopt terrorist practices, even in response to terrorism.

I believe that if we aspire to be agents against hate and violence, we must accept the reality of our helplessness in the face of acts of terror.

Nevertheless, government leaders may try to lend dignity to their acts of terror—and silence their critics—adopting a rhetoric of justice ad necessity.

In the name of forceful determination, they are in great danger or embracing and perpetuating the terror.

As part of efforts to purge ourselves of helplessness in the face of acts of terror, I think we must try to dissuade U.S. leaders from adopting terror in our names. We may fail, of course.

Yet, many of us share the television editor's dread that "Afganistan will soon be history." If that happens, then we will experience desolation again, as we reach out to the helplessness grief of a young Afghani widow scratching in the rubble for her spouse and crying out: "What if he is dying and I can't hold his hand? I just want to hold him!"

The late A. J. Muste, a sage 20th century American analyst, declared, "There is no way to peace. Peace is the way!"

We need to explore the truths of his observation in our political science classes, seek to realize them in our own lives, and urge them on policy makers.

Such efforts may fail. Nevertheless, healing lies in this direction—after we admit to our common humanity and helplessness in the face of terrorist acts.

Use of alcohol for charity inappropriate

To the Editor:

With all the coverage in the local media, and policy changes out of Dean Ferraro's office regarding binge drinking, the cynicism of the local booze merchants in sponsoring a "First Lewisburg Pub Crawl" boggles the mind. Too bad persons interested in supporting a children's hospital couldn't find a less health-affecting means of raising contributions ... like a special on tobacco products? Not unlike the pushers of other more tightly controlled substances of abuse, these folks are not interested in your welfare! They want your MONEY!

P.S. Kang Tchou: next time you want to interview "residents" on community issues, how about talking to some of the long-time property owners in what Judy Wagner (Rep, Ward III) calls the "war zone"; talk to folks who have endured decades of indignities from wave after wave of drunken disorderlies. More of the same, this community DOES NOT NEED.

Requirements of ADA are justified

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the article chronicling Assistant Professor Eric Faden's acquisition of the Campus Theater in the Sept. 7, 2001 edition of The Bucknellian. I congratulate him on embarking on this life changing experience. It is a shame that he does not feel those who permanently dwell in "ADA hell" are entitled to equal access to the Campus Theater.

Allow me to enlighten him regarding those individuals who depend on the Americans With Disabilities Act (ADA) in order to function as equal citizens of the United States.

In 1987, my father was rendered a paraplegic in a workplace shooting. Pardon me if I do not view the challenges he has faced as difficult as the basic guidelines that Professor Faden had to follow in meeting ADA requirements. If Professor Faden thinks he lost sleep complying with one of the more relevant laws the American government has enacted in a long time, try spending a week in a wheelchair or as a differently abled student at Bucknell.

Locking Horns

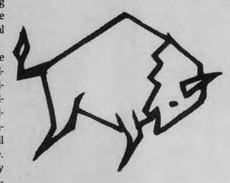
Should students be allowed to live downtown?

Yes

By Maren Johnson
Forum Editor

Four short years ago, my newfound friends and I nervously ventured into the yet uncharted territory of "downtown" here in Lewisburg. Downtown held all the mystery of friends gathering on porches and stoops, cable television any time and the freedom to make anything you wanted for dinner. None of us really had a clue where or what we would be in four years, but we knew that we wanted to be downtown—living in a place that we could call ours.

The spring of sophomore year came—my three friends and I signed the lease on our off-campus dream house and then parted ways to explore the world abroad our junior year; all the time postulating about returning to our beloved house to live together in the style of actual adults.



Recently it was imparted to me that future generations of Bucknellians may never have the opportunity to live this way. Each year, according to the letter sent out by the administration, the number of off-campus allowances is dwindling, until eventually there will be few to none. I was incensed that the University would so willingly take away this incredible and educational experience.

Sure I have to pay my own bills, make my own meals, clean my own bathroom and make sure the trash is out on Thursday, but guess what-so does the rest of the "real" world. I cannot think of a better way to prepare for the harsh realities just waiting for me after graduation than to live in an actual house owned by an actual landlord during my senior year.

My housemates and I have already confronted the temporary obstacles of who's responsible for the bills and what happens when the dirty dishes pile up. But we have also confronted the fact that once we emerge from "the bubble" these sorts of responsibilities are an essential tool for survival.

Living in a dorm for my entire college career would never have given me the opportunity to learn how to cook chicken. Living in the Gateway apartments or even the mods would not have prepared me for the electric bill.

If nothing else, there is a sense of community that arises from downtown living. In dorms you have a sense of affiliation with your hall or even your building, but when you live in an off-campus house you have the sense of affiliation with all who live there. You learn to respect your neighbors and your property. You realize the value of having a living space of your own.

By senior year, I feel that I have earned the privilege to spend my last precious moments living on my own with my closest friends. I feel ready to take on the responsibility of living in a house. I feel sorry for those students who risk the possibility of missing out on this unforgettable experience if Bucknell decides to naively overlook all of the benefits of off-campus living that I have put forth.

No

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Instead of reflexively rejecting any proposed limitation upon a perceived "right" (as we young adults so often do), we should calmly consider the costs and the benefits of such a policy.

The costs, while not to be ignored, do not appear prohibitive. The most substantial of these would probably be a mere principle— the very notion of student choice. All things considered, we consider more options (in housing, in eating, in recreation, etc) preferable to fewer choices. Fair enough.

But there are ways for Bucknell to minimize these costs. One way would be to phase out the off-campus living option over three years rather than scrapping it all at once; give current upperclassmen the option of living off-campus but not, say, incoming classes and freshmen. That way, no one loses an option that he'd ever had. The student forced to live on campus knows no other way of life and therefore is made no worse off. Lewisburg landlords would also have time to find new tenants and plan for the future. Don't worry, they'd get by just fine without us.

The benefits of such a policy are self-evident. Students would be less spread out, which makes Public Safety more effective. Like it or not, that makes us all better off. Plus, residents probably wouldn't hate us so much if we got our parties out of their backyards and our broken beer bottles away from their children's curious hands.

Further, it might just improve the overall collegiality and spirit of the campus as a whole. It's no secret that wealthier students, those with less financial aid, generally have an easier time paying the bills to off-campus houses than will a poorer student who needs the aid to cover the cost of his on-campus room and board. Perhaps putting everyone on-campus will erase some of this unnecessary segregation.

Same story with upperclassmen and underclassmen, Greeks and non-Greeks, athletes and non-athletes: Make 'em live together. Separating people spatially inevitably divides them socially.

Having all Bucknellians living on campus is a policy that deserves a long, hard look. If it ever comes up for serious discussion, hopefully students will be mature and realize that those in favor seek not to deny them of something, but to make Bucknell a better place to live.

Wrestling is a victim of archaic equity law

National gender equality law deprives innocent males of athletic opportunities

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Let me preface this commentary with a couple of important facts. First, I'm a freshman, which might mean that I don't know much on the subject. Second, I'm not an athlete. The extent of my daily exercise usually comes hiking uphill to classes.

The last wrestling I saw was probably a fistfight back in middle school, and I've never been exposed to the real thing.

The real thing-you know, the thing that countless athletes, many of them Bucknellians, have tried very hard to get really good at. That's right, the thing that had to be cut here.

I am not writing this article to attack the University for cutting the wrestling program. After reading last week's Bucknellian, I think President Rogers and the administration justified the decision as well as possible.

What I take issue with is the law that caused them to have to make that decision — that being Title IX, which is part of the Education Amendments to the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Title IX was conceived to pursue a very honorable goal-gender equity. Definitely, both sexes should have the same chance to compete in athletics. However, the one-size-fits-all dictate known as Title IX that was handed down from Washington 29 years ago isn't the way to go about it.

Richard Nixon and the Congress of 1972 didn't have a clue about how to properly govern the athletic policies of some little college in central Pennsylvania then, and their law is even more archaic now.

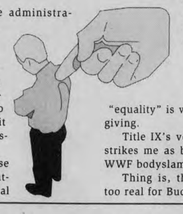
Should the mere fact that fewer women than men have chosen to compete in University sports mean that those "extra" men should be denied the opportunity to compete?

And to obey Title IX, it had to cut wrestling. Why? Because some cookie-cutter Congressional law from an age when bell bottoms were cool decreed it.

Is that "equity"? I don't think so.

Before and after the cut, the University still offered the same amount of athletic opportunities to women as it did to men. Are things more equal now that some of our male athletes have no outlet for the skills they have carefully honed over the years?

If the University were left to its own devices to find a way to ensure gender equity in athletics, surely there could be a better way.



Clearly, the administration had no choice—if it wanted to be able to accept federal funds, it had to obey Title IX. And to obey Title IX, it had to cut wrestling.

Why? Because some cookie-cutter Congressional law from an age when bell bottoms were cool decreed it. The bounds imposed by Title IX are too strict; their conception of "equality" is warped and unforgiving.

Title IX's version of equality strikes me as being as real as a WWF bodyslam.

Thing is, the problem is all too real for Bucknell's wrestlers.

Got somethin' on your mind?

University family comes together

By T. Patrick Halley III
Staff Writer

I love my Tuesdays. The convenience of the guidance counselor-free drop/add form leaves me with no classes until 2:30 in the afternoon, and a peaceful morning of deep slumber that I have grown to count on. Snuggled into my leopard print sheets Monday night, visions of Bucky the Bison dancing through my head, morning seemed so far away. If only it could have remained there.

Tuesday morning, Sept 11, the Bucknell Campus, much like the rest of this nation, was turned upside down. With horror, we helplessly watched the deadliest terrorist attack this world has known play out before our very eyes. The footage of The Pentagon ablaze, or Manhattan's marvelous Twin Towers collapsing into an abyss of gray soot, seemed like nothing more than a cheap action film.

To those of us who had visited these sights, awed by their magnitude and raw beauty, their destruction seemed surreal. But as the video clips continued to poor in, as the news anchors frantically fought for their words, as the rate of destruction began to rise, so too did the numbness. The hard, violent truth set in — that we had been hit.

The emotions we are left to cope with are as diverse as the people affected. There is an enraged anger, a personal offense taken to this blatant attack on what once seemed strong and permanent symbols of our American way. There is utter shock, at the complete disregard for human life by those behind this strike.

There is confusion, with so many questions left unanswered. We ask who, we ask how, and above all else, everyone of us asks why. There is a gut-wrenching concern for those of us with family or friends in the affected areas. There is guilt, perhaps shame concerning our own survival. There is a deep disparity, both at the incomprehensible present, and the grim future.

No one should be subjected to these aching feelings, let alone students — many of us mere kids entering our third week here. It is outright unfair — that we were dealt this emotional hand far beyond our years. Each of us very much on our own — home, and its network of support and love — seemed farther away than ever before. And suddenly, there it was.

An e-mail from President Steffen Rogers, then another. A knock on the door from an RA, offering an ear to speak to or a shoulder to cry on. A call from a hallmate, sending prayers and support. A hug on the quad from a teary-eyed stranger, or an instant message from a concerned professor. As the Bucknell Bubble became an impermeable membrane, with phones down and television inaccurate, the support we could not access on the outside was created inside.

With no hesitation, the administration, faculty, staff, and student body of this university banded together with genuine concern and compassion. Chairs were set on the quad for a student gathering. The Langone Center was immediately transformed into a round-the-clock counseling center. Masses and prayer services were scheduled, while practices and meeting were canceled. Ribbons were gathered and donned. Self-interest was disregarded, and the well being of this community — this family — was brought to the forefront.

By the time the afternoon news reports hit the airwaves, Bucknell University had responded to this national crisis. Not through any gross act of retaliation, nor through any attempt to provide answers beyond our reach.

We responded in the best way we know how — through care, support, love and community. In times of tragedy, as our emotions are sucked dry, we become more sensitive than ever before. You notice and appreciate that which you might otherwise take for granted. For me, I realized how truly blessed we are to be here.

As a first year student, the events of Tuesday brought with them an additional set of emotions — homesickness. I just learned to do my own laundry, and now I have to deal with this?! In the face of such inhumanity, of pain and suffering, I just wanted to hug my mom.

But here I was, in Lewisburg, Pa. on my own in a very adult situation. As the day drew on, though, I saw and I felt the Bucknell community around me. At a time when I just wanted to go home, it was so comforting to think I might already be there.

Downtown student battles with landlord

The unexpected differences in off campus living need attention of residents

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

Don't get me wrong, I love living off campus . No longer do I have to dangerously suspend my bed on cinder blocks just to make storage space or save all my quarters for laundry. I enjoy the luxury of soft toilet paper and the possibility of watching endless hours of cable television.

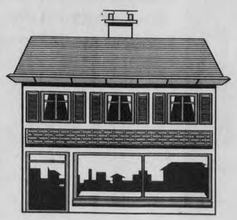
However, although I no longer have an RA to deal with, I now find myself in a constant battle with my landlord.

As a naive underclassman, I signed the lease to my house with my two best friends in March of my sophomore year. At the time, I did not find it the slightest bit strange that one must sign a lease over a year and half before one actually moves into a house.

Nor did I think it necessary to read all the fine print , which, had I read it, stated my first four months rent was due in total, three months before I even moved in. Any experienced renter would have realized this payment plan is rather atypical, considering most people pay rent month to month.

Having simply fallen in love with my house though, I easily overlooked these possible complications. As a result, I was hiking through Italy during my semester abroad on the due date of my rent and was charged extra fees for sending the check a mere one week late. Didn't my landlord understand that mail from Italy is rather slow?

In one house, the stair case to the top floor is actually, believe it or not, missing some stairs. They have had to hoist themselves up over a two foot gap!



Having now moved in, the battle continues. Our shower faucet, that dates back to about WWII, had been leaking all over the place. When the floor finally caved in and dripped water into the room below, it took our landlord three days to respond to our numerous pleading phone calls.

He then decided to fix the problem himself, turning off the water to the bathroom for a full day and night. Needless to say, it was no picnic having to drive to Larison just to use the toilet (and that abrasive toilet paper)!

Unfortunately, I've learned that my other off campus friends are facing similar struggles. In one house, the stair case to the top floor is actually, believe it or not, missing some stairs. They have had to hoist themselves up over a two foot gap!

Others returned to Bucknell to find their so-called professionally cleaned houses had probably only been sprayed with Febreez.

I understand that Bucknell students are probably not the most hospitable house guests. In the end though, we are paying rent and I find it absolutely ridiculous that some landlords overlook our complaints, simply because we are students.

My advice to those planning to live off campus is to memorize your lease, photocopy and mount it to your wall if you have to. Smile and put on all your charm when talking to your landlord, but by no means, compromise when you know you have paid good money.

Confusion and fear cloud markets after attack on financial center

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

Behind the massive loss of civilian life, the attacks that occurred on Tuesday may yet pose a threat to the United States and the rest of the world. The World Trade Center stood as one of the most prominent financial buildings in the world. Aside from housing the New York Board of Trade Market as well as the COMEX exchange, the buildings housed the offices of some of the largest financial institutions in the United States. So the question now is, "How bad will the financial markets get?"

If history is any indication, it will not be bad at all. The major U.S. markets will remained closed on Thursday, but will open for business on Monday at the latest. However, the Chicago markets will be open along with the market for treasuries. Experts are predicting a sharp sell-off when the markets open followed by a quick recovery as the initial shock and confusion wears off.

The recovery is also likely to be fueled by bargain hunters entering the marketplace. A longtime trader for financier George Soros believes this might actually assist the markets in a recovery. "I really hate to sound mercenary, but I have received many messages from traders who say that they think this will be a terrific opportunity to buy ... usually disasters provide the greatest times of opportunity."

After massive selling yesterday in the global markets, things began to stabilize on Wednesday as more information became available about the attacks and the effect on America. Banks across the world are moving quickly to inject cash into the markets for liquidity and stability.

Despite taking heavy losses yesterday, the dollar regained ground in the foreign exchange markets showing that investors are confident in the resiliency of the U.S. government. Central banks around the world signaled they would move towards intervention if selling of the dollar became unreasonabie. Funds also began to move heavily into U.S. government bonds as people looked for safety in a potentially uncertain market.

Domestically, the Federal Reserve reassured investors that it is capable of, and willing to, provide liquidity to those institutions in need. Perhaps the biggest impact will be felt through the insurance costs. Preliminary estimates suggest the costs to insurance companies could reach as high as $15 billion. This could put a significant strain on the insurance industry as the nation tries to rebuild itself.

Aside from the financial markets, the economy as a whole is at a turning point. Which direction the economy takes is largely up to the consumers.

Economist Anthony Chan says that consumers can "Roll over in a confused state and see this economy plunge into a recession, [or] continue to keep the economy going by doing their best to remain focused on their jobs and families while trying to maintain the same spending patterns that they were pursuing before disaster struck." Chan explained that following the second path would be the ultimate in display of economic defiance.

Financial experts and world leaders all agree that there is absolutely nothing wrong with the world financial system. Similarly, nothing has fundamentally changed in the U.S. economy other than confidence. Ultimately, it will be up to American consumers and investors whether the American economy and financial markets will display defiant resiliency, or whether they allow this monstrous act to impact our lives even further.

The Forgotten War

By Matthew Hension
Staff Writer

B&P Commentary

Over the past 18 years, some two million people have been killed in the African nation of Sudan, yet this genocide rarely makes the newspapers or the political world stage. The question is, why? The answer from America, for the past four presidential administrations and 18 Congresses, has been that Sudan has less political clout than other "hotspots," and so the United States does not have a compelling reason to do anything about it. Other nations have not taken a firm stand about this issue either. The United States and other countries have sanctions in place against Sudan, but these do not seem to be slowing the carnage.

The issues at hand are the attempts by Sudan's mostly Christian and animist south to break away from the Islamic north, and the south's accusations of genocide committed in the name of Islam, and the enslavement of those who do not convert. The United States and other nations have been giving aid to the official government in Khartoum, which then uses the money to continue to fight a war, instead of promoting peace or industry with this capital.

The new American administration, under Bush, has pledged to making peace in Sudan a priority, pledging some five million dollars to aid peace and sending some 40,000 tons of food to help avoid a continuance of a long famine in that nation. Those who are skeptical say that the United States and other nations are only becoming interested because of the oil that is stored under southern Sudan. Yet it is not only the United States that is guilty of negligence in this. The recent United Nations conference made no mention of the slavery being practiced in this country, bogged down by Arab-Israeli tensions which undermined the conference. Even had the United Nations accomplished all they had set out to, the specific subject of Sudanese slavery was not even on the docket, but only a general condemnation of slavery, which passed.

It becomes clear that the world community deigns only to dirty its hands with those issues that are either a great publicity maker, or aid companies that have interests in these hotspots. Sudan's civil war is only one example of this dereliction of assumed collective responsibility. Since the world community began to come together in the early part of the 20th century, time and again it has been shown that without pressing business interests, the world community will usually ignore problems at its back door. From the genocide of Armenians by Turkey in 1915, to the concentration camps of Germany in the 1930s, to the killing fields of Cambodia in the 1970s, the nations of the world have consistently shown that they will not step in to stop genocide unless motivated politically (through popular pressure) or economically (through business pressure). It is sad to note that our new world order of peace, justice, and cooperation amongst nations is such an obvious sham, dedicated to the proposition that all men are created puppets, on the strings on the hands of the powerful, who decide what gets done, no matter the consequences to those individuals whose lives are at stake.

By Meredith Atkinson
Staff Writer

In one of his first major acts as attorney general, John Ashcroft abandoned the government's plan to break up Microsoft. Instead, he chose the less aggressive legal approach of seeking court ordered changes to affect the way that Microsoft conducts business. In a statement released last Thursday, the Justice Department said it had taken these positions in an effort to "streamline the case with the goal of securing an effective remedy as quickly as possible."

By dropping the charges against Microsoft, the Bush administration has highlighted its belief that government is not authorized to play a decisive role in business affairs and that market forces should be the determining factor in how companies compete.

In the biggest concession made by the federal government since the case began, the Justice Department agreed to allow Microsoft to continue it's practice of 'bundling' or 'tying' new software to it's mohopoly product—the Windows operating system. Richard Schmalensee, a dean at M.I.T. and expert witness in the case agreed "this was fundamentally a tying case."

Bill Gates, the company's chairman and co-founder maintains, "There's been no interference from the lawsuit in terms of Microsoft pushing its innovation forward." Clearly, the company has not been deterred since it is preparing to launch a new operating system on October 25, 2001 that includes the kinds of features that have caused antitrust problems in the past. Windows XP, which integrates applications for processing digital pictures, instant messaging, video and audio players; in addition to bolting in the latest version of Microsoft's Internet Explorer, has the potential to create more antitrust issues than the pervious systems that initiated competitive lawsuits.

The attorney generals of Connecticut and Iowa, two of the states that joined the antitrust case against Microsoft in October 1997, have been among the most outspoken critics of Windows XP. In a demonstration of government unity, both stood by the Justice Department's decision.

Richard Blumenthal of Connecticut said, "This decision, while difficult, was driven by a realistic, clear-sighted view of the clock. The result needs to be right but prompt, and this course seems to be the best realistic strategy to secure a remedy that is timely, effective, and certain."

Instead of breaking the company up, the Justice Department will require Microsoft to put in effect the restrictions that the original trial judge, Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson, ordered in June 2000. The key remedies required by Judge Jackson were to prohibit Microsoft from punishing hardware and software companies working on competing products; to prevent Microsoft from favoring software developers and computer companies that helped the company exclude competitors; to require Microsoft to license Windows under uniform prices and terms; and to prohibit Microsoft's interference in the way the PC manufacturers set up startup screens—the Windows desktop, preferences, and Internet connection wizards.

Microsoft has not been vocal about the recent developments.

"We remain committed to resolving the remaining issues of the case" said spokesperson Vivek Varma in the company's only official statement. Varmek said that the Justice Department notified Microsoft of its decision and that both sides have been working together on a joint status report on the case which will be presented to a United States District Judge today.

Congress prepares for budget battle as revenues evaporate

Ailing economy causes Federal revenues to decline, White House administration may have to tap Social Security surplus

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

A national poll stressing that a majority of Americans are ambivalent about the $1.35 trillion tax cut has the White House wondering whether the tax cut will have the intended effect. Sixty-six percent of those asked believe that the economy is worsening, and 53 percent say the blame lies with President Bush. Fifty-seven percent support reducing the size and scope of last spring's tax cut. Many Republicans are concerned that the President has been too "hands off" during his first months in office, and it may cost them their seats in next year's election.

The President's Republican congressional allies are pushing tax reduction proposals in an attempt to get the economy back into a growth mode. Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) has renewed his efforts for a two-year cut in the capital gains tax rate from 20 percent to 15 percent. Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) agreed with the proposal as a part of a general economic stimulus package.

The political cost of non-action might be the endangerment of the Republican legislative agenda by prolonging the economic downturn. Pressures on the President to respond to the continuing stagnant economy will be difficult to ignore as unemployment increases and recession looms larger.

The President has previously been against a capital gains tax cut since it conflicted with his campaign attitude of "compassionate conservatism." There are signs that his views on the tax reduction to provide investment stimulus have changed.

The economy also has investment stimulus on the mind of at least one Democratic congressional member. Senator Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) stated he was willing to consider using the Social Security money to address the slowdown if Republicans were willing to scale back elements of last springs massive tax reduction.

Conrad's view is not shared by many in the Democratic camp, but may gain support in the future. Senate Majority Leader Thomas Daschle (D-S.D.) opposes the Republican stimulus package citing the fact that Bush opposed similar Democratic plans earlier in the year. Daschle emphasizes that it is up to the President to come up with a new stimulus proposal that leaves his presidential campaign pledge intact and Social Security untouched. The White House budget Director Mitchell Daniels warned congressional Republicans on Friday that it was likely the government was going to tap the Social Security surplus this year.

Now, with the President leaning towards the use of Social Security to fund economic stimulus, the nerves of Republican representatives hoping to retain their seats are rattled. Republican support reportedly slipped even before Friday's massive sell-off on Wall Street.

The effects of the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington have increased the difficulty of President Bush's job, and forced the budget into the back of the nation's thoughts. The leadership abilities of the President will be tested as never before in this pressure filled and volatile environment.

O.A.R. concert draws large crowd

By Chad Flood
Staff Writer

Of A Revolution (O.A.R.) hit Uptown last Friday in a popular and highly-anticipated concert.

While the majority of campus was involved in their fraternity and sorority events, independent and first-year students waited in line to be among the lucky 300 to witness the show. With a line stretching out the back entrance of Swartz, many students were left disappointed after not gaining admittance.

The University was the band's first stop on its first real tour. The members recently graduated from Ohio State University and decided to make music their current priority.

The music, which could be described as acoustic reggae or mellow ska, has spread across college campuses through downloads and shared compact discs. For this reason, the success of the band is slightly surprising to its members, according to saxophonist Jerry DePizzo.

The band mixed new material from their recent album, Risen, with classics from The Wanderer and Souls Aflame, putting on a great live performance for a crowd full of first-timers.

While many of the students were unsure of O.A.R.'s initial samplings, they stayed enthusiastic and became visibly excited when they recognized songs.

Well-known tunes like "Hey Girl," "City On Down" and "Night Shift" paved the way toward the crowd's acceptance of the lesser-heard songs.

The highlight of the night was the band's most popular tune, "That Was A Crazy Game of Poker," which spawned a huge sing along. The crowd then roared as Adam Jacob '03 joined the band on guitar.

Hopefully, the success of the concert will urge O.A.R. to return to the University in the near future.

"O" portrays Shakespeare classic in new setting

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

Modernizing Shakespeare is a dangerous task. Despite some successes, there is always fear (from both director and audience) that today's Shakespeare adaptations will end up like "Ten Things I Hate About You"—funny and charming, but so far removed from the original that one hardly recognizes that it is Shakespeare.

This is not the case, however, with the most recent Shakespeare modernization, Tim Blake Nelson's "O." This adaptation of "Othello," set in an elite private high school in South Carolina, takes the Bard's warriors and places them on the basketball court to play out the famous tale of jealousy, betrayal and treachery.

The basic plot follows "Othello" closely. In a prestigious school where basketball is king, point guard Odin James is the school hero, not to mention the only black student. Hugo, son of the basketball coach, is insanely jealous not only of Odin's popularity, but also of the respect and admiration the coach has for "O" (a nickname his fans bestowed upon him). Hugo sets out to destroy O with the help of Roger, an unpopular student with a crush on O's girlfriend Desi. Hugo's plan is to convince O that Desi has been unfaithful to him and is dating her best friend, Michael, O's beloved teammate, behind his back.

While the storyline mimics Shakespeare's original telling, the modern setting draws in new themes—including drug use, school violence and inter-racial dating—while maintaining the original themes of trust and reputation. What results is a powerful retelling that weighs heavily on the audience's hearts.

The cast of popular teen actors does an excellent job with a difficult story. Queen of modern Shakespeare adaptations Julia Stiles takes on the role of Desi, and despite her recent less-than-stellar performances ("Save the Last Dance"), she creates a believable character that the audience supports.

Mekhi Phifer's O is an interesting character as well. His status as the school's only black student is secondary to the movie's other issues, but is important in creating a sense of difference that, while inconsequential to other students, becomes important to O. Despite O's rage and his turn against Desi, his vulnerability and emotional weakness lead the viewer to feel sorry for him by the film's tragic end.

Most impressive by far is Josh Hartnett's Hugo, a diabolical character whose twisted mind simultaneously impresses and scares the audience. Hartnett portrays Hugo as a self-centered conniver but also as a wounded little boy, creating the most complex and well-developed character in the movie. One hates him for his actions, yet some small part recognizes jealousy and empathizes with his emotions.

The movie's release was postponed for over a year because of graphic violent scenes reminiscent of the Columbine tragedy. It retains Shakespeare's original sense of tragedy, while it does not glorify violence, minimize emotions or simplify the dramatic themes. The audience experiences emotional ups and downs along with the characters and will not leave the theater unmoved. This is not the movie to see in order to be entertained and amused. It is the movie to see if you want to think and feel.

Kellner, born to Holocaust survivors in Czechoslovakia, captures the horrors of the Holocaust in gigantic silver prints. The fragmented pieces of the collages are meant to represent the destruction of the Jews by the Nazis.

The sobering pieces reflect on unjustified and senseless death. Two focal points of the collection were works entitled "Family History" and "Family History II." Both collages juxtapose happy family moments with the terrifying reality of the Holocaust.

"Family History" is bordered by family photographs while the center is dominated by a cold photograph of barbed wire fencing.

"Family History II" is also bordered by family photographs. The people depicted in these photographs range from glamorous women to innocent toddlers; from young, happy couples to the elderly. In the middle of this collage are tombstones written in Hebrew and a single photo of burning papers.

Another captivating display entitled "Eye Witness," is a collection of 55 stone-shaped portraits of eyes. The shapes are actually emulsions, or coatings, on handmade paper. It is a disturbing display featuring surprised eyes, angry eyes and frightened eyes. The emotion shown in the eyes transcends race, age and gender. It truly is a peek into the "windows of the soul."

Particularly interesting are two handmade books entitled "50 Years of Silence." The books are built around sculptures of arms, which are life size copies of Kellner's parents' forearms and tattooed by prison numbers. The text contains moving reflections of her parents when they were in concentration camps.

Though the collection is grim and troubling, Kellner's works are thought provoking and worth a visit to the art gallery.

Bucknell Dance Company plans fall events

Guest performers enhance schedule

By Melissa Farrar
Staff Writer

The Bucknell Dance Company invites the University community to take part in the exciting events it has planned for the fall season.

The Company welcomes the return of Dance Director Er-Dong Hu after a yearlong sabbatical in China, where he researched Chinese forms of dance.

The Associate Professor of Dance, Danna Frangione, also spent time abroad this past summer as a commissioned choreographer in Taiwan.

With both professors incorporating their research and foreign experience into the dance curriculum, the program now offers more than ever.

The campus community is urged to participate, whether by taking classes or attending upcoming performances.

In the coming months, a number of accomplished guest artists will be on campus offering master classes that will be open to the public.

African dancer Olabamidele Husbands visits Sept. 11-13, Fred Darsow teaches Flamenco Fusion from Nov. 4-7, and Patricia Hoffbauer of Brazilian Dance Theatre arrives on Nov. 12.

In addition, the world-renowned Guangdong Dance Company will be visiting the University to perform at the Weis Center on Oct. 26. This talented group of artists provides the audience with a breathtaking glimpse of elegant, traditional Chinese dance, fused with innovative contemporary style.

The Bucknell Dance Company encourages everyone to attend their performance on Dec. 7 and 8 in the Harvey Powers Theatre.

This event will feature choreography by the talented faculty and students, in addition to works by visiting choreographers David Berkey and Penny Askew.

A variety of dance styles will be showcased by a dedicated group of auditioned University students.

With all of the entertaining events that will occur here this fall, the campus community should take advantage of the dance programs the University offers.

"Gutter Ball" auditions coming up

By Krista Reisdorf
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The Department of Theatre and Dance will hold auditions for the new musical-comedy "Gutter Balls" on Sunday, Sept. 16, 4-6 p.m. and Monday, Sept. 17, 6-8 p.m. in the basement of the Weis Center, in the Choral Rehearsal Room.

Professor Jackie Krull, a Bucknell graduate, wrote "Gutter Balls" and will direct the ensemble piece, needing approximately 18 actors/singers. During the rehearsal period, the company will help develop the script and the music to create a unique performance.

Krull describes the musical as a "lighthearted look at love and life that takes place in a bowling alley, along the lines of 'Grease.'"

Students who are interested should prepare two contrasting songs, 16 bars each. Callbacks are Tuesday, Sept. 18, 6:30-8:30 p.m. in the same location. Rehearsals are Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and the performances are Nov. 30 through Dec. 2.

For more information, contact Krull at jkrull@bucknell.edu or at 570-389-8206.

Lewisburg House Tour

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Contributing Writer

For those who enjoy the picturesque setting of Lewisburg, Saturday, Sept. 29, will be a chance to learn more about the architecture and history behind the houses that contribute to this image. From 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. six houses and two churches will be open to visitors.

The houses vary greatly in age and features. The Thorton home on University Avenue, located near the Bull Run Inn, was built in the 1860s. It is furnished in the country cottage style.

The Albright home, a three-story farmhouse that has been recently renovated, has the added bonus of containing many interesting displays. Visitors can enjoy artwork, china, crockery, stained glass, and other artifacts.

The Hedding-McAllister house also provides another very enjoyable tour for those interested in collectables. The house itself was also constructed in the 1860s.

The Lutheran Parsonage and Christ Lutheran Church are both open to visitors on Saturday. Both have been extensively remodeled recently. The Parsonage has a collection of clocks. In addition, outside visitors can enjoy the collection of birdhouses. This tour will feature light refreshments served by members of the Lutheran congregation.

The two final and more contemporary structures on the tour are located in Wyndham Hills. The Velayo home, which is less than five years old, is built in the Mediterranian style with vaulted ceilings.

Florence Pyle, who helps organize the event, explained why the house tour includes such a diverse range of houses.

"We find that the mixture of historical and contemporary appeals to a larger group of people. Many people enjoy looking at interesting collections and what others have done with their collections; while still other visitors are more interested in the contemporary houses to examine new architecture and maybe get ideas for their own homes," Pyle said.

The other major attraction of the Lewisburg house tour is the architectural walk that takes place at the same time. This year, the walk will highlight historic features of the houses along North Second and North Third Streets.

Tickets that include both the architectural walk and the houses will cost $10 and can be bought at many of the shops on Market Street. Tickets will also be sold during Parent's weekend registration and on the day of the tour beginning at 9:30 a.m. at the Union County Court House and the Lewisburg Hotel.

The house tours and architectural walk add another interesting event to the many activities of parent's weekend.

The sunset experience on the Quad

By Sadeleine Connor

The Academic Quad serves as one of the best vantage positions on campus to witness beautiful sunsets.

The legend goes that if you watch the sunset with your significant other on the middle bench on the Academic Quad, that will be the person you will spend the rest of your life with.

Another Bucknell legend says that the school's colors of Orange and Blue came from the western sky at sunset.

I don't remember what day it was when I first went to see that orange disk setting in the sky. I do, however, remember the feeling that stirred in me as the blue was swept into a current of warm colors, expanding from the horizon to the zenith.

From the Quad overlook, the western sky opens into the distant mountains. On a clear day, distinct trees are visible at a distance of twelve miles, each backlit by the setting sun. The peacefulness that consumed me was something I cannot replicate through any other means of relaxation.

Dangling my legs from the roof of Freas Hall, I became conscious that the sun always sets, everyday, whether anyone sees it or not. It was a revealing moment for me, the realization that everything continues, including this cycle of setting suns.

I soon started to wait for nights when the sun would be as bright, as large and as beautiful as that first night. I gauged the weather throughout the day, planned my dinners around the sunset—estimating the time and quality of the sunset.

After adjusting to my revelation, I began to look around me. Has that person over there ever seen a Bucknell sunset? If so, where do they sit? What do they do, think, act and say?

I watched the people on the Quad—some were working, some were holding hands and some were just enveloped in their own thoughts. Some had brought cameras, some were consuming dinner and some just had their eyes fixed straight ahead waiting for that last glimpse of light peaking above the furthest mountain.

Eventually I purchased a camera and brought it to the quad. I tried my best to capture the beauty unfolding before me. Where does one stand when photographing the entire dusk sky? At what angle, including what landscape? The possibilities were countless and the photos were piling up.

I was in a frenzy, taking numerous photos at a time—hoping that one would capture the feelings I had for the sky.

There came a night, just after class, when I put my camera down. No pictures were to be taken except the ones captured in my mind.

Clouds had spread across the sky like an enormous quilt. Behind the clowds was that western sun, trying its best to shine through and make its presence. The colors raged amongst the clouds—contrasting against each other, and the dark hills below. As the sun dropped lower and lower, hovering over that western horizon, the colors shifted into bolder hues-illuminating the campus in an eerie light.

Now I often go out to see the sunset. I still swing my legs from the roof, I still take my camera once in a while and I watch. New people stop by, seeing that sun for the first time from the Quad. Others must be taking their last look, at least from this little perch.

I'm comforted that once we stop, that disk will still be setting, creating its magic for everyone and no one.

Brewers Caffe a treat in the Susquehanna Valley Mall

By Katy Zachry
Contributing Writer

The next time you are at the Susquehanna Valley Mall and find yourself looking for lunch, craving a quick snack, or needing a refreshing drink, Brewers Caffè is the place to go.

This sandwich bar/coffee shop not only offers a plethora of tasty and affordable items, but it provides an atmosphere so appealing that customers can sit and relax among the pleasant surroundings while enjoying their meal.

Upon walking through the double doors, you are immediately immersed in an upscale deli with timely coffee, tea, and soft drink advertisements adorning the walls. Its setup resembles a Starbuck's Coffee establishment, with one counter devoted to ordering and another for pick-up. Pastries and gourmet items surround both counters, much like a coffee shop, and there are seasonal decorations and area school memorabilia scattered throughout.

"One of the first things I noticed about Brewers Caffè was its inviting atmosphere," said Brandi Herman, '02. "It was difficult to pass by without at least stopping to look inside."

Located between Boscov's and Trade Secret, Brewers Caffè has as charming an exterior as interior. Its facade includes four open window panels that allow customers to people-watch as well as encourage passers-by to get a taste of what they are missing. Not only are mall shoppers easily enticed by the aroma of coffee and fresh ingredients emanating from Brewers, but also they are usually intrigued by the shop's colorful display of specialty items.

Owner and manager, Debbie Rozyckie, operates a basket business as well and provides the restaurant with an assortment of professional gift baskets.

"Debbie specially makes the gift baskets for the store, and they are really popular during the holidays," explained Devon, one of thirteen café employees.

The baskets are filled with gourmet coffee, hot chocolate, flavored syrups, and more. Coffee candies, chocolate-covered coffee spoons, mugs, coffee pots, and aprons, with attractive coffee patterns, are just some of the other items able to be purchased for reasonable prices.

Devon has worked at Brewers Caffè for over a year, and insists that there is always a steady stream of customers. Another employee, Lyndsey, concurs with this observation, and feels that café is inviting to all people.

"It's usually all kinds," she says. "We get mostly mall employees, older couples, and some college students during the day, but we really get many different people."

Sara Pryor, '02, visited Brewers Caffè earlier this year. "It was really crowded when I was there," she explained. "They have a really large menu, and it's very affordably priced. The food was really good so it was worth it."

From mothers and daughters enjoying time together over coffee to large families looking for a selection of sandwiches to quell many appetites, Brewers Caffè has something for everyone. Its impressive and affordable menu, no item is priced over five dollars, offers not only delicious and affordable deli-style hot and cold sandwiches and wraps, but an impressive menu of salads and soup is also available.

Because salad platters such as the Grilled Orleans (Cajun chicken, bacon, cheddar cheese, tomatoes, cucumbers on mixed greens and tossed with honey mustard) and the Deli Salad (greens, fresh veggies, turkey, ham, Swiss cheese, and American cheese) sound tasty, it is difficult to make a selection with almost fifty specialty wraps, subs, and sandwiches offered as well. Also, each sandwich item is accompanied by a bag of your choice of chips or pretzels.

In addition to its deli section, Brewers offers Italian soda, specialty coffee, tea, soft drinks, fruit juices, and much more.

Every morning from 9 a.m. to 11 a.m., they offer a breakfast menu consisting of breakfast sandwiches, fresh bagels, waffles, and pastries.

After trying the Melrose Wrap (grilled chicken, honey mustard, provolone cheese, lettuce, tomato, and onion), one of the most popular items on the menu, Herman was extremely impressed by the quality of the food and service.

"Based on the service, the atmosphere, and the delicious food, I can see a lot of University students coming out to the mall just to eat at Brewers Caffè," Herman said.

The eatery's convenient hours are from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. Monday through Saturday and from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Sunday. Whether you are at the mall or on campus craving a delicious deli sandwich or gourmet coffee for an affordable price, Brewers Caffè is worth the trip.

Heim brings a new attitude to Uptown

By Katie Heise
Contributing Writer

In a year of transition, many are looking to Uptown, the University's only on-campus club, as a prime example of the changing dynamics of student life. First-year students and upperclassmen alike have expressed favorable opinions regarding the revamp of the club's atmosphere and its increasing role in the nightlife of the University. Who is the mastermind behind the extended hours, availability for rental, and expanded selection of popular music? None other than Tasha Heim, Uptown's new manager.

Heim, who graduated Magna Cum Laude from Indiana University of Pennsylvania in 2000, is no stranger to the college scene. Though her degree in communications media certainly helped to pave the way to her current position, Heim cites her experience in student affairs as the main factor in making her the right person for the job.

While attending IUP, she held various positions on the campus programming board, including Films Chair and Executive Chair and served as an intern in the Office of Student Activities and Organizations. In this last capacity, Heim had the exciting opportunity to work directly with booking and planning performances by such artists and groups as the Indigo Girls, Tori Amos, Dave Matthews Band, Kenny Rogers, and the Beach Boys.

After a year of working in jewelry sales, Heim responded to a newspaper advertisement and applied for the Uptown position. She was attracted to the chance of becoming directly involved in university life again. It was undoubtedly a good decision, both for Heim and for the University.

"I'm not sure ... that I ever expected to be in this position, but I was confident enough to go for it, and I'm so thrilled that I did ... I can't even begin to explain how gratifying it has been to work for the University. I have never known a place where people—students, faculty, and administration—are so willing to just talk, throw around ideas, and make things happen. It is the ultimate freedom to be able to work in such a welcoming environment," Heim said.

Heim's responsibilities—hiring and training staff, generating publicity, and scheduling events—are numerous, but she maintains a focus on serving the campus community, on shaping Uptown to meet the needs of the students. "Uptown is an excellent example of the power of students," she explained. "It was created by students, it is run by students, and the changes are a result of student suggestion," Heim said.

She further emphasizes that the administration of the club is not a one-person show. Both the Uptown Committee, chaired by Bill Anderson '04, and the CAP Center support staff—Dean Conrad, Carolyn Strickland, Kathy Arnett and Ginnie Moore—have been invaluable to Heim as she begins to implement the changes requested by students through surveys and meetings last spring.

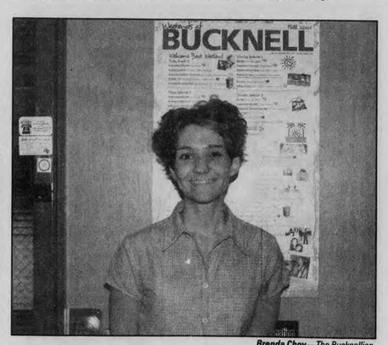
For Heim, the most difficult aspect of her new job is the late hours. A self-proclaimed morning person, she said, "In only a year, I have forgotten what it feels like to pull all-nighters or to just be up late, hanging out and talking to people."

However, Heim wouldn't trade it for the world. She enjoys connecting with students and coming to know all the diverse faces of the University. Rather than being "star-struck" at meeting bands, she is much more interested in talking to the patrons at the shows.

"I have had great conversations with many students and am amazed at the willingness of people to converse and ask questions," Heim said, praising the University community.

Heim, unsatisfied with resting on the laurels of several successful weeks, is dedicated to the continuous improvement of Uptown and urges anyone with ideas regarding the club to approach her in person, by phone, or by e-mail.

Heim hopes that Uptown's new weeknight hours will increase visibility and attendance to record levels. She advises students to simply "come and experience" the club on several occasions. With events ranging from DJ music to pool tournaments, Latin Dance Night to performances by punk rock bands, Uptown is sure to offer something for everyone. And on any given night, Uptown offers an opportunity to meet new people and enjoy refreshments and free entertainment.



Brenda Choy—The Bucknellian

Tasha Heim, new manager at Uptown, has a new vision for the club.

Ultimately, the Uptown staff aims to provide, in the words of Heim, "an exciting and safe environment where students can go if they want to dance, watch a band, play pool, eat or study," a hangout as versatile as the 7th Street Cafe.

"I believe that Uptown is dynamic; as with any successful club, it will continue to change and grow to fit the demands and needs of its patrons," said Heim. "I would love ... to continue to broaden the concept of a traditional club until the students are 100 percent comfortable with Uptown being 'theirs'."

University grieves and grows stronger

By Andrew Burr
Sports Editor

Ten days ago, the most severe attempt on freedom in more than 50 years was executed on American soil. In the wake of the disaster, the resolve of societies around the nation and the world was dared to crumble amidst anger, confusion and sorrow.

Confronted with that challenge, members of the University community have rallied alongside one another and stood brazenly in the face of terror.

"The response has been amazing," University President Steffen Rogers said. "This is an intensely personal community and the magnitude of the tragedy has amplified the Bucknell family."

"This is an intensely personal community and the magnitude of the tragedy has amplified the Bucknell family.
—University President Steffen Rogers

Members of the administration have worked tirelessly since the first hours of the tragedy to provide students with whatever type of support they might need to cope with the events of Sept. 11. According to Rogers, the apparent success of crisis-management events was in no small part because of the efforts by the University's Emergency Response Team.

"I am very, very proud of the Emergency Response Team," Rogers said. "They met quickly, put action into place within hours of learning about the crisis and followed through. Every division performed above the call of duty."

Rogers also believes that the continuation of classes in the days immediately following Sept. 11, at least on an informal basis, played a critical role in helping students cope with the tragedy.

Despite the fact that academic classes at many other institutions were cancelled following the crisis, Rogers said that the recommendation to continue classes came from University professors, counselors and psychologists.

"We were very cognizant of the fact that students could not function normally and that the faculty was dramatically impacted as well," he said.

Stressing the importance of structure, he feared that the absence of such organization would only "increase despair."

Memorial services hosted by the University for victims of the tragedy have tentatively been scheduled for early October, according to Chaplain Ian Oliver, so families of victims may first complete personal services at home for loved ones. Beginning yesterday, the University Alumni Office began posting the names of alumni who are confirmed dead or missing on the University's website.

Aside from University efforts to restore order and complacency to the community, students have made it their priority as well to contribute anything they can to ease the suffering and show compassion to those most affected by the attacks.

Members of student-run organizations voluntarily cancelled events throughout the week of the crisis. Transportation to a local blood drive from the University had to be stopped prematurely because the turnout from the campus community overwhelmed the facility. Candles were lit on the quad and at Rooke Chapel to mourn the losses of friends and loved ones and ribbons were worn all week to show support for the families of victims.

Additionally, a car wash organized last Saturday by the brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon (SPE) fraternity raised more than $1,800, and a bake sale last Monday by the Multicultural Affairs Office raised more than $400. The proceeds from both events were donated to the Red Cross.

"It was the most logical and easy thing to do," SPE President Kevin Ellis said of the decision to donate to the Red Cross. "This never would have happened though unless the community was so willing and thoughtful. We organized it, but the community deserves the credit."

According to the SPE Philanthropy Chair Nick Rhodin '01, nearly $300 of the total donated sum was contributed by third floor residents of Vedder West residence hall.

"It is remarkable that thirty or forty people can come together and share a common interest like this," Ellis said.

First-year officers elected after delay

By Meredith Atkinson
Staff Writer

As a result of last week's tragedy, the first-year class officer elections were postponed. Bucknell Student Government (BSG) records dating back to the late 1960s indicate that an election has never before been postponed or cancelled. The magnitude of the events of the past week however, forced the BSG executive committee to move the election that was scheduled for Tuesday, Sept. 11 to Friday, Sept. 14. According to BSG, voter turnout was slightly below normal, yet each officer was elected by a sizable margin.

While the new representatives are anxious to bring the issues facing the Class of 2005 to BSG, they also have perspective and would like to assess issues that face the University as a whole.

BSG President Nate Sorber '02 was impressed by their foresight and perspective, saying, "They seem very interested in class governance. They appear to have a broad vision, thinking in terms of the University as a whole."

He also noted that the group consisted of "some very animated personalities."

"I, like each of my classmates, have to spend four years at this institution," Halley said. "Every decision made effects our future. While we are elected to serve the class in the coming year, we will also give great attention to decisions that effect the other three classes—changes that effect them will impact us soon enough."

As members of BSG, the new officers will become very involved with University issues; their primary focus remains ensuring that the Class of 2005 has a voice.

"I would like to make sure that the issues of the Class of 2005 are not swept under the upperclass rug, but are instead given serious attention by BSG members," Halley said. "We can't make any promises regarding what we can do or provide, but we can try to work together

Kallin brings rich familiarity to VPDUR position

By Jason Rubinstein
News Layout Editor

As one of four new vice presidents, Robert Kallin '78, vice president for Development and University Relations, brings years of experience with fundraising at the University to a relatively new administrative team.

As the vice president for Development and University Relations, Kallin is responsible for a major component of the University's cash flow. The three major divisions of his office are fundraising, public relations/publications and alumni/parent/community relations.

Although the office does not decide the appropriations of the funds, they are expected to raise money for the operating budget, construction and renovation, special programs and financial aid. The mission is to involve and engage those connected to the University—alumni and parents.

"We have 40,000 alumni out there and we need to be responsive to them," Kallin said.

While searching for colleges in the early 1970s, Kallin's top choice was Bucknell. He was originally interested in biology/pre-med and liked the size and location of the campus.

"The University was a perfect fit for me—good size and great interaction with friends and teachers," said Kallin, who admits that he was not a star student.

During his undergraduate years here, Kallin was fairly active and worked with organizations such as The Bucknellian and the American Red Cross and was also a brother of the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity.

Kallin began his career at the University just as early, when he was a resident assistant his senior year and a teaching assistant for biology. He graduated in 1978 with a degree in biology and a concentration in psychology.

After graduation, Kallin worked in child protection services for a year where he found his psychology courses very useful.

"Through the social work, I actually saw the practice and theory come together," Kallin said. He re-

Public Safety Log

September 6, 2001

INFORMATION / ASSIST RA—Public Safety responded to the New Residence Hall for the report of a student who refused to leave the room of another student. After speaking with Public Safety, the unauthorized student visitor cooperated by leaving the area.

INFORMATION—Public Safety responded to the Weis Center for the report of a fall victim. The individual refused medical treatment offered by a University employee and was gone when Public Safety arrived on the scene.

INFORMATION / RECKLESS DRIVING—A student reported to Public Safety that a vehicle passed them recklessly on two occasions while they were standing on Fraternity Road. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified. Public Safety searched the area but was unable to locate the vehicle.

September 7, 2001

INFORMATION / SUSPICIOUS ACTIVITY—Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report that someone had been outside her room jiggling the doorknob. When she looked out she saw wet spots on the floor. No one was located in a search of the area. The incident is under investigation.

PROPERTY DAMAGE—Public Safety responded to the Farm Lot for the report of a student's vehicle that was damaged while parked there. The individual did not want to involve the local police. The incident is under investigation.

THEFT—Public Safety responded to the Langone Center for the report of a bicycle belonging to a juvenile visitor to campus that was taken from the bike rack at the Bertrand Library. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified and the incident is under investigation.

September 8, 2001

ASSIST LEWISBURG POLICE / UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to St. Catherine Street to assist Lewisburg Police Department in transporting an intoxicated student to Roberts Hall. Citations for underage consumption and public intoxication were issued.

INFORMATION—Colgate University Campus Safety Department contacted Public Safety to inform them that a University student was found unconscious on their campus and transported to the hospital for treatment of an alcohol overdose.

September 9, 2001

PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS / UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity for the report of an intoxicated student. The student was returned to the RA in her residence. Citations for underage drinking and public drunkenness were issued.

INFORMATION / FIGHT—Public Safety responded to Delta Upsilon Fraternity for the report of a fight with Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity. The individuals were located but did not wish to involve the police. University officials responded to the scene and spoke with the brothers in the two houses.

SIMPLE ASSAULT—Public Safety was advised that a Student Security Aide was assaulted by another student as he attempted to report an incident of public urination at the Botany building. A student was questioned by Public Safety who determined he had no involvement in the incident which is under investigation.

UNDERAGE DRINKING / ALCOHOL OVERDOSE / MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Larison Hall for the report of an intoxicated, unresponsive student. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment and later returned to campus. A citation was issued for underage consumption.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to a second room in Larison Hall for the report of an intoxicated student. The individual refused medical treatment and was placed in the care of friends. A citation for underage consumption was issued.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—Public Safety responded to Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity for the report of a student who had caused a disturbance in the Kappa Sigma Fraternity House. The individual later contacted Public Safety and admitted to being at Kappa Sigma earlier in the evening. Citations for Trespassing and Unauthorized Entrance into a University owned or controlled building or student room were issued.

UNDERAGE DRINKING / PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a student urinating on a tree near Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity. The individual was placed in the care of a friend at Lambda Chi Alpha. Citations for Underage Consumption and Disorderly Conduct were issued.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—Public Safety responded to a Bucknell West parking lot for the report of a parked vehicle that had broken windows. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded and determined the owner of the vehicle was not affiliated with the University. Public Safety later located the operator of the vehicle and advised him to remove it from University property.

INFORMATION / MEDICAL—Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room nurse contacted Public Safety to have an intoxicated student identified. A University Official responded to the hospital and made positive identification. Charges are pending.

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE ACT 64—Public Safety responded to the Seventh Street Cafe for the report of students smoking marijuana outside the building. The Officers determined the report was unfounded when the investigation showed that the individuals were smoking cigarettes.

September 10, 2001

INFORMATION / LOST OR STOLEN DECAL—An employee reported to Public Safety that his parking decal was missing from his vehicle's bumper. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / THEFT OF A RAILROAD CROSSING SIGN—Lewisburg Police Department informed Public Safety that an antique railroad crossing sign had been taken from a location near the University. Any information on the location of the sign should be reported to Public Safety.

INFORMATION / REPORTED FEMALE UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF DRUGS—Public Safety responded to the Langone Center for the report of a student who might have taken drugs and had fallen twice. The individual was gone when the Officers arrived. A University employee stated that he spoke with her but she indicated she was alright. The student was not located in a search of the area.

INFORMATION / REPORTED PERSON SMOKING MARIJUANA—Public Safety responded to Roberts Hall for the report of a student smoking marijuana. Public Safety met with a student who stated that he was smoking a regular cigarette with some friends who had left the area. The report was determined to be unfounded.

September 11, 2001

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety responded to Kalman Posner for the report of a student with a head injury. The individual had treated her injury herself and refused any further medical treatment. She was left in the care of her friends.

September 13, 2001

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) had taken her computer keyboard from her unlocked bedroom in Taylor House. The incident is under investigation.

TRASH FIRE—Public Safety responded the recycle bin in Bucknell West for the report of a fire. Students and staff used fire extinguishers to extinguish the fire which did only minor damage to the bin.

September 14, 2001

INFORMATION / TELEPHONE CALL—Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of a student receiving a disturbing voice mail message from off campus. The individual was advised of personal safety tips, asked to log her calls and to contact Public Safety if she received additional calls of this nature. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified.

September 15, 2001

UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to the Football stadium for the report of an intoxicated visitor. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded and cited the individual for underage consumption and placed the minor in the custody of his mother.

September 17, 2001

THEFT FROM MOTOR VEHICLE—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) had taken a handicapped placard from her unlocked vehicle while it was parked in front of Vedder Hall. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL AIDED / TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to the soccer field in Bucknell West for the report of a student with a fractured leg. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus.

PROPERTY DAMAGE—Public Safety responded to St. George Street and S. 6th Sreet for the report of damage to bushes as the result of a driver's attempt to avoid a motor vehicle accident No one was injured and there was only minor damage to one vehicle. Lewisburg Police Department was notified. Insurance information was provided.

September 18, 2001

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION / ALCOHOL OVERDOSE / MEDICAL TRANSPORT—UCC dispatched an EMS unit to Bucknell West for an alcohol overdose. Public Safety responded and found an intoxicated student, under the age of 21, who had a strong smell of alcohol on her breath. EMS transported the student to Evangelical Hospital for treatment. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded to the scene. Citations for underage consumption will be issued to the ill student, and two other students found in the Mod.

INFORMATION / HARASSMENT—A student notified Public Safety that while she was walking on Moore Avenue toward S. 7th Street she observed a car traveling east on the same street. Occupants of the car called out to the student and two males exited the vehicle to speak with her. The student fled the scene and reported it to Public Safety. Public Safety searched the area and the campus for the vehicle. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified and requested a copy of the incident report which was also sent to Lewisburg Police Department.

Class of 2005: the select few from a large pool

By Michelle Dombeck
Staff Writer

With the academic year now in full swing, the first-year students have begun to integrate into the University's community. These students represent a new, changing face of the University.

"There has been an explosion in applications," said Mark Davies, dean of admissions. "Four years ago, there were 6,965 applications. Three years ago, 7,011. Last year there were 7,511, and this year there were 8,043."

With such a growth in applications, the University is becoming more and more competitive.

"A growing application pool, but not growth in institution size, requires us to reduce our offers of admissions," Davies said. "But as a more selective college, our name will continue to become more visible."

> "A growing application pool, but not growth in institution size, requires us to reduce our offers of admissions.
> —Dean of Admissions Mark Davies '74

"Geographically speaking, this class is more diverse. Only 26 percent of applicants are from Pennsylvania; in past years, the average had been about 30 percent," Davies said. "Over 10 percent of the class comes from the West Coast, the direct result of a very concerted effort."

Shena Molyneaux, senior assistant director of admissions, lives in San Francisco and has been very active in bringing students from a more geographically diverse area to the University.

"The Class of 2005 is very interested in community service, active in leadership and participated in athletics," Davies said. "I hope that each student will become a productive and concerned citizen when they move on from Bucknell."

"It's my hope that each member of the class finds the classes, people and activities that fulfill his or her dreams of college life, and that each student achieves at his or her best in their chosen areas," Burnham said.

She feels that these students have the potential to excel over others, being so highly selective in the first place.

"If the students I've met so far are a good sample of the class, we're going to have a great year," Burnham said.

Bid Day adds Greeks, alcohol violations

By Matt Ellis
Staff Writer

For many students this year, Bid Day was a time of much excitement and anticipation, but it is also a time to rack up points on the University's new alcohol point system.

"I thought things went really well this year. Everyone is so excited that it seems to make the week go very smoothly," said Pan-Hellenic Association President Katie Richardson '02. Most students who went through the recruitment process received a bid; 313 women rushed and all but 49 joined a sorority while 232 of 308 men received bids.

"Everything seemed to be pretty normal this year. I do not think we had any major problems or problems that were out of the ordinary," Pan-Hellenic Recruitment Chair Brandi Herman '02 said. New members, too, felt the process was easygoing.

"I thought the week and Bid Day went very well," said Kimberly Cocoros '04, a new member of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority. "Everything seemed to be taken care of. It felt like I was in a river and wherever it went I went, but it was a lot of fun."

> "I believe things did not run as smoothly as they did last in previous years. This year saw an increase in alcohol related incidents in comparison to last year.
> —Director of Public Safety Vincent deCerchio

The week, however, was not without its problems.

"There were a total of 12 violations during Rush Weekend," said Vincent deCerchio, Director of Public Safety.

There were four underaged drinking offenses, two public intoxication offenses involving transfers to the hospital, two disorderly conduct offenses, alcohol offenses (public urination), one criminal mischief incident (damage to a car), one assault on a student and two alcohol related disorderly conduct offenses. There were also some related alcohol offenses in the fraternities.

"I believe things did not run as smoothly as they did last in previous years. Bid Day was without problems, but Rush Weekend parties caused multiple problems. This year saw an increase in alcohol related incidents in comparison to last year," deCerchio said.

turned to the University the following year to pursue a masters degree in education.

Upon returning, Kallin began working for the University while taking two classes per semester. He had a full time job in the development office and was the residence director of Trax and Vedder. From 1979 until 1992, Kallin moved up through the ranks, starting as assistant director of annual giving, and spending the last six years as director of development.

Kallin left the University when Bill Torrey '75, vice president of development at Bowdoin College in Maine, offered him the position of director of development there. Kallin was originally hired as director of annual giving by Torrey at Bucknell, and considers Torrey his mentor.

"Bill and I had a very, very good working relationship the first time around at Bucknell, so I thought I'd give it a shot again," Kallin said. "He was the mentor who got me into the business and watched over me, making sure I was headed in the right direction."

Kallin was a major lead when University President Steffen Rogers began the national search for a new vice president of Development and University Relations. Being an alumnus, former employee, protégé of an alumnus and marrying an alumna, Kallin certainly had the necessary relationships to be a successful leader of the University's fundraising efforts.

Rogers and Kallin had not met prior to the interview process, yet Rogers feels that Kallin's experience shows through.

"University fundraising is all about relationships," Rogers said. "The fact that Bob already has personal relationships with a large number of people makes all of our lives easier."

Kallin took over the position in July, after moving back to Lewisburg with his wife Tory and their two children, Peter, 14, and Abby, 11. He immediately found many vacancies that needed to be filled. After the extremely successful Bucknell Campaign, much of the staff accepted competitive job opportunities elsewhere.

"Fundraising is a profession where there is a much greater demand than there is a supply of good people," Kallin said. "So if you've been productive, you're probably on a headhunter's list. And Bucknell was certainly successful. We've lost staff to some very good institutions."

Kallin has been working hard to fill these vacancies, being a "headhunter" himself. This was the first thing on his agenda and he is still working to fill the positions.

Despite the high fundraising expectations and lack of staff, Kallin has a lot of faith in his abilities.

"I sometimes have a hard time remembering what I ate for breakfast, but I do remember people. The personal connection is important to me ... it just sticks," Kallin said.

He proudly refers to the increase of size in the division from 10 years ago and is committed as an alumnus and 13-year veteran employee to the University.

"Being an alumnus means that I have a stronger emotional attachment to the University," Kallin said.

Rogers is extremely happy with Kallin's accomplishments and abilities so far.

"The fact that he is a Bucknellian is invaluable," Rogers said. "Also, Bob worked in our University Relations area before he left to go to Maine and it shows. He knows a large number of Bucknell people. When I say a name, he knows who I am talking about, which is a huge advantage."

Kallin looks forward to his new role on the administrative team.

"It's good to be back. I'm very proud to be an employee of the University in addition to being an alumnus."

Taliban sends mixed signals

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan—Afghanistan's radical Islamic government sent mixed signals on Tuesday in response to demands that it hand over suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden or face immediate U.S. military strikes.

The Taliban said it was convening a council of senior Afghan clerics who would decide the most pressing issue facing the Taliban: whether to turn over bin Laden or face the full brunt of U.S. retaliation for the terror attacks.

Stock exchanges see largest point loss in history

NEW YORK—The Dow and the Nasdaq were mixed in afternoon trading Tuesday, stabilizing somewhat after Monday's steep losses, but Wall Street remained cautious amid uncertainty about the outlook for the U.S. economy.

In late afternoon trading, the Dow Jones Industrial Average was up about seven points, paring earlier gains after tumbling 685 points Monday as Wall Street resumed trading after a four-session hiatus that followed last Tuesday's brutal terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Both sides order cease-fires in Mideast

GAZA CITY, Gaza—The Israeli Defense Ministry said Tuesday it is cancelling all offensive operations against the Palestinians after Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat reaffirmed his determination to honor a cease-fire.

In a statement earlier in the day, Arafat ordered his security commanders not to fire on Israeli targets even when under fire from Israeli forces.

U.S. moves to solidify allies' international support

WASHINGTON—With many governments offering to help the United States "in any way possible" against the terrorist organizations and their backers that were behind the attacks last week, senior U.S. officials said they are rushing to negotiate military and other agreements "that put those promises in writing—before anyone changes their mind."

Hijacking suspect's family claims mistaken identity

BEKAA VALLEY, Lebanon—The family of suspected hijacker Ziad Jarrah contends there may be another man with the same name who was responsible for hijacking one of the four flights involved in last week's terrorist attacks on the United States. Jarrah's uncle originally claimed his nephew — who has not been accounted for in weeks—was an "innocent passenger" on the flight.

United to cut 20,000 jobs

WASHINGTON—With the airline industry reeling from last week's terrorist attacks involving four hijacked jetliners, sources familiar with United Airlines told CNN Tuesday that the airline plans to cut at least 20,000 employees, or 20 percent of its workforce. United is the latest of several major airlines to cut its workforce since the terrorist attacks. Continental Airlines has said it is cutting 12,000 jobs, U.S. Airways said it expects to lay off 11,000 employees and sources with Northwest Airlines have said they plan to announce layoffs in the coming week.

USS Cole relaunched with little fanfare

PASCAGOULA, Miss.—In a symbolic message of the nation's "resolve to fight back," the destroyer USS Cole was afloat again Sunday after a terrorist attack that killed 17 sailors. The destroyer's engines were not started, but it was a powerful message for the U.S. Navy following Tuesday's terrorist strikes on New York and Washington.

'Late Show,' 'PI' make emotional return

NEW YORK—Forsaking his usual monologue, forgoing his usual jokes, a subdued David Letterman returned to the air Monday night, toasting New York's residents, police and firefighters, proclaiming, "If you didn't believe it before, you can believe it now: New York City is absolutely the greatest city on earth."

University hosts Employer Expo despite complications from attacks

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

With 180 representatives from 70 different employers, today's Employer Expo marks the beginning of the job search for many Bucknellians.

Held in the fieldhouse from 11 a.m. until 3 p.m., representatives, including approximately 30 Bucknell alumni, will be on hand to talk with students about the job opportunities.

Regardless of major the Expo serves many purposes.

"The Expo is the students' first formal opportunity to learn more about a company or industry. With the timing of the Expo in the middle of September, it also marks a transition point to prepare for the job search, Career Development Center (CDC) Director Laura Denbow said.

According to Katie McDonald, coordinator of the annual Employer Expo, along with the 50 returning companies, today's attendants also include 20 new companies such as Bloomberg Financial Markets, the Census Bureau and Pfizer.

Companies attending the Expo are from divisions in finance, business and engineering. Many companies are looking to hire students with a variety of majors. However, some industries are better represented than others.

"Although the communications industry is not as represented in today's Expo, that is due to the fact that the Expo occurs in September. This means the company suggests they know their hiring needs for the next year," explains Denbow. "This trait is widely reflected in large Fortune 500 companies as well as companies with rotational training programs like General Electric."

"Industries that have just-in-time hiring such as journalism are not as comfortable in attending the fall Expo as they would be in the spring at the communication and arts career fair," Denbow said.

The University typically holds a career fair in September as well as an Internship Expo in January. However, in order to give companies a chance to look for interns without having to expend money to revisit Bucknell in the winter, the original plan from the CDC was not to have a separate internship Expo this year, and instead focus on the main September event.

Due to the economy not rebounding as some companies had predicted and refocusing their hiring needs, the University has not ruled out the possibility of a winter employer event.

Some industries, such as insurance, are getting hit hard by the economy. Many companies in such industries will regroup to see what their needs are. If there is enough interest from employers in a spring event we will have one," Denbow said.

Industries such as consulting and information technology have been adversely affected by the recent economy and have been forced to defer some of their recent hires. However, no company has ever rescinded an internship opportunity because they recognize the importance of building good talent in their pipeline.

Accenture consulting company will not be present at the Expo because of the way the economy has decreased their available opportunities.

The Expo only features organizations with opportunities available. Denbow stresses that some companies that the University has strong relationships will not be present.

Many companies directly affected by the disaster in New York City are more focused on restructuring their internal framework, before focusing on recruiting. Because of these reasons, it is very possible the University will have another employer event in the spring as they did last year.

As of now, this is the only on-campus employer event scheduled other than on-campus recruiting and interviews. However, if a student is unable to attend the Expo, there are many employer events with the CDC such as the October Finance Fair in New York City.

The CDC determines the day and time of the Expo to give the maximum amount of students a chance to attend. Unlike last year's Expo, which was held on a Thursday, inconveniencing many students with afternoon labs, the CDC determined Friday is the best day for the majority of students to attend without missing class.

"The lunch time and early afternoon is the best time to get students to attend the Expo. It's not a rush of students all at one time; and it also gives employers a chance to get home without spending the night in Lewisburg," Denbow said.

Many companies like to bring their recent University alumni to present a more truthful image of the company.

"Alumni let students know companies show they want to help students as much as possible," McDonald said. "Companies also want to relay that same message of care to their employees, which is why some companies have decided not to bring as many representatives, due to last Tuesday's attack in New York and Washington."

> "It was in the best interest of our students to continue with the expo. In terms of how the attack's impacts us, we decided to move forward until someone told us otherwise.
> —Director of the Career Development Center Laura Denbow

Despite the recent attack, after so many months of planning this large campus-wide event, not having the Expo was not an option.

"It was in the best interest of our students to continue with the Expo," Denbow said. "In terms of how the attacks impact us, we decided to move forward until someone told us otherwise."

In light of last week's tragedy, the University is fortunate that the event was not scheduled for last Friday.

"Nearby Penn State held their career fair on the Tuesday of the attacks, making it difficult for students and employers to concentrate on job search matters." Denbow said.

Despite Tuesday's tragedy, companies are making their best efforts to attend the Expo. "Organizations care about the safety of their employees. Some companies are restricting their employees' travel plans. For example, JP Morgan Chase is not allowed in their building, yet their employees are working from home arranging to still come to the University. Companies really wanted to be here and like talking with the Bucknell students," McDonald said.

Due to inconvenienced travel and recent security issues, some employers have cut schools from formal visits, such as communication and electronics command. However, the University still remains on their agendas.

"We have been really, really impressed with the way companies have handled their situations [since September 11]," Denbow said.

The week before the Expo, Denbow and McDonald are typically busy calling companies and confirming plans. However since the Tuesday attack, many companies could not facilitate any type of business until Monday, four days before the Expo.

The University's fall Expo typically draws a number of representatives from the financial district of New York City. Many of those companies once resided in the World Trade Center. It became a necessity to reach company officials to confirm Expo attendance in a timely manner, however, many businesses closed last week. The CDC took advantage of the personal relationships the University has established and several personal phone calls were made to gather Expo information.

"We took a look at the list of companies that once resided in the World Trade Center, figured out who we knew, then divided up the call list," said Denbow.

Typically 19-24 percent of seniors accept positions found through on-campus recruiting. Although it is difficult to estimate the percentage of students that are hired as a result of the Expo, many of the companies attending the Expo also participate in on-campus recruiting.

"The Expo is a good way for students to see what is out there in the world of work," McDonald said.

and use our available resources to provide events, options, services and a good time for the first-year students on campus."

Another issue that the new officers intend to focus on is building class unity.

"We are going to work hard to unify the class before everyone goes in different directions," said John Siwicki '05, vice president of the class.

Upperclass members of student government are excited about the promise and potential of its new members.

"Our 14 new first year members seem very excited and motivated. I am anxiously waiting to see what new ideas they will come up with this semester," BSG Vice President of Finance Amir Sadaghiani '03 said.

> "I would like to make sure that the issues of the Class of 2005 are not swept under the upperclass rug."
> —Class of 2005 President T. Patrick Halley III

Joing Halley and Siwicki on the class' executive board as Secretary/Treasurer is Ryan Johngrass.

The eight voting congress members are Adam Ahuja, Jessica Brimhall, Helen Britz, Katie Edwards, Ryan Gee, Richard Karcher, Reece Pacheco and Marissa Schmidt.

There was a three-way tie for the alternate positions; Craig Haven, Denis Kennedy and Lea Wassertrum will serve as congressional alternates.

Powell, Marrow power offense

Senior running backs look past prior injuries to make 2001 season a success

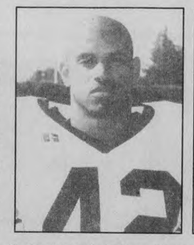
By Cory Nadler
Staff Writer

When the University's 2000 football team lost their two best running backs for much of last season, it definitely hurt them. Jabu Powell '02 and Jason Marrow '02 make up the starting back field for the Bison for the second straight season, and one can only hope that they both stay healthy this season.

Marrow, who hails from Calvert Hall High School in Baltimore, Md., left the second game of the 2000 season with what seemed to be an ankle sprain, but turned out to be a fractured bone in the ankle area. He missed the remainder of the season.

Powell, from Dr. Phillips High School in Orlando, Fla., missed some playing time in the middle of the 2000 campaign due to an injury to his spinal column.

"Jabu's injury was more serious in nature, but Marrow is still struggling to get back to 100 percent," head coach Tom Gadd said. While Powell seems to be back to his true form, Marrow still suffers from some leg problems that may be related to his injury last year.



Courtesy Athletic Communications

To understand how important these two players are to the Bison football team, one needs look no further than last season's results.

After Marrow went down the other players on the team picked up the slack enough to enable the Bison to keep winning football games.

However, when Powell was injured, it was too much for the team to endure, and they began to struggle on the offensive side of the ball. Even once Powell returned to the lineup, he was not as effective as he previously had been, and the Bison dropped their final three games of the season.

"I had to wear a real heavy neck brace. That affected me. It slowed me down a bit," Powell said.

"When you have both of these players available it gives you lots of options," Gadd said. "If you get rid of these options it is hard to be as good a football team."

Although Powell and Marrow have different roles when it comes to running the football, they are equally important. "Jabu is more of an open field runner. He has speed, and can change direction easily," Gadd said. "Marrow is more of a fullback."

"Jason is a big powerful runner, and a strong blocker," Powell said. "He is probably the best blocker I have ever seen. He clears wholes, and also has a nose for the goal line."

"They [Powell and Marrow] are probabiy the as good a one-two running back combination as there is in our conference [the Patriot League]," Gadd said.

Some people might question Powell and Marrow's decision to play such a physically dangerously game after being injured, but the choice is simple for people that love the game. "I just love playing," Powell said. "The people I play with, and the excitement of a game. It is probably the greatest sport in the world."

Campbell lifts Bison to OT victory

Senior tri-captain breaks tie one minute into sudden death to defeat LaSalle

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

Too often we find ourselves in such a fast paced routine when it is hard to find the time to slow down, sit back and reflect on our lives. This especially holds true for the University's field hockey team. Between classes, practices, and games, it is hard for them to find the time to do much else.

With their biggest game of the year against rival, Holy Cross, quickly approaching on Saturday, the team was busy preparing both physically and mentally. However, what they originally thought to be the most important part of their weekend, even their season, turned out not to be important at all.

On Tuesday, Sept. 18th, the Bison tried to put all that had happened in our country aside for a few hours as they traveled to La-Salle. With that short break behind them they were ready to resume their season. It was the same team that it always had been, warming up, talking about strategy, teamwork, and playing hard as they would have for any other game.

The tone of the game changed as soon as the team lined up for the national anthem. The flag flew at half mast. The national anthem evoked feelings of patriotism and grief. "As much as we strived for normaley, it was hard but to feel distracted. The playing of the national anthem didn't just represent the beginning of the game that day. It represented so much more," tri-captain Annie Hunsicker '02 said. Even the moment of silence before the game showed the fact that field hockey really is just a game, and not life.

As much as they tried to get on with their lives and back into the game, the field hockey team couldn't help but feel distracted every time a plane flew overhead or a siren was heard in the distance. The Bison found it very difficult to play the game the way they would have liked to.

Despite all of their efforts, the team found themselves tied 0-0 at the end of the game. Fortunately, in overtime, they were able to put that past them and execute their plays. With one minute into the sudden-death period, tri-captain Lauren Campbell '02, scored the winning goal to end the game with a score of 1-0. Goalie Sonja Wettergreen '03 shut out all four shots made by LaSalle.

It would have been a storybook ending to a great career. Shannon Walker '03 accomplished it all, winning Patriot League Offensive Player of the Year, Bucknellian's Female Athlete of the Year, and leading her team to a Patriot League championship. Only one thing stood in the way of it being a perfect ending; Walker was only a junior.

That's right, NCAA volleyball has to deal with Bucknell's outstanding middle hitter for yet another year. What does this mean? More individual accolades for Walker, sure. But she's not seeking to outdo her personal accomplishments; a task that might be impossible anyway. To Walker there is one thing left to do, win the Patriot League championship for the third time in her career.

Despite the return of Walker and the nucleus of last year's team, the Bison are not favored to repeat as champions. Newcomer to the League, American University, 26-4 last year, looks to put a damper on Walker's number one goal.

"It adds one more game to our Patriot League schedule, and it's a tough team too, which will make us have to work even harder," Walker said.

This year has already been more of a success than last year's campaign. Walker recorded 12 kills in a win over Virginia Commonwealth University, a team that beat the Bison last season.

"It was a great barometer of how our team has improved," head coach Cindy Opalski said. "Shannon Walker has done an excellent job mentoring our younger players."

Walker owes her success in part to the great examples set for her during her early years in the program.

"I really understood what it took to be on a college team because I got to see how people had to work," Walker said.

As a first-year student, she looked to her captain Emily Pomeroy '99 for inspiration and guidance. "She had this aura in the way she commanded, and was respected," Walker remembers. "I wanted to be just like her."

Although she'd never admit it, Walker has accomplished more than the leaders she admired, and now the underclassmen aspire to be her.

"Shannon's the best leader that I've played under," Jackie Leahy '05 said. "She's very helpful and competitive at the same time."

Walker's leadership and accolades extend beyond the volleyball court. Last year she was the Scholar-Athlete for volleyball, earning a 3.5 GPA. The sociology major plans to look at law schools once the season is over.

On the court, or maybe someday in the courtroom, whatever it is that Shannon intends to do, she will do it well, and she will get everyone around her to do the same.

"With anything you do, you have to love what you're doing, and work hard at it if you want to be happy," Walker said.

But Walker knows that she has more to accomplish on the court before she worries about the rest of her life. She looks to lead her team back to the NCAA tournament, an accomplishment that would surpass all of her others.

Opalski knows it would be tough to do it without Walker. "We never want to be in a situation where if you stop one player, you stop our whole attack, but even though we want to spread the ball around, Shannon Walker always seems to rise to the top," Opalski said. "She is an aggressive, powerful player who can be very dangerous when she gets on a roll."

Chicago Cub Rick Monday's 1976 grab that saved a piece of America

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

At the end of the century, "The Sporting News" (and just about every other sports publication in print) did a feature that ranked the 25 greatest moments in baseball history.

Bobby Thomson's "Shot Heard Round the World" took top honors, with Maz's 1960 dinger shortly following. The list jumped to Larsen's perfect game, Fisk's powers of persuasion, Hammerin' Hank's record setting shot, and so on. Few baseball fans would try to dispute their profundity. The radio calls, the footage and the photos have the power to reduce us to a state of watery-eyed awe.

Heck, even the mere mention of these events can entice all the little hairs on the back of one's neck to stand on end.

But for some Americans, there's a moment that may transcend any of those emotions. That is, for those who actually remember it.

Its omission from the "Top 25" is understandable. It didn't win a World Series or a Pennant; it didn't set a record; it didn't make or break anyone's career. It didn't even involve the ball.

Still, recollections of the moment linger in the annals of baseball history.

Some say that baseball, our "national pastime," defines the spirit of America. And on April 25, 1976, it did exactly that—right on the sprawling green lawn of Dodger Stadium, somewhere between left and center field.

In the wake of recent attacks on the heart of our country, Americans are beginning to truly appreciate how much our flag means to this country.

Every street, every highway, every gas station, bank and fast food joint is decked out in majestic stars and stripes. When Major League Baseball resumes play tomorrow, Old Glory will adorn the back of each player's jersey and cap, and all attending fans will be given small flags to wave during the game.

People now realize what the American flag really is: the most enduring, powerful and beautiful symbol in our country's history.

Rick Monday could have told you that 25 years ago.

When the fourth-place Chicago Cubs set out to play the L.A. Dodgers in April of 1976, there weren't exactly great expectations about the outcome of the game.

As the Dodgers came to bat in the fourth inning, former first round draft pick Rick Monday stood his ground in center field, not expecting to encounter a whole lot more than an occasional fly ball. He was about to make the most spectacular grab of his career.

Somewhere in the left field stands crept a pair of derelicts, slinking onto the field behind left fielder Jose Cardenal. One of them had a bundle under his arm. The two kneeled down and unfurled what then became clear as a large American flag.

Laid out flat on the ground, it's brilliant red and white stripes glistening helplessly in the sun, Old Glory was in obvious peril.

After dousing the flag with lighter fluid, one of the men pulled out a match and leaned down to desecrate the very symbol that gave them the freedom they were so blatantly abusing.

The match never touched the flag.

Rick Monday had embarked on a mad dash towards the perpetrators and with absolutely perfect timing, swept the stars and stripes right out from beneath the impending flame.

As the Cubs outfielder carried the flag to safety, the entire crowd, all 25,167 fans on hand at Dodger Stadium, rose to their feet and gave him an exuberant standing ovation.

He would receive the same hero's treatment from fans in every single stadium the Cubs appeared in for the rest of the season.

The flag itself was presented to him later in the season, and to this day it still hangs proudly in his home.

There weren't many photographers poised for action at the time of the incident, but one L.A. Herald-Examiner photographer, James Roark, managed to snap a shot of the moment.

The black and white photo depicts the scene gracefully: the two protestors kneel empty-handed, baffled, frozen in confusion, as one of them still holds a match out over the now-empty patch of grass; Monday, his head down, bolts away, his stride off-balance but determined. Clutched in his right hand is the flag, its pride unscathed. Its rippling folds of red, white and blue seem to be glancing back at the attackers and smirking. It's an image of pure American pride.

That frozen moment, which was nominated for the Pulitzer Prize, is for the most part all that is left of the incident. But what Roark's image communicates is something that Americans witness every day, even though they may not always realize it.

In the grand scheme of things, Rick Monday was hardly a conventional hero. He simply did what any good American would have done. But he happened to be in the right place at the right time to send out a message that still resonates today, perhaps now stronger than ever.

The enemy can try to send us down in flames. For a brief moment, they can lay us out and make us appear helpless and vulnerable. They can tower over us and laugh, poised to reduce our glory and pride to ashes. But in the end, they'll be left crouching over an empty patch of grass, holding a match to nothing but their own addled breath, foiled and gazing in disbelief at the ground.

Because, you see, our flag cannot be burned.

Oakland (1-0) at Miami (1-0)
This is a match-up of two very similar teams; both have QBs that have been questioned and both are playoff contenders. Oakland has the stronger offense, however, the Dolphins have the superior overall defense. "Oakland is gonna rock their fins."

Tennessee (0-1) at Jacksonville (1-0)
With McNair doubtful for this game and two starting defensive backs injured, the Titans may be hobbling their way into Jacksonville. If McNair doesn't play, Jacksonville will win easily, so to be safe I will go on the assumption that his injured shoulder will either sideline him or at least hinder his performance. Jacksonville.

St. Louis (1-0) at San Francisco (1-0)
This game will be an offense extravaganza. Both teams feature high powered offenses and play with the philosophy that the best defense is a good offense. However, the Rams have revamped their horrendous defensive squad, making this team better than the Rams that won the Super Bowl two years ago. St. Lunatics.

Washington (0-1) at Green Bay (1-0)
Washington has been expected to perform this year after a disappointing 2000 campaign, they have revamped their team once again. The Redskins have a talented, yet volatile and inconsistent QB in Jeff George. The Packers still have a fairly good defense, however, most importantly they have kept their offensive nucleus intact with a healthy Favre. Green Bay.

San Diego (1-0) at Dallas (0-1)
The Chargers, once a bottom rung team, has found new life and potential by dumping Ryan Leaf and acquiring Doug Flutie. They face a one time champion that has fallen off drastically. The Chargers finally have someone to lead their offense and to give their defense some hope. Chargers over Dallas.

Chris Perrella
Contributing Writer

Oakland at Miami
The Raiders and Dolphins are both premiere teams in the AFC this year. Rich "the cannon" Gannon is going to have trouble going long against Miami's secondary, while his counterpart Jay Fiedler will have a solid outing. Look for a late field goal to give the Fins a last second victory in my game of the week.

Tennessee at Jacksonville
Two divisional opponents meet in an early season match up that might have postseason implications. With the format of the postseason up in the air, there might be only one wildcard, divisional games will be all the more important. Jacksonville steam rolled Pittsburgh in week 1 and this is going to be a real test for them. Tennessee is coming off a disappointing loss to Miami and is looking for their first win of the year. The Titans will win this one easy but only by a touchdown.

St. Louis at San Francisco
Both teams in this game are evenly matched. St. Louis allowed the Eagles to get back into their week 1 game, while it took San Fran an overtime to beat the Falcons. Freddy Garcia will have another big game because St. Louis defense is soft. I pick the 49ers in a high scoring affair.

Washington at Green Bay
The only thing entertaining about this Monday night game will be the commentary. No I take that back, nothing about this game will be enjoyable. A new season of "Everybody Loves Raymond" will be on so I guess there will be something to watch on Monday. I pick the Packers by a bunch of points; let's say 17.

San Diego at Dallas
Da' Bolts play Da' Boys in big D. Watch as LaDainian Tomlinson runs all over the field on Sunday and the Cowboys just hope he gets tired. Doug Flutie is guaranteed to make some amazing plays in an easy one for the Chargers. If the Chargers have an easy one then you know the Cowboys are just plain awful.

Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

Oakland at Miami
The only possible way I see Miami winning this is if Tim Brown's respirator tubes get caught on Jerry Rice's heart-lung machine. Anyone else seeing a "Grumpier Old Men" vibe from these two? Maybe Oakland should have Sophia Loren sit in the endzone to inspire them to compete, despite the fact that they are both crippled with arthritis. These men are being kept alive solely because the AARP refuses to pull the plug until they've checked the organ donor box on the back of their driver's licenses.

Tennessee at Jacksonville
Did you know that King Edward II of England decreed that the inch was to be equal to three barleycorns end to end? That has no relevance to the game, yet somehow it's more interesting. Tennessee, sadly.

St Louis at San Francisco
Everyone keeps talking about St. Louis' new defense, "Oooo, look at their defense! Look at their defense!" Well if their defense is so good, how come God is still more powerful? You don't see Chidi Ahanotu turning water into wine, now do you?

Washington at Green Bay
Brett Favre has not played well since he was rejected by Cameron Diaz in "There's Something About Mary." That's hard stuff to get over. Don't worry Brett, you're still a hunk. Ben Stiller has nothing on you, certainly not a better film career.

San Diego at Dallas
Every week, Doug Flutie gives hope to men across the nation, teaching us all a valuable lesson that size does NOT matter. Dallas' quarterbacks, on the other hand, have the depth and range of Angelina Jolie. So, I'll take the Chargers.

Aurand has not decided whether he'll hang up his cleats after school, but he can see himself coaching his own kids 30 years from now. Andy possesses a colossal amount of love for the game, which is evident each and every time he steps on the field. "Enjoy every minute of it, because it goes by too fast," Aurand said.

Aurand plays central midfielder and is responsible for transitioning the ball from his own defense to the team's offensive attackers. In a nutshell the central midfielder controls the game. Thus far, Aurand has fit this position quite nicely. His dominant play has set the tone for the first few games this year, with the exception of the season opener against Penn Sate.

The day before the first preseason practice, he tore his meniscus and pieces of cartilage in his knee. For some people it takes months to recover from the compulsory surgery. With much determination, strength and a tremendous amount of love for the game, Aurand performed a speedy and successful recovery. After a mere three weeks, he was on the field competing again. Central midfield, however, was not always his primary position. Since his freshman year, the outside midfield served as a sanctuary. This player utilizes the outside flanks to create width and to generate scoring chances with ominous crosses. As the sole captain of the Bucknell squad, Andy's greatest contribution to the team is his leadership.

Like Aurand, fellow teammate Ryan Weber, has spent most of his life playing soccer. He grew up in Longmont, Colo. and attended Niwot High School where he earned All-Area, All-Conference, and All-State honors in 1997.

At age five Weber began to follow in his older sister, Rachel's, footsteps. She recently ended her college career at soccer powerhouse Santa Clara. As a Bronco Rachel played in three Final Four Tournaments and earned Academic All-American honors. Rachel was, and continues to be, Weber's role model. Soccer has been a large part of his life in so many ways.

Also, the challenges of balancing classes, a social life and soccer have instilled order and discipline in Weber's life. "Soccer makes college more exciting when you get involved with the school. It makes you feel more of a part of the university," Weber said. When asked if he had any advice to give to aspiring soccer players, Weber said, "Stick with it no matter how difficult it gets."

For the past three years, Weber served as a central midfielder for the Bison. As a senior, however, coach Nash has planned to utilize Weber's speed and power at the sweeper position. A sweeper is the last line of defense. The object of this position is to control, organize and lead the entire defense. With a new role on the field, Weber has earned more playing time than the previous years and has provided a great deal of fortitude in the back. Dubbed "Cheeky" by fellow teammates, Weber is known for capitalizing on big plays when they are most needed.

Last season, the Orange and Blue lost to Lehigh in the semifinal game of the Patriot League Final. Weber hopes to top last year's achievements. "Some of our goals are to remain above .500 and to make it to the Patriot League Championship. We definitely have a chance at winning the final this year," Weber said.

"Enjoy yourself. It does not last forever, and the more fun you have with it, the more memories and incredible feelings you get out of it."
—Greg Stunzenas '02

Greg Stunzenas' older brother sparked his interest in soccer at the early age of five. He says that the sport has been the most influential part of his life. The game not only has been a form of entertainment, but also has been pedagogically beneficial. "It's taught me how to enjoy winning, accept losing-as hard as it is-and has made me a stronger person because of it," Stunzenas said in the interview.

Stunzenas attended Marshfield High School in Marshfield, Mass. As a high school senior, he was named Massachusetts Player of the Year, was a National All-American, and was a member of the Olympic Development Program team. Currently, Stunzenas is working on completing his fourth straight year as a Mechanical Engineer. He plans on attending engineering graduate school and eventually hopes to land a job in the automotive industry as a design engineer. Along with his career aspirations, Stunzenas hopes to continue his involvement in soccer through some form or another.

As a freshman Stunzenas started out at central midfield, but since then, he has found his niche on defense. As an outside back, Stunzenas' job is to prevent opposing forwards from penetrating the Bison's defense. The outside back position suits Stunzenas very well. "I love playing outside back. It gives me the chance to play against some of the most skilled forwards in the game, and I would give up being the leading scorer for that opportunity any day," Stunzenas said. Although not large in stature, Stunzenas' physical strength makes other defenders look small. Fellow teammate Mark Mascarenhas '04 said, "Either the ball or the man gets past Greg. Never both."

Stunzenas' soccer career has not always been so enjoyable. A torn ACL shortened his second season as a Bison. Unlike a tear in the meniscus, the ACL of the knee requires over six months of rehabilitation and strengthening. Coming back after surgery was a frustrating time, but has made Stunzenas a stronger person. Currently, he does not have problems with his knee and is happy to be fully recovered. "Enjoy yourself. It does not last forever, and the more fun you have with it, the more memories and incredible feelings you get out of it," Stunzenas advises.

Although Nate Hopfinger was not available for discussion, some teammates had a few notable words. The general consensus about Hopfinger is that he is very comfortable when handling the ball. His footwork is near impeccable, and his confidence with the ball is immense. He adds a cool, serene feel to atmosphere of the team. He contributes his talents to the midfield and occasionally is pushed up into an attacking position.

As a member of the Pittsford Mendon High School soccer team in New York, Hopfinger was named a Regional All-American, three-time county All-county player, and was a member of the New York-West Olympic Development Program team.

These seniors have survived the most drastic of changes. Freshman year the team held the worst record in the Patriot League and now the men are part of a team that is contending for the championship. These four players came from all over the country to help lead the team to victory. The men's soccer team has high hopes this fall, under the experience and tutelage of the class of 2002. It is the senior's last year and they are looking for nothing but a championship win.

Legendary Johnson retiring after life in fast lane

By Scott Kloss
Staff Writer

Michael Johnson's illustrious career ended in appropriate fashion - with a win.

On Saturday, Johnson delivered a performance that exemplified his storied career by anchoring his team to a victory in a special relay race.

The 34-year-old world 200 and 400 meter record holder stormed past Japanese Jun Osakada in the back straight on the final leg of the rarely run "Swedish relay" (100-200-300-400 relay) at an international game in Yokohama, Japan.

"Even though it was my last race, I still had a job to do. We were losing, so I had to execute a strategy for my 400 meters," Johnson said. "I was just doing what I've always done."

And what he has done is set world records and leave a disbelieving group of runners in his gold dust. Johnson was known for his golden shoes symbolic of his gold medal dominance. A five-time Olympic gold medalist and nine-time world champion, Johnson has left his mark in history. Johnson currently holds the world records in the 200m (19.32), 400m (43.18) and as part of the 4x400m relay team (43.3 for 2:54.20).

Born in Dallas, Texas, Johnson graduated from Baylor University in 1990. He suffered a series of injuries early in his running career, including a broken leg bone that kept him from competing in the 1988 Olympics in Seoul, South Korea. In 1990, healthy for the full season, Johnson won 20 of the 21 races he entered and became the first men's sprinter to be ranked first in the world in both the 200-meter and 400-meter dashes.

After his stunning double-gold performance in 1996 Olympics, Johnson also became the first man ever to defend an Olympic title in the 400m at the 2000 Olympics in Sydney.

The greatest combination sprinter (100-200-400) in history, Johnson has worked with coach Clyde Hart since leaving high school.

'Superman' as he was called by the media, did everything he was asked to. He was a runner from another planet, perhaps galaxy. As another running legend, Sebastien Coe, observed a few days after Johnson's last race, the 400 has a different feel without Johnson racing it.

"It will take five or six years for that gap to be bridged," Coe said. "It is a psychological gap, and that is the hardest gap to bridge."

Moreover, Johnson's distinct, upright way of running gave him an imperious look to go with his imperious record. Johnson said it was his natural way of running.

"One thing my coach [Clyde Hart] can take credit for is saying that it wasn't broke and he wouldn't try to fix it," Johnson said.

Johnson will probably be remembered most for his much anticipated 150-meter race with Donovan Bailey that never materialized. Racing to settle the "World's Fastest Human" honors, Johnson pulled up short 50 meters into the race, holding his hamstring as a non-winner. But no one is perfect - not even Superman in the presence of Kryptonite.

On Friday night Johnson ended his U.S. team racing career anchoring the United States 4x400-meter relay team to the gold medal at the Goodwill Games before a crowd of 29,973 at ANZ Stadium. As he crossed the finish line the faithful crowd gave him a standing ovation as he circled the 400-meter oval one last time.

Coincidentally, Johnson began his international career at the 1990 Goodwill Games in Seattle. "It's only natural that I would run here again," Johnson said. "Everything worked out."

"When we took a victory lap, it was very emotional," Johnson said. "I'm happy. It's difficult to be sad. My career has been unbelievable. There is nothing I regret."

As he walked around by himself, he stopped and threw his shoes into the crowd and waved to the fans, with a huge smile. Johnson succeeded with God given talent and a work ethic unmatched in present day competition. But the key as he sees it was enjoying what he was doing.

"I wanted to dedicate this year to the fans and it's been a lot of fun," Johnson said. "This was a farewell. I will miss the sport because it's been such a big part of my life. I am sad, not so much that my career is ending, because that was a decision I consciously made. I am a little sad that this year is going to end because I have had a great time. But I'm looking forward to retirement."

Johnson, when asked about coming out of retirement said, "I'm finished. I haven't given anyone any reason to doubt that. That's what I'm saying and that's what I'm doing."

And what Johnson says he will do, he does ... and then some.

The Bucknell sports world reacts

"ALL ATHLETIC EVENTS AT BUCKNELL THROUGH SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, HAVE BEEN POSTPONED OR CANCELLED," the University's Athletics website read last Friday.

With one prompt decision, a few e-mails and this official announcement, Bucknell acted in kind with many institutions across the country by placing athletic competition on the backburner this past weekend. Practices on Friday were cancelled, and those over the weekend required to be optional. This allowed the school, its student-athletes, and its athletic staff to deal personally with the tragedies of Sept. 11.

Some people laughed when I told them that my school made this decision. "Cuba still plays baseball," one friend said, pointing out that a country full of political turmoil manages to find unity, solace or maybe simply distraction, through athletics. This is a valid argument. In times of stress or sadness, people often turn to—even rely on—the stability and entertainment that sports provide.

Commentary

Brooke Rea
Sports Editor

This is especially true in America; you can count on one hand the number of times major league sports schedules have been altered due to a disaster or tragedy, and even this past weekend some athletic conferences went on with regularly scheduled competition.

But our administration didn't worry about the rest of America; they worried about Bucknell. They worried about the immediate situation, not some other place or time. And they came up with the right answers.

The administration's decision to cancel athletic competition reflects its firm commitment to providing the University community time to heal. While some of us might have been able to heal better had we been able to watch our friends compete on the soccer field or hear the Columbia football game on the radio, some of those soccer and football players might have healed better off the field than on. Those players deserved time and space to recuperate from this tragedy, too.

Many argued last week that sports should go on; it will help the country return to a state of normalcy. The same could be said of athletics on the Bucknell campus. But I disagree. Speaking as a student-athlete and one who could have been called upon to play had this all happened six months from now and my sport was in season, I can only say thank you to Athletic Director John Hardt and others who made this decision.

Now, don't get me wrong. There's nothing I'd rather do any weekend than play water polo. Most weekends I get on that bus Friday afternoon, decked out in Orange and Blue and filled with anticipation, and head out of town for a weekend of competition. Other weekends my team is on campus, and Coach capitalizes on the time by pushing us through three-hour practices both days. Exhausted and glowing, my teammates and I head to the caf for an all-you-can eat brunch of eggs, bagels and desserts, and then nap the afternoon away.

This is the routine my life takes as a student-athlete at Bucknell, and I love it. But it is extremely demanding. Especially while in season, everything an athlete does becomes critical. We have to get the right amount of sleep. We have to keep our grades up and go to class. We have to eat right, stay healthy and avoid injuries. We have to be 100 percent focused on practice during practice, and on class during class. Even the smallest disruption to an athlete's routine can cause him or her to have a bad practice, a bad game or a bad season.

That is why I can't imagine having to play this past weekend. Nothing that I love about sports would have surfaced had I been forced to slog through a weekend of games in the aftermath of last Tuesday. Trying to get a good night's sleep, I would have nightmares. Trying to warm-up, I would just keep thinking about how lucky I am to be alive, and how unlucky some others were. During the game I would be distracted by fatigue, fear and questions about the future.

Last week, all of us at Bucknell were thrown seriously off track. University President Steffen Rogers enacted policies to allow for missed classes and assignments. Everything shut down early Friday so that we could come together in mourning, and all energy was focused on helping, supporting, and understanding.

Many students and staff needed this weekend to go home and check on loved ones and friends, to find out the effects of the attacks on their lives or to help people in need. Others simply decided to go home because they wanted give their family a hug. Some caught up on sleep and work, or relaxed with friends. Everyone deserved to have that freedom last weekend, and had sports schedules been kept up, many would not.

An event like the terrorism of last Tuesday takes its toll on every person in the country, no matter how far removed from the situation he or she might be. Whether you spent last Tuesday in front of the TV, on the phone checking in on family and friends, or comforting a friend who had relatives missing, you most likely did not go about your normal schedule. You struggled re-group and re-focus on class work. You worried about yourself, friends, family, the entire country. You spent time trying to learn more about what was going on, discussed it, thought about it.

Did you have a normal week? No one I know did.

So I am glad that we didn't simply return to a normal weekend. No matter how hard we may push ourselves during a game, a race, or a tough practice, there are some things you can't muscle through, and the emotional stress of an event like this doesn't even hit us until several days later.

Perhaps some athletes disagree with me and wanted to compete. But for those who did need this time—players, coaches, staff, opponents—didn't they deserve it?

I definitely appreciated my own team's attempt at 'normalcy' in keeping with a scheduled lifting session on Saturday, then a swim workout on Sunday. But I also appreciated that these events were optional. Had I needed to stay home and rest, leave school or deal with an emergency, I could have.

I was grateful for my team this past week. I was grateful for my coach. I was grateful to be an athlete. And I was most grateful that the University took an opportunity to tell me that it values me as an individual.

We know we are important to Bucknell, but this past week I learned just how important. As students? Yes. As athletes? Yes. But as people with lives outside of school, with emotions and reactions that can stretch beyond our control, with needs that couldn't be easily met? This school said, "Yes," and I thank them for that.

Rennels paces Bison attack against Mount St. Mary's

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

Forward Savannah Rennels '04 scored two goals while leading Bucknell to their largest offensive output of the season, a 4-2 win over visiting Mount St. Mary's this past Tuesday afternoon. The Orange and Blue took to the field for the first time in over a week after their game against Duquesne last Friday was cancelled because of the national tragedy a week ago.

Bucknell attacked from the opening whistle, pouring it on offensively from all angles. The ball hardly ever left the opponent's half of the field, but when it did the visitors capitalized to beat the Bison defense and goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 to take the early 1-0 lead.

Bucknell kept attacking, and Rennels evened the score with just under 28 minutes left in the first half, when she scored off a drop by the Mount St. Mary's goalie. The Bison offense's relentless attack produced more scoring opportunities throughout the rest of the half, but the Mountaineers' goalie would not budge.

After going into halftime tied 1-1, the Orange and Blue wasted no time in taking the lead. Rennels put home her second goal of the contest off a cross from freshman midfielder Megan Farrell at 39:05 of the second half. Farrell increased the Bison advantage eight minutes later when she hit a beautiful left-footed shot just inside the eighteen-yard line, off the right post and into the back of the net.

Ali Chandler (23) and the Bison are a perfect 4-0.

Bucknell did not stop there. In a great individual effort, Rennels won the ball back from a Mount St. Mary's defender and passed it to tri-captain Tara Utchel '03. Utchel then beat the Mountaineers' last defender and crossed it to Meredith Barnes '02, who notched her first goal of the year.

"Meredith and Lindsay Slomer '02 are becoming more confident after coming back from injuries and are definitely getting better," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

Mount St. Mary's was able to get one back at 18:21 of the game when they successfully converted a penalty kick against freshman goalkeeper Kelly Kannen, who saw her first action of the season in the second half.

Bucknell outshot the Mountaineers 30-7 in its fourth win of the season. The team has equaled its best start since 1997.

"It is tough playing during the week when players have classes, because sometimes not all of the players can be at the pre-game warmup," Findlay said. " I am so proud that my players are able to balance athletics and academics and still be successful."

"I think we did a lot better job controlling the ball and winning it in the air today than we have done in recent games," Abbey Seaboyer '04 said. "That is going to help us in future games."

"Our success is due to everyone being consistent in practices and games," Lauren Schwarz '03 said. "Everyone played a role today."

The players Findlay all reacted to the events last week in New York City and Washington D.C.

"Everybody on the team has been affected, directly or indirectly. We've all helped each other get through it by checking up on one another. I have found playing soccer to be a release for me," Seaboyer said.

"We had a team meeting on Tuesday afternoon to talk about it," Findlay said. "I am so fortunate to have a close team that works at staying close. I know they are helping each other. Not playing Friday was the right decision out of respect."

The Orange and Blue open Patriot League play this Saturday in Washington, D.C. against new league member American University.

"We are ready," Schwarz said. "This is was we play for and we are looking to show American that they will not have it easy in this league."

New athletic complex coming into focus

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

Construction for Bucknell's new athletic complex is right on schedule to be finished for Fall 2002 and remain within the budget.

Though the construction is causing some problems, most of Bucknell's varsity sports have been relatively unaffected, and the consensus amongst many members of the Bucknell community is that the new complex is worth the current inconvenience.

Currently, the only major problem facing the varsity sports teams is lack of locker room space. But according to Athletic Director, John Hardt, the administration has been very diligent about warning coaches and athletes of any changes well in advance of any conflict.

For right now, all sports practices and competitions at the field behind the natatorium are being held at the Mods fields. So far, this has very little affect on practice and game schedules.

Though the improvements to the athletic complex will make a sizable difference in competition and practice facilities for the varsity athletes at Bucknell, the biggest differences will be seen in the amount of time and space the complex dedicates to the recreational athletes in the Lewisburg community.

The new pool will provide longer hours for the public, and its new design, including bulkheads separating the shallow end and deep end, will allow easier facilitated swim instruction as well.

There will also be more open gymnasium hours added as two new gyms will be built, allowing for more time and room for recreation.

The new fitness center will be multi-leveled with all fitness equipment separated by genre so that the people who use the cardio-vascular machines will be separated from those using free-weights, etc. It will also meet all workout intensity needs from casual to intensive, and will add some new machines to the ones already present.

"Hopefully these improvements will add to the wonderful place that Bucknell is, and put our facilities not only at the same level as other schools, but above and beyond many of them."
—John Hardt, Athletic Director

There will also be a snack bar at the complex that will serve a variety of smoothies, sandwiches and other choices with healthy eating in mind. It will be on a meal plan deal along the lines of the Bison, with the option of using meal credit or declining balance.

"It will be nice to have food right there after I come out of the gym or the pool instead of having to walk all the way to the Langone Center," Kelly Hofstetter '04 said.

"Lots of students when coming to Bucknell to visit have looked at our athletic complex and found that we haven't really measured up as far as varsity and recreational facilities. Hopefully these improvements will add to the wonderful place that Bucknell is, and put our facilities not only at the same level as other schools, but above and beyond many of them," Hardt said.

Men's soccer seniors have team contending

Worst in Patriot League in 1998, team now challenging for championship

By Tara Utchel

Leaders, role models and intellectuals are a few words that characterize the four seniors on the men's soccer team. At the commencement of the 2001 season, Greg Stunzenas '02, Ryan Weber '02, Andrew Aurand '02 and Nathan Hopfinger '02 are approaching the last stretch of their college careers, and each player has contributed to the team in his own unique way.

Soccer, however, is more than just a game; in a way, it is a mentor. It helps to develop friendships and confidence, and instills diligence and perseverance. These four seniors have all demonstrated that soccer is not just a game in their lives, but it is a part of who they are.

A soccer ball has been attached to Aurand's foot, ever since the ripe age of four. Throughout the past 17 years, the game engendered some of the greatest experiences of his life. Aurand graduated from Middleburg High School in central Pa. and was named to the Regional All-America team as a senior. A trip to Europe with the local club team is one experience that will forever remain with him in his memories. He plans to continue his involvement with the sport after graduation, because it has

Cryptology may be the high-tech way to combat new wave of terrorism

By Matthew Casper
Staff Writer

In response to the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, our nation's lawmakers struggle to find ways of responding to the attack and ideally prevent future attacks.

As reported by Wired (www.wired.com) Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) has called for legislation requiring cryptography software providing our government with "backdoor" access in decrypting coded messages. The hope is that by doing so, the United States will be able to easily decipher the communications of possible future terrorists.

Cryptography is the art and practice of encryption, the process whereby a message is made illegible to foreign parties.

For example, if a person wants to send a message to a friend, but guarantee that no one else could understand the message, he or she would talk to the friend and agree on a way of encrypting the message so that only the two of them could comprehend it.

For example, they might agree that to read the message, move each letter in the message 13 places in the alphabet to receive the correct letter. Thus, when the individual sends his or her friend a note reading "Yrg'f tb gb Hcgbja," the recipient would know it to mean "Let's go to Uptown."

More complicated methods of encryption exist. One of the most famous and widely-used methods is the RSA encryption algorithm (www.rsa.com).

The RSA algorithm is useful and effective because it uses two keys for encryption. One key is called the public key, and the other is named the private key.

To use this method, senders would tell friends what their public key was so when they wanted to send them a message, they would encrypt the message using the public key. When the friends received the message, they could decrypt it with the private key.

A really neat feature of all this is that the public key is useless in trying to decrypt the message, as it has no apparent relation to my private key.

Another nice feature is that as far as mathematical knowledge of the topic is concerned, no one has found a good way to defeat this method of encryption.

You can sit down with the message and try to decrypt it by trying every key, but since key sizes can be arbitrarily large, it could take billions of years to decrypt, even if you had all the computing power in the world.

Further, the patent on the RSA algorithm expired in October last year, so anyone is free to write a program using it, including those who would use it for terrible purposes.

While some Americans may be willing to let Uncle Sam read their private communications, very few would be happy to know that foreign governments and bored 13-year-old computer crackers could also access their email.

University works toward healing

The campus community has begun the healing process following the crippling attacks in New York City, Washington, D.C. and the plane crash in Somerset, Pa. last week. After the initial shock of the events started to wear off, the University responded to the hurt felt by students, staff and faculty members alike. It wasn't just the students mourning the attacks—the crisis had affected everyone.

On Friday, the campus held a service to commemorate the National Prayer and Remembrance Day in the garden behind Rooke Chapel. University Chaplain Ian Oliver, Rabbi Serena Fujita and Father Marty Moran all provided eloquent prayers to commemorate those lost and those victimized by the attacks. A truly touching service that included readers that read aloud the names of those lost in the airplane crashes, a chorus of "America the Beautiful," "Amazing Grace" by Two Past Midnight and "Irish Blessing" by the Bison Chips a capella group. At 7 p.m. Friday night, a candlelight vigil was held in the same location.

The Bucknellian recognizes and applauds the persistent efforts of these three leaders, who also held services over the weekend, to reach out and promote group support and unity on campus. The "Bucknell Family" has grown tremendously over the past week and a half and many campus members have credited the growth to the spiritual guidance of leaders like "The God Squad."

Faculty members were urged to conduct classes as they deemed appropriate—most students will attest that some classes were entirely spent discussing the tragedy, which many say truly helped the healing process. While some faculty members are reminding students of psychological services that are available, some are also emphasizing that they want to help out in any way possible.

The Bucknellian Editorial Board has been impressed by the level of compassion that many of our faculty and administrators have exhibited this past week. Provost and Vice President of Academic Affairs Steve Bowen announced last week the cancellation of classes Friday afternoon and a significant academic renovation. He released an email stating that faculty members were essentially to remove about a week from their syllabi and encouraged professors not to have graded work this past week. Most students were enormously relieved by this notice, commenting that this allowed them to cope and heal without too much pressure to concentrate on schoolwork.

However, some students were disappointed by the lack of concern that some professors exhibited this past week during what was supposed to be a healing process. One student claimed that an economics professor used terrorism as an example to demonstrate the supply and demand curves. Another professor told students not to "profit off the pain of others," and required them to complete their already-scheduled assignments for the week.

Some students were also disappointed that several professors made the decision not to even mention the tragedy in class—even the day of or after the attacks occurred. In a Wednesday afternoon class, a professor asked students if they were hot or tired when they did not participate enthusiastically. While we are not necessarily criticizing a professor's motive to pave forward through his/her lecture or agenda, students were anticipating a class period mainly devoted to discussing the attacks that occurred.

The Bucknellian believes, however, that the sensitivity and compassion of most professors outweighs the disappointments that students experienced. Students have even noticed that the administration has been more visible this past week than ever before.

President Rogers' frequent email communications to the campus have made us realize that we are all humans—the entire community is coping with the same tragedy and we're all trying to move forward with our lives. At the same time, we are continuing to dedicate ourselves to the academic mission of the University.

Students, we are truly fortunate to have this powerful leadership on campus during this national crisis. The administration, faculty, religious leaders and students have all pulled together to show what a special place this University really is.

Honesty and justice must guide any response

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

As I write this article I look back one week to the senseless destruction that our adversaries have brought to our country and envision how much has changed in just seven short days. The losses in New York and Washington have staggered us all as we join the rest of the world in the sad knowledge of what they have known for sometime: terrorism can happen anywhere and anytime. We were naive to believe that it could not happen here. We were mistaken to relax our vigilance since the first World Trade Center bombing and the Oklahoma City episode.

How our country is seen by future historians will be determined by our responses to both those who committed these acts and to our fallen friends and co-workers in New York and Washington, D.C. A national conversation is in order if we are to avoid sinking into the default program of flag-waving and ultra-patriotism that only spawns mistaken political decisions that end up costing more lives and undermines our civil liberties.

Our response to the perpetrators of these acts must be civilized. Justice should be our guide to avoid giving them another victory through rash and indiscriminate actions that may feel good at the time, but ultimately only provide martyrs for future actions against us or our allies.

The calls for swift revenge must be openly discouraged by our national leadership. Our role of the last superpower is still uncomfortably ours. We must continue to act like one by fostering international cooperation in all areas.

As we begin to understand just how these attacks have altered our world, we must look to the rule of law combined with military actions to bring those ultimately responsible into account. The victims of New York and those at the Pentagon deserve no less. To cheapen their sacrifices by political and patriotic aggrandizement would be unseemly at this time.

What can we say to the victims of last week's airborne assaults? How can we continue with our lives while honoring their sacrifices? One way is to act like citizens; after all our Constitution says "We the people" not we the "elected or otherwise" political hierarchy. We must look to and demand more from our national leadership than we have in the last half century.

Before another generation is calmly asked to make the financial, political, social and cultural investments necessary to save the world for capitalism and all the other "-isms" we claim to be wholeheartedly in favor of, a conversation is in order and necessary. Now is the worst possible time for blind patriotism if we truly treasure our freedoms.

Monday's sell off in the financial markets with an over 685 point drop in the Dow Jones average clearly points to the fact that the assault was not just a political one, economic psychology and symbolism were also targets. Capitalism was targeted and the extent of the damage is yet to be accurately assessed.

The losses by the insurance industry alone will be in the billions. One major airline has gone out of business and others are filing for help by the federal government as they announce major layoffs and service cutbacks. These realities must be seen in the context of the slowing economic atmosphere in evidence before the attacks.

Make no mistake, capitalism, as it has become global in scope, has threatened and undermined many cultures in the world. We must clearly understand these issues combined with economic and political decisions made over time have contributed to the level and depth of hatred instilled in these men to commit these well coordinated attacks. We must take these facts into account as we attempt to understand the mind-set of our adversaries.

Our history must be clearly understood if we are to effectively understand what our position is in relation to the views of our opponents as well. President Bush has mentioned that this will be a long campaign so historical accuracy will be helpful when and if we encounter difficulties and setbacks in the years to come. Clarity of purpose cannot be a detriment at this point.

In honor of the victims we must ask our elected officials what has been done in our name that has produced this level of resolve against us? We as participants in a new "hands on" citizen-governmental relationship must demand that these historically documented actions be talked about in an open forum. If government is to ask us to sacrifice the lives and treasure once again we are owed an explanation as to why.

If anyone feels that this is a presumptuous position for a university student or any citizen to take then you have just witnessed another victory by our adversaries. Has our relationship with our government has been altered by their attack just since last week? That is the kind of "war" we are now engaged in. A war that will require honesty by all parties if it is to be waged successfully. If we opt for secrecy, suspicion, super-patriotism, and feel good remedies like flag waving, the lost lives in the World Trade Center and the Pentagon will have been futile. This must not happen. Faith in our fellow citizenry must and will prevail in the first war of the 21st century.

Letters to the Editor

Wrestling scrapped unfairly

To the Editor:

I was stunned to learn that a University of Bucknell's stature would make such a "weak kneed" decision to drop its intercollegiate wrestling program. The usual Title IX excuse is inexcusable for such a school of "higher learning." Bucknell's decision is actually "dumbing down" to the herd mentality of those schools who lack the courage to do the right thing. Hiding behind statistics is a sham. It's been said, "statistics are for losers." The lone fact that "only" 42 percent of Bucknell's women participate in sports is irrelevant if Bucknell is providing equal opportunity for all women to participate. You cannot force women to try out for athletics. So long as the University can show it is providing that same access, then it has nothing to worry about. To say the University studied this matter and made the decision on the fact that the Patriot League does not offer wrestling as a League sport is irrelevant since the Bison joined the prestigious EIWA just a couple years ago. One of Bucknell's primary "competitors" both on the playing field and in the academic arena has one of the most storied and successful wrestling programs in the nation—Lehigh University. I am unaware of any Title IX problems at my alma mater. While there is an old hackneyed expression, "When the going gets tough, the tough get going," Bucknell's administration has certainly shown its metal—or lack thereof. They should be ashamed.

Downtown renters have rights

To the Editor:

The Sept. 14 Bucknellian, page B5, carried a story over Alisa Karlsons' byline detailing numerous what appear to be code violations in students' off-campus housing in Lewisburg.

In case Bucknellians do not know what their rights are as tenants in Union County, the local governmental agency responsible for investigating code and safety violations in Union County is the Union County Housing Authority.

They are EAGER to get at landlords who fail to conform to minimum safety standards. There were deaths last year in Union County housing owing to inadequate fire safety, and the authorities are eager not to be liable for more deaths or injuries.

You can reach them at Housing Authority or by phone at 522-1300. Ask for Tom Sauers or Jerre Engle. It is my understanding that Borough ordinances provide that NO TENANT may be penalized or victimized by a landlord for turning them in for code or safety violations.

For your own and others' safety and well-being contact the Housing Authority if you have ANY problem with housing in Lewisburg. You can do so anonymously if you telephone.

Use of force justified and necessary

Americans rightfully support a defense of liberty and freedom after attack

By Tom Elliott
Staff Writer

In last week's letter to the editor, Professor Chenoweth takes about 700 words to make essentially one weak and fallacious point: that retaliatory strikes are improper because they equate to more terrorism.

He advocates that Americans should accept and embrace the notion that we are helpless against such acts of terrorism. He does so in this statement, "I believe that if we aspire to be agents against hate and violence, we must accept the reality of our helplessness in the face of acts of terror."

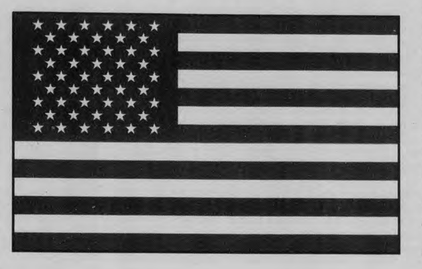
He believes that if we declare war on terrorists and those who harbor them, then we are adopting terrorist practices. His alternative, "As part of efforts to purge ourselves of helplessness, in the face of acts of terror, I think we must try to dissuade U.S. leaders from adopting terror in our names." This is exactly wrong. "Many, if not most, Americans do not want the U.S. government to adopt terrorist practices, even in response to terrorism." Wrong again.

Many Americans have a different view from Professor Chenoweth's: it is right to defend ourselves, and it is not terrorism to do so. In a New York Times/CBS poll released Sunday, 85 percent of Americans support military action against terrorists and those who harbor them.

Americans understand that it's far different to defend oneself from terrorism than to participate in actual acts of terrorism. Terrorism is killing innocent people in an attempt to make a political statement. To equate retaliation and self-defense with terrorism is intellectually indefensible, and in fact, suicidal. Can there be any clearer lesson from the annals of history than that weakness begets aggression?

Hitler was an evil monster who could have been stopped early on. Instead, each instance of appeasement by Britain and France only whetted his appetite and emboldened him toward bigger and more bloodthirsty aggression.

Osama Bin Laden is cut from the same cruel cloth. He allegedly masterminded the murder and mayhem at the U.S. embassies in Africa—and we did nothing. He allegedly spearheaded the attack against the USS Cole, killing 22 sailors—and we responded with only words and tears. Bin Laden exulted that the sight of flying body parts would "fill your heart with joy." And he has vowed to defeat the United States and expel us from the Middle East because "America is much weaker than it seems."



Thankfully, America is not weak. No, we are a country that, historically, has not only understood that there is good and there is evil, but also that we must defend the former and oppose the latter. Were it not so, we would all be speaking German or Russian, and Professor Chenoweth would not enjoy the freedom and the security to criticize his country from the comfort of his office at Bucknell.

The America I am referring to sits righteously upon a hill, shining brightly as the beacon of freedom and good will. We are a reliable partner to those fighting the battle against persecution and tyranny. It is written in the Bible that at the end of time, all of Israel's allies will have abandoned them. Today, we are Israel's last real ally. Because of this, we have become the most sought-after recipient of terrorism.

The victims of this heinous act of wickedness shall never be forgotten, and will always be remembered as Americans who suffered unfortunate deaths because they embraced the values of the greatest country in the world. It is without coincidence that these men and women were true representatives of what America is.

They were taking opportunity by the reins and getting what was able to be won from this system. They were heroic firemen, police officers and medical personnel who, in the face of paramount danger, hurried to the center of it, for the sake of getting others out — the definition of heroism. They were the victims of the most unspeakable travesty in this country's short history.

The angry and furious rage that immediately follows such unprovoked attacks upon innocent citizens is both right and just. However, it must be a controlled rage with structured parameters. This is the next Pearl Harbor and it deserves the same response-a swift, severe and effective attack on the perpetrators that serves both as retribution and deterrence.

In 1986, Libyan terrorists bombed a Berlin disco, wounding over 200 and killing two American servicemen. President Reagan was not apathetic, not satisfied with sanctions or trade restrictions, but conversely, determined to get tough on terrorism. He bombed various strategic targets to serve as a reminder that you don't sucker-punch the strongest and most powerful nation in the world. A victim of the bombings was the adopted daughter of Colonel Muammar Qaddafi, the Libyan chief leader.

On the day of the bombings Reagan commented, "Today we have done what we had to do. Qaddafi counted on America to be passive, he counted wrong." Ever since then, Qaddafi has made a pledge to eradicate terrorism from his homeland. The once notorious hotbed for state-sponsored terrorism has been quelled, and has recently been removed from the United States' annual list on global terrorism.

We must retaliate not only against the masterminds of the operation, but the nations that provide them solace and a safe haven to craft these extravagant works of evil. They, too, bear responsibility for this.

It is clear that the Islamic supremacist movement equates Americans with Israelites on too great a level. Like the all-too-standard display in East Jerusalem after some sort of small scale victory over Israelites, Palestinians were rejoicing in the streets, brimming with happiness over the deaths of thousands of innocent Americans and inducing fury among the rest of us. Citizens in Iraq, Egypt and Lebanon all had similar displays of glee over our tragedy. This is no longer possible to be resolved with diplomats at Camp David—it's clear that these hardliners have a brash perception of their relationship with the United States.

This country is too proud, its destiny too great, its mission too valiant, to be offset by cowardly men who think they can spark a revolution through craven and malicious acts. It is right to avenge the unjust deaths of our fellow countrymen with a massive retaliation that will leave a deep premonition of America's feelings towards such decadent actions upon our own. We will not stand by idly while our nemeses rejoice in their freakish and arcane glory.

As we continue to learn more and more about what happened ten days ago and who was responsible, Americans become focused on the United States' response to the acts of terrorism. On the national level, a war on terrorism is imminent and necessary; what kind of struggle is undertaken is the question of the day.

Foremost, any war on terrorism must focus solely on terrorists, their supporters and any government or organization which protects or in any way aids those perpetrators. There is a legal precedent for this; just as it is a crime to aid any suspected criminal in the United States, it is equally a crime to aid any criminal throughout the world.

Just as importantly, is the truth that great care must be taken not to abuse or in any avoidable way harm those people who have committed no crime, either in carrying out these attacks or helping those who did.

To abuse innocents simply due to geographic proximity or ethnic and religious similarity would be to give excuse, not cause or justification, to future terrorists. In consideration of the goal to cease terrorism, we must take all available steps to not inflame or radicalize a population whose only fault is living in proximity to the guilty.

This fundamental distinction between those who should be punished and those who do not deserve to be punished is important for another reason: justice. In order for the United States to continue to be the shining star in the Western world of justice, we must not fall to a level of revenge against a group of people based on their physical and religious similarities to the terrorists.

This attack was so appalling because, in addition to the massive loss of life, the targets of the attack were wholly innocent civilians. We must not retaliate in a similar manner that places altogether innocent civilians in danger.

In keeping with the tradition of justice that this country is based on, every effort should be taken to capture and put on trial the leaders of this attack, rather than killing them. The reaction of almost everyone, myself included, is to hunt down and execute these attackers. And while there may be personal justification of that action, we must together resist and show the rest of the world that we do no operate through martial law and mobocracy, regardless of the situation.

The capture, extradition, and trial of those leaders will make a lasting and resounding statement; that the United States will continue to be a country of justice. Our actions and responses must show that no act will goad us, the citizens of the United States, into a street fight on the level of barbarians.

This country and the people of it must take great pains to avoid any wrongful and abusive treatment of Muslims, Arabs, Middle-Easterners or any other group that would be similar to the unjust treatment of Japanese Americans during World War II. No racist or otherwise unsavory actions should be permitted to occur on any level, individual to national.

With all the discussions of national options, we must not lose sight of what each person can and must do in response. We must not allow ourselves or any other person to target people for any form of harassment who only look like those actually responsible. We must come together as a people, as Bucknellians, as Americans, to support and appreciate each other.

Above all, we must continue to do those things that differentiate America from the rest of the world. Apart from increased security, we must not let these attacks change us and our American lifestyles. This was an attack on America for being Americans; the goal was to change America and Americans—we must not change! We will win this war with terrorism if and only if Americans continue to be Americans.

Social scene comforts

Students cautiously venture back out

The stressed questions this past weekend seemed to be, should we really go out tonight? Do you think it's right? Would other people be upset to see us out? The general result was that it was okay to go out with the understanding it would not be like any other weekend at Bucknell. Advice from President Rogers was to use "restraint" while also being "careful and safe."

Having Friday a National Day of Mourning along with a unifying prayer service at Rooke Chapel put Bucknell students in the right frame of mind. Being on the east coast we are more intimately affected than most of the United States. With the realization that the healing process after this national disaster is going to be a long and bumpy road, students came together in and out of community settings.

Last weekend, going to a Bucknell "social event" not only meant enjoying some much needed smiles, but also openly being able to appreciate friends. All around students were hugging and laughing, sharing stories, happy and sad, coming together on their own demonstrating the strength of our school. With inspiration stemming from President Roger's compassionate e-mails, Bucknell's handling of this national trauma has been undeniably admirable.

The opinion articles and letters represent the views of the author and not necessarily those of The Bucknellian or Bucknell University.

Peace can only come from peace

The path towards a peaceful world requires diplomacy and restraint

By Lina Nandy
Staff Writer

I don't think that I have words that are adequate to describe the depth of grief and loss that I feel. I don't know if there are any, although it seems as if that breathless wake of Tuesday that we are all still struggling to find them, searching for anything that can put a voice to our emotion.

To be sure, loss is not the only emotion that has filled our hearts. The tragedies remain, and will continue to do so, as a testament of unspeakable and unjustifiable violence, something that arouses universal anger.

However, as 50,000 reservists return to active duty, and calls to arms are being heralded across the nation and across campus, I call upon the Bucknell community—and the American community—to let peace prevail.

We are all looking for that eye, a tangible shred of gratification from which we can derive some satisfaction. War will not, and cannot, sate this.

Who would we wage it against? If, as the increasing evidence suggests, Osama bin Laden or his followers are to blame, then who do they represent? Afghanistan is in the middle of a civil war, and although the Taliban may have power, it does not necessarily have control, represents only a fraction of the Afghan people and not a nation.

Too, there have been incidents of ignorance and bigotry, where people have associated Osama bin Laden with Islam and singled out Muslims for attack. Osama bin Laden does not represent Islam, either.

The Koran is very specific about what constitutes reasons for jihad, which in Arabic means struggle, and not—as seems to be the popular misconception—holy war. Jihad can only be committed as a defense and not as an offense (Koran 2:192-193) and if the transgressors indeed seek peace, then the Koran states that Muslims have an obligation to accept that peace (Koran 4:90). Bin Laden certainly does not represent Islam.

And what of the people celebrating in the streets? Education is a very relative term, and for many, they have been taught that the United States is an arrogant, brutal nation that bases its foreign policy on bias. And as insensitive and infuriating as the footage was, these are people with grievances that are not completely unfounded. We trained Osama bin Laden to help get the Soviet Union out of Afghanistan. We trained and gave financial support to Manuel Noriega, a known drug trafficker and money launderer, and then decided that he was disposable, and invaded his government in 1989. More than a million Iraqis have died of malnutrition since the United States began its sanctions in 1990, and self-sufficiency is impossible, as they cannot crop-dust because of U.S.-imposed no-fly zones. Under the Clinton administration, we bombed Sudan without any stated pretext whatsoever and then blocked inquiry when the United Nations began to investigate. There are countless instances where we have made terrible foreign policy decisions that we have lived to regret, but others, sadly, have lived to experience. In no way does this vindicate terrorism, but it provides insight into what inflames others just as the current events inflame us.

Finally, even if a single nation was wholly responsible for the tragedies, the very fact that no one knows who is to blame denotes the potentially guilty country as one that is not democratic, and thus invalidates the equation of its government with its people. Do not tell me that if we wage war against any country that we will not kill unarmed, innocent civilians. Do not tell me that their lives are worth any less than those that were lost in the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Do not tell me that their lives are any less precious. We have endured and mourned an act of war for which there is no country for us to retaliate upon. It has not left us without a process through which just retribution can be served.

The United Nations, of which we are a leading member, has a war crimes tribunal that is specifically designed to punish those who have committed terrible crimes and brought grief to humanity. We are not alone in our suffering, nor are we alone in our resolve. Still, as the pace quickens in Washington for our resolve to be proven through war, I think it's important for us to think of alternatives that are fairer and more effective in time.

Gandhi once said, "There is no way to peace. Peace is the way." If we strive to reach peace, we must realize that peace is then the destination and the journey. The United States has shown remarkable resolve through these trying times, but war will only beget war and take us further from the just order we want for us and the world. Let us resolve for peace.

An abroad perspective: a year traveling and studying throughout Europe

"If there's an experience in front of you, have it," reads the mantra by which I guide my choices. This thought gave me the foresight to leave the University and the United States for nearly a full year, to seize the opportunity to study abroad in London and Amsterdam and travel through western Europe for three months.

Stepping outside my small circles, both at school and at home in Park City, Utah, allowed me the perspective to value both the beauty and ugliness of my tiny world. Viewed from the outside, our lives take on completely new meanings.

The first page of my weathered journal reads: "the journey begins." At first I imagined this year as a new journey, separate from my "real" life. I failed to see the continuum that my travels were apart of, the unending discovery of the self. In other words, I was scared.

I hand many expectations without really knowing anything at all about what I would encounter. A friend later illuminated the difference between expectation and possibility: since we cannot know what lies ahead, we can only look to the possibilities the future holds.

London is a city dripping with possibility. It pours out of the sky in the form of incessant rain. However, the program I was interested in, Marymount College's Drama Program, kept me out of the rain for most of the day and into the night when we attended countless theatre productions. Though I didn't get to travel four days out of the week like other abroad students, I learned how to back flip, head kick, successfully perform Shakespeare, write my own play and become the color purple while working with some of the most talented individuals in the theatre world.

After a short return to the States, I continued the experience with a semester in Amsterdam, The Netherlands. If you are reading this, thinking marijuana and prostitution, you are absolutely right. You also completely miss the point.

The Dutch base their approach to these untouchables in American society on a principle embodied in the word gedogen. We do not have the ability to exactly define this in English, but it is most similar to tolerance. Rather than deny individuals the right to decide for themselves the way they will conduct their lives, the Dutch prefer to preserve the right to choose without criminalizing individuals for the choices they make that do not harm others.

Intrigued with this issue, I studied in the School for International Training's program on Sexuality, Gender and Identity in the Netherlands where the concept of gedogen was a central theme of our studies. The diversity in the group of 10 that I studied with surpassed the entire sum of diversity on the University campus, and the benefit of their perspectives is something I could not gain elsewhere. Our studies ranged from tours of the red light district guided by a male-to-female transsexual, to attending the first gay marriage in the Netherlands. These are certainly things I could never experience in Lewisburg, Pa.

At the end of the semester, before we each began a month long independent study project, we performed pieces to encapsulate our individual experiences for the semester. A classmate wrote a poem poignantly titled "Rain" in which she described her impulse to come to Amsterdam: "Rain washes us clean so that we may see again / I came to see again." Her words struck a chord deep within my soul, this experience was all about seeing myself and my world through new eyes enriched by new perspectives.

And so, I embarked on the third part of my experience: traveling around Europe with one of my close friends. Brand-spanking-new backpacks filled with clean clothes, travelers cheques, an unlimited three-month Eurail Pass, passports, and thirty rolls of film, we had only one question, "Will we survive?" With the hindsight I now possess, this is such a laughable concern, so naïve, ridden with uncertainty and skepticism of myself and the surrounding world.

We thrived. We flourished every day meeting new challenges where the journey oftentimes surpassed the destination. The countless run-ins we had with other travelers racing from one place to the next in a desperate attempt to get the picture of the Eiffel Tower, "Do Rome" and write gloating emails home made us feel so grateful for the time to experience a place, rather than to merely "do" it. Of course, you can't experience it all, but on this trip I finally understood the value of going with the flow.

Though we felt a pressure to do the things one is supposed to do when traveling Europe, we soon learned to ditch our guidebook and follow our interests, which led us to the Basque country of France and Spain where I fulfilled my dream of learning to surf.

We hiked the gorgeous cliffs of the Cinque Terre on the Ligure Coast of Italy, reveling in the pristine blue-green of the Mediterranean Sea. I spent my birthday on the colorful island of Burano, Italy and took in the most spectacular sunset ever on the beaches of Rimini, Italy. We kayaked the clear blue water of the Socca River in Slovenia and spent a weekend with friends cruising the Croatian seaside. We visited friends in Tromso, Norway, where the sun never set, and experienced Christiania, an experimental free-state in Copenhagen.

Remembering these experiences brings a smile to my face. I only hope that others will seize the opportunity to study and travel abroad.

Many people will say it is an experience that changes you, yet I believe it simply offers you the chance for a new perspective. I went to Berlin in the middle of February; it was the worst trip of my life. Not only was I completely frozen, but the trip we took to Ravensbruck, a former women's concentration camp, left me limp with devastation for days. I thought the whole city was cold, heartless and cruel. I never gave it a chance.

Despite my adamant protests, we went back to Berlin in July. Another defining moment for me occurred here when I saw the city through completely new eyes. I had let the exterior of the city and the reputation I associated with it color my initial perception. I had expectations that it would be a cold, heartless and cruel city, and sao for me it was. But when I was able to lift the veil off my mind, I saw what an incredible city Berlin is: rich with culture, diversity and progressiveness.

I will not abandon my quest for perspective, and I am already searching for the next opportunity. I am endlessly grateful for the initial journey and await the possibilities that lie ahead in my future.

I wish to all the same chance to explore your world and yourselves by leaping outside the "bubble" and embracing every experience that comes your way.

Eloiza Domingo brings new energy and awareness to multiculturalism on campus

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Features Editor

A breath of fresh air has swept through the Office of Multicultural Affairs with the recent selection of Eloiza Domingo as its new director. This appointment not only filled an administrative position that has been vacant for five years, but after only three months, has Domingo proudly proclaiming the Office of Multicultural Affairs as having "a new energy, a new focus and a new look."

Born in Indianapolis, Domingo grew up in Evansville, Ind. In 1999 she graduated from Indiana University with a bachelor's degree in psychology and sociology and a spanish minor. In 2001, she received her master's degree, specializing in diversity training and conflict resolution.

Before Domingo, Interim Directors that coordinated office activities lacked her diversity leadership and training experience. None of these directors, however, remained in the position for an extended period of time, nor did they have Domingo's specified training.

Domingo feels that her arrival is well timed, emphasizing that with the expansion of the diversity effort, the need for someone on campus to lead the way proves critical. "The students were really thirsty for someone to call a full-time director, someone to be here all the time for them," Domingo said.

Domingo was willing to fill this position, her first job since graduating in May. "I'm excited to be the first full time director in five years. I look back and see what a lucky time this is for me right now. A lot of people I graduated with have good jobs, but they look at them as stepping-stones, whereas I see that I hit the jackpot. I found exactly what I was looking for," Domingo said.

Director of Multicultural Affairs is a job that Domingo feels suits her perfectly. For her, it possesses the ideal combination of an administrative position with one that affords constant contact with students. "Students are at the forefront. You have to be in touch with the students or else you cannot move forward in your initiative. That is actually what really brought me here, the administrative touch but concentration on students and the ability to work with students. The balance is incredible," Domingo said.

In her short time at the University, Domingo has already established many goals, both for her role on campus and the role of the Office of Multicultural Affairs. This year, the primary goal of the office is to establish itself as a strictly professional office, whose resources and projects are familiar to each member of the campus community. Ultimately, Domingo would like everyone on campus to know both what the Office of Multicultural Affairs does and why it exists on campus.

Director of Multicultural Affairs Eloiza Domingo looks to remind the University community of the importance of multiculturism.

"Multiculturism touches every aspect of this University. It is not just the students of color, and it's not just the minority students. It's about all of us. I hope the University can look to this office for leadership and to remember that multiculturism is a thread that runs through every aspect of the University community," Domingo said.

Domingo envisions reminding the community of the importance of multiculturism as one of her personal missions, dubbing her office the "multicultural conscience" of the community. "I am here to continue to remind the University that this is important and to have different aspects of multiculturism to touch all things that come out of the University system," Domingo said.

Domingo also has high expectations for students, encouraging them to be more active to have more of a voice on campus. "I like to challenge the students to step up. If they have complaints they need to also counter those complaints with constructive ways to change things," Domingo said.

One such example is the University's Ribbon Campaign, established in honor of the victims of the recent acts of terrorism in the United States. Domingo cites this as purely a student organized effort, coordinated by Azizeh Salloum, President of the Middle Eastern Association.

"Here at the University, because we are so small, the hurt is just magnified. We are surrounded by it," Domingo said. "We needed to do something symbolic of community, solidarity and family."

Students have embraced the movement, and as a result, it will not end with the ribbon campaign, but will include many other student-initiated efforts. "I'm really moved by it all. I cannot say how proud I am that they started and are continuing to pursue this," Domingo said.

Domingo stresses this relationship between taking the leadership initiative during undergraduate life and continuing it in the future, hoping to prepare students for the world that awaits them after graduation.

"I want the students to look at themselves not just as student leaders but also as individuals in a larger world. If they can learn leadership skills and can learn to find their place here in the University system then they can use those skills and go out and succeed in the larger world. Its all about making sure that you are a well-rounded person before you leave the University's walls, from the security," Domingo said.

As for her personal security, Domingo has already found it in the University. "I feel very safe here. I feel very at home. I definitely see myself as part of this community," Domingo said. "The students and the community have just enhanced that. I really cannot say enough about how the University just opened its doors to me."

Bostwick boasts new changes

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

This semester, Bostwick Cafeteria has implemented numerous menu and organizational changes in hopes of better serving University students and faculty. "We've increased variety and expanded most of our stations," said Tim Tenon, manager of Dinning Services.

For instance, one does not have to wait for the Tuesday and Thursday taco bar. The new Southwest station is now open daily for lunch and dinner, including a large selection of fixings to make your own taco or fajita.

The Grill Station has also expanded so that hungry University students can always have a hamburger, grilled cheese or a veggie burger. Additionally, the new Pacific Rim station has a variety of stir-fry rice. Daily specials are offered at all of these stations in hopes of further increasing variety for patrons.

Perhaps the most long awaited change is in Top Hits, where manager Tenon intends to offer a vegan menu in conjunction with the popular Salad Bar, both of which aim towards healthier meals by supplying more fruits and vegetables.

The dessert area is probably one of the most visited sections of the Cafeteria. Beginning this semester, pudding, Jell-O and cookies are always available at every meal. In addition, there are numerous toppings offered for the 16 flavors of ice cream and frozen yogurt.

Despite the increased availability of a variety of foods, some students appear unsatisfied. First-year students were by far the most critical of the cafeteria food. Though many praised the Pasta station and Salad Bar, they often commented that food tended to be repetitive and unhealthy. Some also mentioned that lines were too long and crowded at lunch and dinner.

On the other hand, most upperclassman students have indeed recognized the changes. "The caf has much more variety and better organization than it did my freshman year," Cara Pericelli '02 said.

For the most part, juniors and seniors are satisfied by the changes in the caf, recommending to first-year students to steer clear of too many fried foods in order to maintain a healthy diet. However, one must take into consideration that unlike the first-year students, upperclassmen generally do not eat all their meals in the caf. This distinction could make all the difference.

It is certainly unfortunate though, that some students are not positively responding to the changes. Those students who frequently requested more taco days, for instance, are still unsatisfied or bored with the menu. Now that most items are always available, the food selection appears unchanging, and many do not even acknowledge the existence of daily specials.

Fortunately, this does not discourage dinning services. At the Sept. 13 Food Fair in the Terrace Room, students could sample and rate a variety of new food items that may soon be offered all over campus.

Spinach and ricotta filled rigatoni, cream cheese filled pretzels and turkey burgers all appeared to be hits among the taste-testers. New packaged snacks, such as low-fat Chex-Mix and flavored sparkling waters, may also soon be available at the Bison and in Larison.

Though it may appear to some students that the caf is ignoring their needs, Dining Services is undoubtedly trying. The staff regularly checks the comment board and responds quickly.

Ultimately, all students should recognize that if they are unsatisfied with the food that is prepared in the caf, there are numerous stations where they can cook their own meals.

At Pacific Rim, frying pans to make stir-fry are always available as well as a helpful staff if you find yourself at a loss as to how to cook. The omelet station is also open during all meals, and there are two new sandwich makers for those who want to make their own grilled sandwiches. One can even make a fancy desert of waffles covered with ice cream and strawberries in about two minutes. With minimal effort, one can conjure some delicious creations that will satisfy any craving.

Schweizer pursues intellectual developement

By Katy Zachary
Senior Writer

Whether you know him as your English professor, the director of the English Department's Graduate Program, the former Bucknell en France director or the director of the Humanistic Scholars Program, Professor of English Harold Schweizer is a man worth knowing.

Schweizer exudes a unique combination of both intellect and sincerity that has earned him the admiration of students and colleagues alike. He is distinguished as a scholar, having contributed to, edited and written numerous critical works as well as having attended and participated in international conferences revolving around areas of specific literary study.

Scholarship is nothing new to Schweizer. He was born and educated in Switzerland and travelled extensively throughout Europe for several years. He is fluent in four languages: High German, Swiss German, English and French and is able to read and speak Swedish. During his graduate work at the University of Zurich, Schweizer made his first trip to the United States. After tutoring at a small southern college and working as a cowboy on a Montana ranch for a year, which he insists this was the most disillusioning job he ever had, Schweizer returned to Europe.

Professor of English Harold Schweizer was recently awarded the distinguished Cook Award for Travel.

After receiving his Ph.D. from the University of Zurich in Switzerland, he was awarded an ACLA Fellowship to conduct post-graduate work in the United States at SUNY Buffalo and Yale University. In 1987, shortly after his post-graduate studies, he assumed his position at the University.

"I was deeply impressed by the University," Schweizer said. "I was positively impressed. I was very, very challenged by the quality of teaching and research that was expected at the University."

Once he arrived, it did not take long for Schweizer to become an active member of the University's intellectual community. One of his most involved roles has been the director of the Humanistic Scholars Program, which began as the Humanities Residential College. Schweizer, in collaboration with some of his colleagues, decided to implement three foundation courses for this program instead of continuing with the standard one foundation seminar.

"The three courses for the Humanistic Scholars Program give the students, in my opinion, solid and critical understanding of our Western tradition," Schweizer said.

Recently Schweizer received a prestigious grant that enabled him to conduct research outside of the University. At the University, professors are eligible to apply for grants that serve as venues for study and research beyond the classroom. Schweizer was the recipient of the distinguished Cook Award for Travel, which funds professors who wish to do research for their own enrichment, instead of as part of an academic program. This began Schweizer's quest to trace the escape of three children from Holland by train across war-torn Germany and into Austria.

Six years ago, Schweizer received a tape-recorded story detailing the events of three siblings who, at the end of WWII, lost both their home and parents under very dramatic circumstances.

"This story was extremely revealing to me, not only because it exemplified something about the war, about traumas from the war, but also because the person who told the story was my aunt, and the story involved both my aunt and my mother. I had never before known what I then began to learn about my mother, and it began to explain a lot," Schweizer said.

Professor Schweizer, an extensive researcher in the area of human suffering and mourning, started to apply his background knowledge to his mother's tragic childhood story.

"For me, what was very important about that story was to have an exemplification of what it means to mourn and what it means to be melancholy and to personify these two positions so closely to my own life," Schweizer said. "When I finally applied for the grant, I felt it was a tremendous privilege to be allowed to go back into the past like that and to consciously think about the time that has elapsed and the losses that the past has exacted from my family."

After examining and processing his newly revealed heritage, Schweizer decided to re-live and re-imagine the traumatic journey that his mother and her siblings took across Germany, as narrated on the tape. His journey commenced this past August.

"I traced their family history in the archives and found evidence of their dispossession, the death of their mother, the drafting of their father into the Germany army. I then undertook the same train ride that they undertook from Holland to Cologne (Germany) and from there to Austria," Schweizer said.

From this enriching experience, Schweizer not only gained access to some causes of his mother's melancholy, but he incorporated his travel experience into his past academic work. In 1997, he organized a session at a conference in Holland on the subject of history and suffering. In addition, he included the detailed story of his mother's traumatic childhood experience in "History and Memory: Suffering and Art" (1998), a book which he edited.

The author of numerous publications ranging from recent books such as "Suffering and the Remedy of Art" (1997) to prestigious journal articles found in "Literature and Medicine and Literature and Psychology," Schweizer does not lay claim to one piece of work which brings him the most pride.

"I would not be extremely proud of any one of my publications," Schweizer said. "Publications are works that one abandons rather than concludes. Publications are always of preliminary value. They are stations in a process of intellectual development."

Schweizer's philosophy towards the continual process of intellectual development is apparent to his students. "In a classroom setting, he's able to draw many connections between the syllabus material and outside sources, such as literature, music, art, and history," said Christen Braun '02, a member of the Humanistic Scholars Program as well as a one of Schweizer's students for three years. "He is a man that possesses extreme knowledge and understanding. His passion of both teaching and learning is very apparent," Braun said.

Of highest importance to Schweizer is the act of teaching. While on sabbatical last spring he continued the production of his personal scholarship, traveling, writing, and attending international conferences. Yet, something proved lacking. "I realized during my sabbatical something I always knew: that I love to teach. I need my students, and I need to talk to my students," Schweizer said.

Schweizer feels that his teaching must facilitate his students' intellectual thinking about certain issues and problems, a sentiment successfully conveyed to his students.

"There are not many professors who can engage students in a classroom setting quite like Professor Schweizer," Erica Delsandro '02 said.

Delsandro has known Schweizer since she first came to the University three years ago. "Professor Schweizer continually confirms my own ambitions and desires for continuing education after my undergraduate years. He has shown me worth and value of literary studies, both its application in academia, as well as, and perhaps, more importantly, its application in my life," Delsandro said.

Schweizer positively influences and contributes to those that he teaches as well the community that surrounds him. Many recognize his qualities and expertise.

"Professor Schweizer is always probing and pushing his students to give their best and test their boundaries, yet he has never stopped testing himself," Delsandro said. "Perhaps that is what is most influential about Professor Schweizer: his example."

Camp Adventure challenges ROTC cadets

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

This summer 11 University students participated in the Annual Bison Battalion Camp Adventure Training from Aug. 20-23. They were among 45 new ROTC Army cadets who spent four days at Fort Indiantown Gap, in Annville, Pa.

Aimed primarily to those students who have never been involved in ROTC, first and second-year students constituted the majority of the camp's participants. New cadets learned about ROTC and gained hands-on experience in programs available through ROTC and the United States Army.

Major Smyth, the program coordinator, explains that Camp Adventure encourages cadets to learn the importance of leadership.

"It provides the cadets a chance to practice and hone their leadership skills. The camp also gives cadets from different school the opportunity to meet each other," Major Smyth said.

In addition to University cadets, the ROTC Bison Battalion welcomes Army cadets from Bloomsburg University, Susquehanna University, Pennsylvania College of Technology at Pennsylvania State University and Lycoming College. Cadets from each school attended this year's Camp Adventure.

The activities of Camp Adventure exposed the new candidates to various elements of military life. They lived in barracks, participated in group physical training, learned to fire a M16 A2 rifle, practiced rope repelling and challenged themselves on the obstacle courses. The most popular activities included the flight simulator for the Cobra attack helicopter. To round off the experience, cadets participated in open door flights in the UH-1 and Chinook aircrafts.

The four-day training exercise ended with the cadets being airlifted to the Army National Guard armory in Lewisburg, Pa. Once there, they took part in a picnic before returning to their respective schools to begin the new school year.

Proving its success, all 45 participating candidates enrolled in the Army ROTC program.

Scientists discover new pill to lessen effects of hangovers

By Parker Terril
Staff Writer

Walking down to the Langone Center at 2 p.m. on a Sunday afternoon, you already feel a little nauseous from the events of the night before. You walk into the cafeteria and gobble down your breakfast. Walking back to your room, you decide to go back to bed, only to wake up at 7 p.m. giving yourself just enough time to finish your homework.

A whole day wasted.

Now imagine this: you are strolling merrily down to the LC on Sunday morning, entering the caf you are surprised to find that your food is actually still hot. What is going on? At this point you realize that you are feeling good, and it is only 9 a.m.

Why is this, you might ask? Perhaps because you took some HPF before you went out the night before. HPF, Hangover Prevention Formula, is manufactured and distributed by Perfect Equation Inc.

HPF is an herbal suppiement derived from the fruit of the prickly pear. Perfect Equation (TM) claims that a team of French scientists discovered that when ingested the fruit causes levels of HSPs (heat shock proteins) in the human body to increase. HSPs protect organisms against physical stress.

The scientific team believed that the key was to find a way to increase the body's natural HSP levels without causing any physical side effects. It was not beyond the realm of reason that an extract of a plant possessing an amazing level of survivability could possibly enhance the ability of the human body to accelerate its HSP synthesis.

The formula is a secret blend that multiplies the curing power of the plant and significantly raises HSP levels.

The team of researchers named the extract formula TexOE(tm), which is the key ingredient in the HPF Hangover Prevention Formula (tm).

In this manner, such an extract could protect human beings against many types of physical aggressions—including alcohol. Numerous clinical tests have proved the scientists' theory to be correct. The best part is it is legal.

Don't get too excited though. Herbal supplements are not regulated by the FDA and therefore are not proven to work, or even be safe.

However, it has gotten rave reviews by Tom Hallman in a comedic article in August's issue of Esquire magazine. More information is available at http://www.perfectequation.net.

The manufacturers warn not to drink more than you would in a normal night. The pill does not allow you to drink as much as you would like without consequences. It merely relieves the symptoms of a hangover caused from normal drinking.

Give it a try and see for yourself, what could it hurt?

With the existence of RSA and other strong methods of encryption, there is understandable fear that encryption will become a tool of terrorists. According to Wired, Osama bin Laden is a "crypto-aficionado," and if he is behind the attacks on Tuesday, he probably did use some form of strong encryption while communicating with his associates. From this comes Congress' desire to weaken encryption software, in the hopes of being able to intercept the private communications of terrorists.

However, giving the government backdoors into people's encryption software solves absolutely nothing, and would probably only cause more problems. First, many strong encryption algorithms are publicly available. For example, in the CSCI 241 class here at the University, the textbook discusses RSA, and time is spent covering it in class. Since the algorithms are publicly available, anyone who knows how to program could write a piece of software to encrypt messages for them, and there would be no need to use "backdoored" software.

A programmer in the United States who works on encryption software would probably include a government-accessible backdoor to avoid prosecution under whatever bill may be proposed here, but there is no assurance that a programmer working for a terrorist group would do so.

If the U.S. government is provided a backdoor to the encrypted messages, other governments would want access as well, or else they would ban the import of American-made encryption software. China, for example, is probably not going to let the U.S. government read its citizens' mail, unless we give it similar access to U.S. email accounts. Finally, there is no guarentee that individuals or groups would not be able to find a way to take advantage of the backdoored software.

While some Americans may be willing to let Uncle Sam read their private communications, very few would be happy to know that foreign governments and bored 13-year-old computer crackers could also access their email.

Ultimately, the proposal to provide a government backdoor into encryption software merely threatens the privacy of American citizens, while doing nothing to prevent terrorists from using encryption for their own purposes.

This seems to be little more than an excuse by one or more legislators to pose for the camera and claim they are "tough on terrorism"; while in reality they are hurting the American public. Ben Franklin said it best when he said, "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Microsoft's Windows XP: good or bad?

By Jennifer Bunch
Staff Writer

Barely a year after its last major release Windows Milennium Edition went on sale. Microsoft has recently finshed work on the newest version of its Windows operating system—Windows XP. Already available in some new computers, Windows XP will go on sale for upgrade Oct. 25.

According to The New York Times, most tests indicate that XP is very stable. Windows XP is also compatible with many more programs than its predecessors—an estimated 12,000 programs will run on XP, compared to 6,000 on Windows 2000.

Windows XP's emphasis on customization even allows different users to have different settings. When a particular user changes the computer's settings, the changes will only be applied when that user is logged on. Windows XP remembers everything about personalized desktops, and even returns users to the programs they used the last time they logged on.

In Windows XP, the Windows interface has undegone its largest revision since the desktop screen was introduced in Windows 95. When the computer is first booted up, the desktop is completely empty, save for the recycle bin icon. The user can customize the rest of the desktop. The look of the desktop is also substantially changed, boasting little animations, more appealing color, and redesigned icons, all of which seem to resemble the interface of Windows' primary competitor, Macintosh.

The Start menu has also been improved. Two columns allow for one side to hold all the commonly-used programs, while the other side contains all other programs. It is important to note that one of XP's new features allows users to deactivate almost any of the changes made from the earlier Windows versions to XP creating a desktop similar to Windows Millennium Edition.

A number of the new features are designed to save the ordinary user time. For example, simply dragging files onto the CD Burner icon puts those files into a CD. XP can also reduce the size of pictures and other files to make transferring and e-mailing them easier and quicker. With today's new internet focus, XP even has the power to let tech-help people actually see, and even change your desktop in order to better help you.

Along with the upgrades to Windows itself, Windows XP includes Internet Explorer version 6.0 which includes protective measures to stop hackers. Most of the new features center around music, graphics, and communication. For example, plugging in a digital camera automatically opens an interface between the computer and the camera, and the program comes with several instant messeging programs.

There are a number of new improved security features in Windows XP, many of which also limit the functionality of the computer. Most notable is the copy-protection software, which registers the particular computer being used with a copy of Windows XP. The copy is registered with Microsoft when it first connects to the Internet.

If a registered copy of Windows XP is used with an unregistered computer, the program will cease to function entirely. Another unfortunate side effect of this policy is that if enough of a registered computer's hardware is upgraded, XP will not recognize it as the same computer. For this reason, Microsoft requires that XP users re-register their computers after changing six hardware components.

Other new policies include the deletion of java page support. As in previous programs, Windows XP will not support QuickTime or Real Player files. Users will also be required to log in with a username and password when they boot up the computer. This was optional in previous versions of Windows.

Minimal requirements to support Windows XP are 400 megahertz and 128 megabytes of RAM, but for general purposes, the best way to get the program is to get a new computer. For those that want to brave the upgrade, kits can be purchased for $100.

Ryen Herrmann reflects on dance career at BU

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

You may not recognize her on the streets of Lewisburg, but if you've attended any Bucknell Dance Company productions, you have most likely caught a glimpse of senior Ryen Herrmann. Herrmann is the president of the Bucknell Dance Company, and in her last year at Bucknell, she continues to take her role in the Company seriously.

"My job is to keep everyone level-headed and make newcomers feel welcome," Herrmann said.

Herrmann, a Geology major with minors in Dance and French, has been dancing on and off since she was young, dabbling in styles such as ballet and jazz.

"I was even a clogger at one time," she said, laughing.

However, her desire to dance became more serious when she hit high school, and she has danced continuously for the past eight years, concentrating on modern dance.

Herrmann attended a boarding school during her high school years, which she felt was an advantage to her dancing opportunities.

"The college search system was very rigorous. They wanted to help me find something that would accommodate my interests," she said.

The University recruited Herrmann for dance. She arrived, tried out, and has been in the Company since freshman year. However, her focus was not limited strictly to dance when she made her college decision.

"I wanted to find a school with a good dance program, but I also wanted to concentrate on the academic side," she said. "Bucknell seemed like an ideal place to balance the two. The fact that I was recruited and wanted by the University also played a role."

Er-Dong Hu, Associate Professor of Theatre, views Herrmann as an eager and willing participant and leader in the Dance Company.

"Since her arrival as a freshman, Ryen has been an integral part of the Bucknell Dance Company, culminating with her election as president this year," he said. "She consistently challenges herself, stretching artistic expression with multiple dance forms and styles. Her contributions and hard work are essential to the success of our program and company."

Danna Frangione, Associate Professor of Dance, agrees that Herrmann's leadership and energy are indispensable.

"A woman of great physical presence, Ryen has been a strong and active force in the Bucknell Dance Company and Choreographer's Showcase since her first year at the University," she said. "As a dancer, she is both a challenge and a joy to work with, presenting an interesting mixture of intellectual questioning and physical energy. She possesses great passion to achieve as an artist and is currently working in the two companies as dancer, choreographer and motivated leader."

Herrmann describes the Company as "extraordinary" and compares it to a family, saying it is a place of comfort and security. This sense of family is partly due to the fact that once you become a part of the Company, you're in for good.

"It [the Company] has been able to maintain a sense of generosity and compassion," she said. "It's a safe haven. Once you're in, you're in for all four years. It takes away the competition with your fellow dancers and becomes a home. The first objective of the Company is to accommodate all of the dancers."

The Dance Company even provides opportunities for people who want to dance but are not Company members. Through the Choreographer's Showcase, non-members try out and get the chance to perform with the Company.

Herrmann believes that the opportunity to dance is a relaxing and liberating experience—a great remedy for stress.

"Because of dance classes, we can go and escape everything," she said. "We can just move and let go."

Because of this freedom, dance is different from the run-of-the-mill graded course. Many classes are very cut and dry, based on letter grades received on isolated test or quizzes. Dance takes a unique approach.

"Dance is not just a one-time deal or grade—you don't just get a C," she said. "You are graded on your personal achievement, based on where you start and what your goals are. If you're having a bad day, your grade won't automatically suffer. You just try to improve next time. Because of this, the Dance program is one of the most supportive and successful programs."

Herrmann's family has also been supportive of her decision to dance. Her parents are both actors, and Herrmann grew up in dressing rooms and on movie sets, giving her insight into the art world.

"I come from a culture-driven family," she said. "There's something I can connect with more in the art world. That's why I try to avoid modern technology. It seems so impersonal. I'd much rather write a letter than an e-mail—it's so much more expressive and emotion-driven."

She says her father, Edward Herrmann '65, a Bucknell alum and well-known performer, never forced her into the realm of acting.

"He has never pushed me to perform," she said. "Many actors get their kids to shy away from acting and performance. My parents gave me a choice. Still, it's fascinating to watch someone transform into someone else, then they come off the stage and they're Mommy and Daddy again."

As for her own future plans, Herrmann is not sure what she wants to do.

"I'm very interested in social work. I'd like to try out for some dance companies. I grew up in the west and I love the outdoors, so I'd be perfectly happy being a gardener. My brother is a wonderful chef, so I'm also considering being a pastry chef," she said. "I don't know ... I'm just going to go with the flow and see what happens."

Herrmann doesn't have to look that far ahead yet—she's going to be keeping busy this year. Among her plans are dancing in a flamenco piece and choreographing a showcase piece.

"I want to accommodate the girls who are graduating soon and give them a last chance," she said.

In the end, what Herrmann really wants for her last year at the University is happiness and peace of mind.

"I want a sense of balance," she said. "It's an idealistic desire, but it's pretty typical. I want to try to be happy and content wherever I am, and I want to be able to dance as much as I can. I want to leave Bucknell with the feeling that I've accomplished something."

Summer blockbuster "American Pie 2" is even sweeter than the first

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

The film that brought new meaning to a much-loved American dessert and coined the phrase, "This one time, at band camp...," has returned with more sex, angst and comedy—without the pie.

The boys are back after their first year of college, and they're more than psyched to spend the summer together and relive their high school years. The summer vacation starts out with a bang when Jim gets a surprise call from past-flame and Czech bombshell Nadia, who plans to visit and continue their Internet-induced fling from high school. Meanwhile, Kevin convinces the guys to go to Lake Michigan so they can enjoy their freedom and party all summer long.

What ensues are sex-obsessed and insane antics similar to that of the original movie, though surprisingly not as gross. The initial shock has worn off since the original American Pie and audiences are now prepared for anything.

Jim (Jason Biggs) spends his time struggling to prepare himself for Nadia's arrival. He fumbles his way through lessons on male-female intimacy from flutist Michelle (Alyson Hannigan), Jim's prom date from American Pie. The reigning queen of band camp is more than willing to give him some sex tips.

Oz (Chris Klein) is still a one-woman man, and he and Heather (Mena Suvari) attempt to endure a long-distance relationship as she studies abroad in Spain for the summer. Meanwhile, the always calm-and-collected Finch (Eddie Kaye Thomas) anxiously awaits a reunion with his true love—Stifler's mom.

Stifler (Seann William Scott) returns as the crazy party boy that everyone loves to hate. His over-the-top behavior drives his pals up the wall, but sends the audience into hysterics.

Last but not least, exes Kevin (Thomas Ian Nicholas) and Vicky (Tara Reid) reunite, though not with the same intentions—Kevin experiences some of the old feelings, while Vicky wants to "just be friends."

The film is full of hilarious moments, from witty one-liners to disastrous debacles. One comic highlight is the return of Jim's dad (Eugene Levy), the always sympathetic and supportive father, to the scene of every humiliating situation ready to give an encouraging word to his son.

Biggs plays sweet, dorky and sexually-inexperienced Jim, the guy who suffers constant embarrassment. Like the original, he is the main focus of the film. However, the other characters don't receive as much screen-time as they did in the first movie. They still have subplots, but their characters seem to fade into the background.

The film also seems to concentrate more on the relationship between the boys, leaving the girls on the side. Heather is almost non-existent, and although Vicky appears once in a while, her unmasked pity toward Kevin is embarrassing and patronizing.

The film emphasizes male bonding, which makes it more endearing to audiences. It gives its viewers refreshing insight into a group of male friends who would basically do anything for each other.

Another satisfying facet of American Pie 2 is the growing relationship between Jim and Michelle; as she guides him towards greatness, Jim begins to question what he wants.

In the end, it's the genuine friendship, unlikely romances, and unbridled comedy that makes the second helping of "Pie" even sweeter than the first.

Uptown hosts fun-filled karaoke contest

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Karaoke, a classic bar pastime, brought many students to Uptown last Saturday night. Sponsored by ACE, the contest created an incentive by offering a cash prize to the winners.

The talent scale ranged from zero to a perfect ten while the songs varied, including selections from Britney Spears, the Cardigans and the Dixie Chicks.

Group acts and soloists alike left all inhibitions in the dorm rooms, belting out songs and setting feet dancing.

The crowd was upbeat and fun, often singing along to old favorites.

"It was crazy and stupid fun," Eileen Ketterer '05 said.

Ketterer and roommate Ashley Aiken '05, performed "Doo Wah Diddy," and admitted that making a fool of yourself ranks as one of karaoke's best features.

First place winners Dave Carlibardi '05, Brian Raves '05 and John Siwicki '05 joined the contest at the last minute.

Inspired by Raves's new haircut (a kickin' Justin Timberlake style), the trio grabbed the opportunity to sing "Crazy" by Britney Spears. A hit with the crowd, the act even featured choreographed moves.

All of the acts contributed to the success of the first contest, with an encore expected after fall break.

Questions concerning the upcoming contests may be directed to Tasha Heim, manager of Uptown, at the CAP Center.

So warm up your vocal chords, select a funky song, and have a blast! Or, if you prefer, just hang out and watch friends make fools of themselves.

Fall TV season has only a few bright spots

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

When the fall television season premieres begin, we look forward to nestling into familiar shows such as "Friends," "Will and Grace" and "The Simpsons"—shows that have been around and have established themselves as entertaining viewing experiences. However, every new season brings the unknown—the question of what new shows will be introduced and whether they have what it takes to survive the first crucial weeks of programming.

From what I've seen, it's not looking good. Not only is reality television getting out of control, even the dying breed of the sitcom consists of half-baked plots performed by has-been actors. There are a few shows with potential, but they are outnumbered by programs that are simply bad.

NBC recently launched the show "Lost," where random people are dumped somewhere "on planet Earth" and forced to find their way back. They have limited resources, and race in teams to make it home first. Although it is another reality TV show, it's not a completely horrible idea, and will most likely appeal to fans of "Survivor."

But, "Love Cruise: The Maiden Voyage?" You've got to be kidding. Fox introduces some kind of twisted dating game that takes place at sea. Eight men and eight women are put on a boat to flirt shamelessly, play games of Truth or Dare, and vote each other off—oh, and find the time to form meaningful relationships.

Would you really want your love life to be restricted to a pool of eight people? The previews alone are enough to make me lose my lunch.

The WB is not doing much better by bringing us "Raising Dad," a show starring "Full House" actor Bob Saget. On the WB11 site, the show is described as "a family-friendly series about a single dad raising two daughters"—throw in another daughter, Uncle Jesse and Joey, and the plot will seem vaguely familiar ... Danny Tanner, how could you?

Unfortunately, that's not the worst the WB has to offer. Reba McEntire stars in her own show, "Reba." Her husband leaves her for a younger woman, her teenage daughter is pregnant—it sounds like a country song. All they need to do is shoot her dog.

While there are some duds looming this season, do not despair. There are a few bright beacons in the distance. ABC presents "Philly," a show starring Kim Delaney ("NYPD Blue") as a lawyer fresh out of law school and the head of her own firm. Granted, law shows are becoming pretty common, but don't dismiss the case too quickly.

"Undeclared" comes to Fox—a comedy about Steven Karp, a high school geek who has the chance to start fresh in college at the University of North Eastern California. He makes some quirky and neurotic friends as he tries to figure out what he wants to do with his life. It has potential.

Two other shows to watch for are CBS's "The Education of Max Bickford" and the WB's "Smallville." Academy-award winner Richard Dreyfuss plays the title character in "Bickford," a widower who teaches at a single-sex female college while raising his two children. It's slightly reminiscent of Dreyfuss's film "Mr. Holland's Opus," but that was a good movie, and it is Richard Dreyfuss after all. Meanwhile, "Smallville" gives a more in-depth look at the teenage years of Clark Kent, later known as Superman, as he grows up in Smallville, Kan. With a friend like young Lex Luthor, who needs enemies?

Overall, the fall season offers a variety of new programs. Some will have more staying power than others, but the deciding factor will be the period after the premieres. Which shows will be gone before you can say "WB!" You'll have to watch and find out.

America's Operation Infinite Justice

By Tom Elliott
Staff Writer

At the time of this printing, America may be engaged in a war. It is also possible that the American people may know nothing about it.

President Bush has pledged that there will be an effective, appropriate and sustained retaliation to the terrorist strikes. He has also made it known that we will be engaging in a new and different style of warfare, one that we have never seen before. With each passing day, it becomes increasingly evident that this is in fact the case.

The indications of what to expect hover around President Bush's statement on the day of the attacks, "...we will make no distinction between terrorists and those who harbor them." It is speculated that this will mean taking out all terrorists camps in Arab countries and dismantling the Taliban government in Afghanistan as well.

However, nothing can be said with certainty. Pentagon sources have said that this "new war" against terrorism is going to be fought with unprecedented secrecy, which includes heavy press restrictions.

"I want to make it clear to the American people that this administration will not talk about any plans we may or may not have," President Bush said on Monday. "We will not jeopardize in any way, shape or form, anybody who wears the uniform of the United States."

This means that unlike the Gulf War, there will be no television reports from warships, or first hand accounts from the frontlines during America's war on terrorism.

The U.S. Defense Department has ceased posting the general locations of U.S. warships in response to this escalating scenario. The Web pages that used to post this information have not been updated since Sept. 10, the day before the attacks. The Pentagon announced that it will no longer allow reporters to be deployed with troops, or report from warships both of which were popular during the Persian Gulf War.

On Wednesday, the Pentagon announced it was moving 100 strike aircraft to the Persian Gulf region in anticipation of a coming war to combat terrorism.

The rationale, according to the Pentagon, is that these terrorist groups have no real intelligence gathering abilities and rely heavily on news agencies to stay updated on what their enemies are doing. However, the Pentagon did tell the press that they had ordered approximately 100 U.S. strike aircraft to the Persian Gulf. Also, the USS Theodore Roosevelt battle group left Norfolk, Va yesterday. There is nothing unusual about the timing since the group was set for deployment even before the attacks. However, the deployment zone has switched from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf "or maybe a little farther east." It is also rumored that the USS Kitty Hawk battle group will set sail from Japan soon for an undisclosed location.

This will likely be the case for most actions as America enters into this "new war." Most Americans will hear of strikes or offensives after they actually take place.

The offensive will likely have three fronts. With their allies, America will engage in an unprecedented intelligence campaign to learn as much as possible about terrorist cells around the world. The second aspect will probably involve strategic air strikes using fighter aircraft and cruise missiles. Finally, there will presumably be a ground assault with the first wave involving special forces followed by an all out ground war.

Meanwhile, the Middle East has been bracing itself for whatever is to come. Afghanistan, according to Pakistani army officials, has moved a large arsenal of Scud missiles to its border with Pakistan. Pakistan, Iran and China have closed their borders with Afghanistan, not wanting to be permeable to fleeing refugees and terrorists. "Stay united and prepare for jihad [holy war] against U.S. invaders," the official Bakhtar news agency reported Afghans were being told Tuesday.

"The accusations against Osama bin Laden are baseless and a pretext to attack Afghanistan. God is on our side, and if the world's people try to set fire to Afghanistan, God will protect us and help us," said Mullah Mohammed Hasan Akhund, the deputy Taliban leader, on Monday, according to the state-run Radio Shariat. "If America attacks our homes, it is necessary for all Muslims, especially for Afghans, to wage a holy war."

Retired Air Force General Brent Scowcroft, former President Bush's national security adviser, has commented that the strikes may take some time, for they need careful planning. On Fox News he commented, "When President Clinton was faced with the bombing of the embassies in Africa, we attacked a pharmaceutical plant in Sudan and we attacked an Osama bin Laden camp in Afghanistan. The camp was empty. The pharmaceutical plant turned out to be just a pharmaceutical plant. The effect: We looked weak. We looked like we don't know what we're doing."

President Bush seems to be in the same mindset. "When I take action," he said, "I'm not going to fire a $2 million missile at a $10 empty tent and hit a camel in the butt. It's going to be decisive."

Would you support the U.S. military taking action if it lasted for several months?

President Bush rallies the World

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Following several emotional public appearances, the president's approval rating has surged to around 85 percent, up from 51 percent before the crisis. The majority of Americans also support his plans to strike back militarily at terrorists and the states that harbor them.

President Bush asked Congress for a $20 billion aid package; Congress delivered $40 billion by unanimous votes in both the House of Representatives and the Senate. The House and the Senate also passed resolutions authorizing the president to use "all necessary and appropriate force" against those responsible for the terrorist attacks. That resolution passed almost unanimously in the Senate and 420-1 in the House.

A statue in front of NATO Headquarters in Belgium.

Even Senator Hillary Clinton (D-NY), the wife of the man Bush replaced in the White House, said, "I am very grateful to the President. We have to stand behind our President and each other for a long time to come."

Foreign nations and their leaders have also rallied behind the United States and its cause.

NATO declared on Sept. 12 that if the terrorist attacks on the US were directed from abroad, they will be considered an attack on all NATO members. Article Five of the Washington Treaty, which set up NATO during the early years of the Cold War, provides for such an action, but has never been invoked before. NATO's press release explaining its decision stated that, "[T]he United States' NATO Allies stand ready to provide the assistance that may be required as a consequence of these acts of barbarism."

Tony Blair, Prime Minister of Great Britain, and Jacques Chirac, President of France, have scheduled visits to Washington to express support for the United States. Blair described the attacks on the United States as "hideous and foul," and Chirac said that the French are "completely determined to fight by your side this new type of evil, of absolute evil, which is terrorism."

Support also came from President Kim Dae-jung of South Korea, who wrote a letter to President Bush saying, "I assure you that as a close U.S. ally, South Korea will provide all necessary cooperation and assistance ... and will take part in the international coalition to support the U.S. actions against terrorism."

The new Prime Minister of Japan, Junichiro Koizumi, has pledged to support the United States. Japan's constitution permits it only a self-defense military, but the Japanese government expects to contribute supplies and logistical support.

Support has also come from some seemingly unlikely quarters. Bangladesh has promised to allow the United States to use its airspace, Kyrgyzstan and India have pledged to share intelligence information with the United States. Syria, Iran, the United Arab Emirates, China and Saudi Arabia have said they will support U.S. anti-terrorism efforts. The Bush administration has put out diplomatic feelers in Sudan and Cuba as well.

Perhaps most significantly Pakistan, which borders Afghanistan—where prime suspect Osama bin Laden is thought to live—has agreed to close its border with Afghanistan and to allow its airspace and territory to be used for a possible attack on Afghanistan. Pakistan also sent a diplomatic team to try to convince the Taliban, Afghanistan's ruling militia, to extradite bin Laden but negotiations were unsuccessful.

Financial markets retreat as economy enters war mode

The American spirit was evident on Monday as a large American Flag was draped over the marble columns of the NYSE.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

For the first time since the terrorist attacks, all of America's financial markets opened on Monday. Unfortunately, a 50 basis point rate cut by the Federal Open Markets Committee and a patriotic spirit could not keep the markets afloat. As many predicted, the markets took heavy hits in their first day of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average had it worst point loss in history, closing down nearly 700 points. However, the percentage loss was only the 14th worst in the history of the market. As was expected, airline and travel industries were hit hard in trading, and the general shock of the situation caused broad selling in many other industries as well.

Some bright spots in the market were defense stocks like Raytheon and General Dynamics as well as companies that produce security equipment for airports. While the initial sell-off had been predicted, the lack of a rebound due to continuing weakness in the market has been more disheartening.

The Dow remained flat on Tuesday, and closed down 147.30 on Wednesday. However, the fact that the Dow rallied nearly 230 points in the last half hour of trading on Wednesday has given some hope that a recovery is on the way. The rally occurred after an announcement by the Pentagon ordering over 100 planes to the Persian Gulf. As one hedge fund manager put it "We've gone from a victim to a conqueror."

While weakening markets are certainly a cause for concern, the country may have larger problems on hand as it appears the economy may be entering a tailspin. The previously beleaguered airline industry appears to be nearing collapse after a week of almost no revenue. Nearly every major airline as well as airline manufacturer Boeing laid-off employees this week as the companies prepare for meager times.

Citizen's newfound fear of air travel is not only hurting the airline industry, but others as well. Major tourist destinations such as Disneyland and Las Vegas have seen a large drop off in business during the past few days, and the situation is not likely to improve any time soon. Airline industry representatives are desperately lobbying Congress and the President for a bailout package that could total over $20 billion saying that without financial help several airlines could enter bankruptcy. Although insurance companies are saying that industry earnings will be hurt, they are quick to point out that they have plenty of capital to cover the costs facing them in the wake of the attacks.

The government has also taken other steps to alleviate pressure on the economy. The Securities and Exchange Commission has loosened laws regarding company buybacks, allowing firms to repurchase there own stock almost whenever they want. There is also talk of lifting some of the merger legislation regarding the airline industry to promote consolidation. This could aid the companies in surviving the tough times ahead.

The Federal Government also faces a challenge in restoring confidence in consumers. Despite the fact that there has been a massive outpouring of patriotism since last Tuesday, many are worried that consumers are entering a "defensive" state-of-mind, choosing to save rather than spend. Congress is currently seeking the advice of Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, and Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neil in drafting a financial stimulus package to prevent the economy from slipping further into decline. One idea currently on the table is to cut the capital gains tax rates, thereby inducing investment in the markets.

There will also be a large increase in government spending both for defense and for economic stimulus. The economy was on rough terrain even before last week's attacks. Now, with the economy sliding towards recession, it will be up to the government and the American people to stop it.

Members of Muslim Student Association respond to terrorist attacks

B&P asked Omar Zalatimo and Tamanna Laila Hye from the Bucknell Muslim Student Association for their reactions to last Tuesday's attacks and the events unfolding in the aftermath.

B&P: What were your general reactions to Tuesday's events?

T.H.: My reaction was one of horror because NYC is my home. I am angered and feel very violated by the terrorist acts.

O.Z.: I was shocked and horrified that anyone could do such an act.

B&P: Most of America has reacted to the crisis with prayer and patriotism. However, there are an increasing number of incidents involving violence against Americans of Middle Eastern descent. Has this changed your view of America?

T.H.: Americans have a right to be angry. The nation's capital was violated. But it is important to not label all Middle Easterners as terrorists. I can understand if anger makes people hostile against another group, but it's not fair to start pointing fingers. I actually thought Americans would be more knowledgeable about other ethnicity and not start to point fingers. I am surprised by the reaction.

O.Z.: No, although there have been a significant number of such incidents, there has been a great deal of support to Americans of Middle Eastern descent and American Muslims.

B&P: Have you personally encountered any such reactions on campus or in town?

T.H.: I have encountered such reactions in my own dorm. People are surprised to hear that Islam is peaceful religion, and Muslims are peaceful people.

O.Z.: Yes, nothing severe, but blanket statements heard in class and around campus.

B&P: How do you feel about the possible retaliation of America against nations harboring terrorists and the possible Holy War that might ensue?

T.H.: Coming from a Muslim perspective, it is forbidden to wage Holy War on innocent people. What non-Muslims don't understand is that Holy War is used at the ultimate extreme form. You don't wage one for the sake of protection just because you think you are right, and "they" are wrong. I would like the United States to find bin Laden and bring justice. This is my home and I want justice to be served.

O.Z.: I do not support the killing of any civilians.

B&P: Do you trust the American government to respect the rights of all citizens, or do you worry that your rights may be infringed in months following the investigation?

T.H.: I trust the American government. I know that it is reasonable and many Muslims live in this country. They know we don't all think like terrorists.

O.Z.: I do not think there is going to be a repeat of what happened to the Japenese in WWII, we as a society have grown since then.

Vision 2010 slowly develops

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

In his first convocation speech last fall, "Assets and Challenges," University President Steffen Rogers introduced the concept of Vision 2010, a new 10-year plan that would emerge in the months following his inauguration. Vision 2010, he said, would "be patterned after our present 10-year plan, be built on that document and be our blueprint for the future."

Special Report

However, in the months since Rogers' speech, the University has heard little about Vision 2010 and what is being said cannot be taken as fact, including the possibility of eliminating off-campus housing by 2010.

This week, Rogers and several other members of the faculty and administration involved in the planning process spoke to The Bucknellian to clarify the concepts of Vision 2010 and its introduction to the campus.

According to Provost and Vice President for Academic Affairs Steve Bowen, Vision 2010 is a strategic planning program for Bucknell that will shape the University over the next nine years. Previous strategic plans from the 1990s have now expired and, as Bowen says, it is important for the University to develop new plans and establish new goals.

Professor of English and Chair of the Faculty Michael Payne describes Vision 2010 not only as a 10-year planning and readjustment period, but also as a period of self-evaluation.

The University, Payne says, has created adjustment and strategic plans in the past, but this plan may be getting more attention because of the almost entirely new leadership in the upper administrative ranks.

The planning process, Bowen says, will include all campus constituencies. A steering committee will be established to oversee the planning, but existing governing bodies will also participate. Several students will be included in the steering committee, giving the student body the opportunity to voice their opinions as well.

According to Rogers, the vice presidents will create specific plans for their divisions and then incorporate them into the overall plan. The goal, he says, is to offer "the best undergraduate experience in the country."

Rogers says that no major changes in direction will take place, but rather the University will "take the things we do very well right now and make them a little bit better."

Bowen agrees, stating that the expected changes will be subtle and any significant changes will be phased in.

"It is another small step in the continuing evolution of the University," Bowen said.

The process will touch on all aspects of University life, from finances to admissions to curriculum, and will set priorities for the future. Students, Rogers says, can see visible changes already in the construction of the new athletic center, geology and psychology building and the introduction of a bio-engineering program.

According to Payne, in previous decades, strategic plan goals included increasing campus diversity, reviewing salaries and compensation, reviewing SAT targets, introducing new scholarships, altering admissions standards and improving the quality of campus life.

Lema joins administrative team as VPFA

New Vice President of Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema brings noteworthy experience, writes Staff Writer Michelle Dombeck

When Jo-Anne Lema was appointed Vice-President of Finance and Administration last June, the University gained an invaluable asset. Lema is not only highly qualified, but brings a genuine enthusiasm to her new position.

Lema is one of the chief financial officers, in charge of construction and many other services like personnel, food services, the bookstore and the physical plant. Lema also plays a key role in planning the University's $150,000,000 budget.

"Planning this budget is like trying to steer a $150,000,000 ship in the right direction," Lema said.

Lema is originally from New England and has spent most of her career there. Prior to coming to the University, she had been working at Saint Paul's School in Concord, N.H., one of the top three independent secondary schools in the nation. Her desire to work in higher education drew her from Saint Paul's to the University.

"Bucknell has a wonderful reputation in the higher education community as being strong academically," Lema said. "This year's successful capital campaign showed that others feel Bucknell is a respectable university and agreed on its good reputation and its potential for growth."

University President Steffen Rogers said Lema was chosen from a pool of highly qualified applicants.

"We were very lucky to get Jo-Anne Lema," Rogers said. "She has a wealth and variety of experience at higher education settings, including MIT."

In addition, Lema has also worked at Bryant College.

Lema recognizes that her position has many challenges, but she is eager to face them.

"It's exciting to be here right now. The University is about to launch a new strategic planning initiative, and that gives us the opportunity to shape the future," Lema said.

Lema also felt that the people at the University were truly dedicated to its well-being.

Concert Committee brings Live to the Gerhard Fieldhouse Nov. 3

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer

After a brief three and a half week recording session at the end of their "The Distance to Here" world tour, the band Live will be headlining the Ford Focus Tour which includes a Nov. 3 performance at the University. This tour follows the release of their fifth album titled V which features songs such as "Deep Enough" (heard in the film, "The Fast and the Furious"), "Forever May Not Be Long Enough" (the theme song to the movie "The Mummy Returns") and "Overcome," which conveys the events of the Sept. 11 tragedies.

Live consists of Ed Kowalczyk (vocals), Chad Taylor (guitar), Patrick Dahlheimer (bass) and Chad Gracey (drums). The band has received international acclaim with their 1994 hit album Throwing Copper, which pulled in 27 platinum albums in six countries and sold 12 million records worldwide. Some of their most familiar songs include "I Alone," "All Over You" and "Lightning Crashes." They have been featured on Spin and Rolling Stone cover stories and have been part of a legendary MTV "Unplugged" event.

Kowalczyk also appeared on "The Tonight Show" with Jay Leno Thursday, Sept. 27 to perform "Overcome," and the band joined Nelly Furtado, Shaggy, Barenaked Ladies, Sarah McLachlan and numerous other big names in music to broadcast a concert called "Music Without Borders: A National Benefit Concert and Discussion Forum." This performance helped "shed light on the emotions, issues, and questions surrounding the Sept. 11 tragedies" and there were donations collected for the Canadian Red Cross.

Live will be in concert at Bucknell's Gerhard Fieldhouse on Saturday, Nov. 3. Tickets go on sale to students with BUID Oct. 8 for $20 and to the general public on Oct. 11 for $25. Tickets will be available at the Bookstore.

Kari Conrad, assistant dean of students and director of Campus Activities and Programs and Concert Committee Members Martin Pfinsgraff '03 and Jacqueline Flicker '02 said it was difficult for the committee to come up with music that is new and meets the kind of music students want.

The committee uses campus surveys to help determine which groups the campus wants.

"Live has always been in the top three," Flicker said.

Conrad said she is "really proud of [the concert committee] for doing all their homework for their surveys." She also commented that the University has been in contact with several radio stations very interested in the Live concert and she believes the "turnout for Live's type of music should be positive."

Uptown extends hours to increase attendance

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

The hours of operation at Uptown, the University's uphill nightclub, increased this semester. Prior to September, Uptown was only open Friday and Saturday nights, preventing students' access to its facilities during the week.

This year, Uptown will be open on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays from 8 p.m. until 12 a.m. Uptown is also able to be rented out Wednesday nights by groups on campus. It will continue to be open on Friday and Saturday nights from 9:30 p.m. until 2 a.m. There will still be programs on the weekends.

Jason Rubinstein—The Bucknellian

Kerry O'Donnell, the chair of Student Affairs Committee for BSG said, "We thought the biggest hurdle to overcome was the image of Uptown as an empty place where no one goes on Friday and Saturday. We felt if we could create an image of Uptown as a fun hang-out where students go, they will want to return on weekends for the programs. "We pushed this idea very hard and are excited to see our intended results realized. Attendance has greatly improved, much thanks to Tasha Heim, the manager of Uptown."

Tasha Heim, the manager of Uptown said, "The hours were changed to accommodate needs. The students needed to use it more often. Now what the students do at 7th Street, they can also do at Up-

Committee begins search for full-time General Counsel

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

Although the University began the year with 4 newly appointed upper administrators, the search is still on for another position—one possibly more important than any of those that were filled in the past four months.

The General Counsel is the University's chief lawyer. They are responsible for directing all legal actions even slightly related to the University, advising University President Steffen Rogers on legal matters and handling many of the day-to-day legal concerns that arise from serving a community of more than 4,000 people. In addition, the Counsel is a member of the administrative council—the advisory body which reports directly to President Rogers.

The position has been open since Richard Zansitis, the former Counsel, left the University in the spring of 2001. Since then, Wayne Bromfield, an adjunct professor and former county judge, has been acting as Interim Counsel.

The search committee, chaired by Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, is responsible for evaluating everyone who applies for the Counsel position.

"We will look at each candidate's resume, their list of achievements, and, when we feel it's warranted, we will call the applicant to campus for an interview," Pollock said.

Pollock's committee is comprised of an experienced administrative team.

"The search committee represents a broad spectrum of departments that routinely work with the General Counsel, and the members know what to expect from this position," Pollock said.

Eventually, the committee intends to narrow the search to between three and five applicants, at which time President Rogers will choose a new Counsel from that group.

"We'd like to complete the search this semester," Pollock said. "That's a very ambitious timetable, but we think it's feasible."

> "We'd like to complete the search this semester. That's a very ambitious timetable, but we think it's feasible.
> —Charles Pollock '70, vice president for student affairs and chair of the search committee.

The committee will begin reviewing applications the week of Oct. 1 and is comprised of Pollock, Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt, Interim Director of Personnel Services Marcia Hoffman, Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema, Interim Dean of the College of Engineering James Orbison and Interim Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences Mark Padilla, all of whom have worked with previous Counsels.

town. Students can even go to Uptown just to watch television, listen to the music, and order snacks."

Assistant dean of students and Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kari Conrad explained that the money for the increase in hours came from the CAP center's budget. Due to student demand, more funds were placed towards Uptown. During the week, Uptown is staffed by students.

> "Now what the students do at 7th Street, they can also do at Uptown.

The Student Affairs Committee of BSG worked hand in hand with the Office of Campus Activities and Programs and ACE to revamp Uptown.

"BSG sent out surveys to students to determine what would be the best times to open. We then voted in Congress to support the extension of hours at Uptown. It was approved," O'Donnell said.

Assistant director of Campus Activities and Programs Carolyn Strickland is pleased to see students' reatcion to new hours.

"The students have been excited about the changes in hours. Uptown now seems like a more student-friendly place for them to come. We have only been open for about two weeks now, but response seems good. We are anxious to see the results over the year," said Carolyn Strickland assistant director of Campus Activities and Programs.

Heim hopes these new hours will benefit the student body here at Bucknell.

"I think it gives students a haven to get out of their rooms and interact with other students on any weeknight," Heim said.

The idea of Uptown was first conceived of several years ago.

"Several years ago, students approached the dean of students because they had nowhere outside of Greek Life to get together and listen to music on the weekends," Conrad said. "When the funding was secured in the fall of 1998, a Board of Managers was put together."

This board of managers consisted of six students representing different facets of campus life. These students made a huge commitment to Uptown. The board decided issues on topics ranging from the colors to architecture to the type of music that would be played.

Uptown, now open during the week, will have a weekly showing of the television sitcom series, "Friends."

impression that Vision 2010 is centered around the goal of moving students out of the downtown area and back to campus. Moving students back to campus is a part of Vision 2010, Rogers says, but it is not the major focus. The move back to campus will not only include the elimination of downtown student housing, but the elimination of Bucknell West as well.

> The majority of students participating in a survey did not support the idea [of the elimination of downtown housing].

Construction of new residence halls will begin within the next three to four years.

He states that the move back on campus has little to do with improving relations with the Lewisburg community, but rather is in the hope of having students participate in campus life for their full four years at the University. The move, he says, will be phased in.

Arthur Gulden '03 did extensive research over the summer on the plan to move students back to campus. His research indicates that the process is divided into three phases, the first of which— the construction of a new residence hall to reduce overcrowding— has been completed. The second and third phases will include the construction of more residence halls and the official moving of students back to campus, but Gulden states that the University needs to purchase additional land before any construction is possible.

The elimination of downtown housing appears to be the aspect of the plan that will most impact students. As part of his research, Gulden polled students to get their views on the move. He received responses from approximately 20 percent of the student body.

The majority of the students who participated in his survey did not support the idea. The students polled also unanimously agreed that "the elimination of off-campus housing would change their Bucknell experience socially or culturally."

> Both Rogers and Bowen expect a positive student reaction, because, as Bowen says, "We are taking good care of the University."

Aside from the issue of off-campus housing, Payne believes the process will focus on several key topics, including student financial aid, the residential campus and residential colleges, Greek life and the use of technology. He expects that any resulting changes will be subtle, rather than drastic. His role in the process and as chair of the faculty is to ensure that the faculty governance system is fully utilized and that the issues that concern the faculty are on the agenda.

Bowen feels that Vision 2010 fits with the traditions of the University. It is a highly consultative process, he says, and therefore no one group dominates. He calls it "a plan that everybody owns."

Both Rogers and Bowen expect a positive student reaction, because, as Bowen says, "We are taking good care of their University."

Bowen is one of a team of people drawing on previous strategic planning experience to create an efficient and effective plan for Bucknell. He believes the process is beginning the right way, slowly with "deliberate discussions," and this strategy will be beneficial in the long run.

Rogers' role will be significant. He states that he will chair the entire process, which should move out of the planning phase in the next few years. He will aid help in putting together a "white paper," or detailed report, for the University Council to establish concrete plans.

"I was very impressed by the people at Bucknell. All of the people are very dedicated to the University, and are interested in it being the best it can be," Lema said.

Recently, she was touched by this dedication.

"After the tragedy a few weeks ago, all of the groundskeepers were on the alert for students in isolated places, concerned about the well-being of the students," Lema said. "When it was time for the meeting on the Academic Quad, these groundskeepers dropped everything they were doing and went to setup. This is just one example of how great the people are here."

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian

Lema, as part of the Academic Council is thoroughly enjoying the company of her new team.

"This team is phenomenal. I have healthy respect for every single person there. I trust their judgment, background and that they'll do the right thing at the right time. This kind of trust makes it easier to do my job," Lema said.

Rogers agrees with Lema as well.

"There's a strong kinship and chemistry in the whole team, as well as with the entire Bucknell Community," Rogers said. "She's fitting in very well. She's a great team player and understands her role."

World Briefs

Bin Laden arrests in Spain

MADRID, Spain—Spanish police have arrested six suspected associates of Osama bin Laden, the man Washington blames for the U.S. hijack attacks.

The Interior Ministry confirmed the arrests — the first in Spain in connection with bin Laden since the September 11 strikes — had taken place in various provincial towns in Spain.

United States Embassy under attack

ISLAMBAD, Pakistan—Thousands of anti-U.S. protesters took to the streets in the Afghan capital of Kabul on Wednesday, burning an effigy of U.S. President Bush and setting fires in the U.S. Embassy compound. Meanwhile, Afghanistan's radical Islamic militia stepped up its preparations for war with the United States.

Shouting "Long live Osama!" and "Death to America!" the protesters burned U.S. flags and stormed the old embassy compound, abandoned since 1988.

"The U.S. government should learn a lesson from our defeat of the Russians and the British," the protesters shouted.

Taliban authorities eventually dispersed the protesters and extinguished the car fires.

Bush to propose aviation security measures Thursday

WASHINGTON—President Bush will propose placing armed federal marshals on virtually all U.S. commercial air flights and significantly boosting the federal role in airport security screening as part of a package of proposed administration airline and airport security measures to be unveiled Thursday.

The administration also will embrace new measures, both short-term and long-term, designed to improve cockpit security. But the White House firmly opposes the idea of letting pilots carry handguns in the cockpit.

Delta to cut 13,000 jobs

Delta Air Lines, the nation's third-largest airline, announced plans Wednesday to cut about 13,000 employees, or about 16 percent of its staff.

The airline also will cut its flight schedule by 15 percent from its pre-terrorist attack levels, including a 50 percent drop in its Delta Express operation that primarily serves the Florida vacation market.

Tornado kills two at University of Maryland

COLLEGE PARK, Maryland—Two people were killed on the University of Maryland campus as a powerful storm system moved through the Washington area Monday, bringing heavy rains and damaging winds. Winds tossed around cars, downed power lines and damaged construction trailers at the campus as a strong storm, possibly a tornado, passed though the area, police said.

At least four people were injured, according to the Prince George's County Fire Department, and one person was trapped in debris.

Stars raise more than $150 million for terrorist attack relief

NEW YORK—Appeals by Hollywood actors and musicians during an unprecedented telethon last week generated more than $150 million in pledges to benefit families of the World Trade Center and Pentagon attack victims.

The money will be distributed through the United Way with no administrative costs deducted, organizers said on Monday.

Supreme Court to decide constitutionality of school vouchers

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to decide whether school voucher programs like those favored by the Bush administration are a constitutional use of taxpayer money.

The court said it will hear three related cases arising from a program that provides tuition aid to parents of nearly 4,000 students who have left public schools in Cleveland that their parents felt were failing.

Virus that exploits World Trade Center terror unleashed

Antivirus software vendors are warning about a new computer virus dubbed "Vote" that exploits the World Trade Center terrorist attack to entice victims to open up the dangerous attachment it carries which can wipe out files on victims' PCs.

According to Computer Associates, the Vote virus is a mass-mailer virus, seen first in North America, and is spreading across the Internet by looking at the victim's Outlook address book to mail itself off to more victims. The Vote virus arrives in the victim's e-mailbox with the subject header "Peace between America and Islam!"

Iraq's Hussein refuses sympathy to United States

BAGHDAD, Iraq—Iraqi President Saddam Hussein said Wednesday he will not offer condolences to U.S. President George W. Bush for those killed in terror attacks because the United States is "launching a war on us" and his condolences would be hypocritical.

In a meeting with a representative of Russian President Vladimir Putin, Hussein said, "Bush wants us to pay our condolences, but if I were to do that I would not be respecting my people. Bush is the president of a state that is launching a war on us ... in a mean, terroristic manner."

Student attendance increases at annual Employer Expo

The Career Development Center brings 63 organizations to the Fieldhouse.

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The Career Development Center (CDC) presented its annual Employer Expo last Friday in the Fieldhouse. With 63 organizations on hand, student attendance increased eight percent from last year. Nearly half of the senior class attended the Expo, with a total of 637 students registering.

"We were really pleased a substantial number of students attended. Several students came back multiple times and stayed longer that I thought they would have," Director of the CDC Laura Denbow said.

CDC staff was at the fieldhouse entrance to answer questions before students began their Expo search as well as to answer further questions when students left. From 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. the fieldhouse had a steady flow of students looking for possible job opportunities and information about the job search process.

Students left a good impression on many of the 16 new organizations that visited campus for the first time. Joe Herb, a recruiter for Lutheran Brotherhood, expressed his thanks in a letter to the CDC.

"Students' interest in learning what [our organization] does really stands out. In addition, I was asked by at least three different students if I needed help getting my materials back to the car," Herb said.

Even companies that continue to do on-campus recruiting at the University were impressed at the students' level of readiness.

"The candidate pool from Bucknell is always very prepared for their career search," said John Lyday, director of executive recruitment and placement for Kaufmann's Department Store. "Over the years we have hired many Bucknellians and they are very successful with our company. We plan to hire as many Bucknellians as we can for our Executive Training Program."

Companies have developed a close relationship with the University and are seeing their recruiting efforts pay off. First Vice President in the Information Services Department for First USA Bank Thomas Yannes '77 is looking forward to hiring more Bucknellians.

"[First USA Bank's] continued participation seems to be yielding benefits as we had much more traffic in our booth than in any previous career fair. We continue to be impressed with the caliber of the students are hopeful that we'll have more success with full time placements," Yannes said.

Students were enthusiastic at the opportunity to learn more about many organizations at one time.

"The Expo enabled me to connect with many employers," Cliff DeMattia '03 said. "Just from conversations I was able to further comprehend their business and become more focused on my internship search."

The Expo also brought back many alumni to aid in their respective organizations' recruiting efforts.

"I am so passionate about Bucknell and my work, which is why I decided to come back to Bucknell and talk about GE," said Laura Rendin '00, a member of General Electric Supply's Technical Sales Training Program.

New this year was the idea of a Bucknell pin in the shape of the school crest. The CDC handed out over 75 Bucknell pins, which alumni recruiters wore in order to easily stand out. Denbow explained the reasoning behind the pins.

"The pins help to facilitate conversation in what can be an intimidating situation for students. For recruiters, they won't lie to someone they know when students ask them if you like your job," Denbow said.

The CDC's alumni identification idea worked as students easily realized the alumni in the crowd.

"It made me feel more comfortable knowing I was talking to an alum, especially if the recruiter was closer to my age or I recognized them," Laura Sassano '02 said.

Chris Dinkelmeyer '02 attended the Expo, but having recently signed with the accounting firm KPMG, he was there to help recruit.

"From the opposite side of the table, I got a good look at the resumes of very qualified students looking for internships and full-time jobs," Dinkelmeyer said. "I felt that I was really more in touch with the students than most recruiters only because up until a very short time ago I was one of them, and I was also feeling the economic pressures that I'm sure many students are faced with. KPMG is interested in working with Bucknell to find fresh talent and the fact that I can be part of helping other students find jobs makes me feel contributive to other Bucknellians."

The CDC was pleased that just four companies (Aramark Facilities Services, Bloomberg Financial Markets, Northrop Grumman and Pfizer) were unable to attend Expo as a result of the New York terrorist attacks nearly three weeks ago. Bloomberg Financial Markets, Northrop Grumman and Pfizer were to be first time Expo attendees. Due to the national tragedy, many companies such as Pfizer halted all travel. Despite the fact that these organizations were unable to visit the University, resumes were still collected and mailed to the respective companies.

Last year however, the CDC planned on both an employer expo and an internship expo. Some company recruiters were a little confused in knowing this Expo could also be their chance to present internship opportunities as well as full-time positions.

"Sometimes we speak with representatives from organizations and that information is not filtered down to the recruiters who visit the campus," said Katie McDonald, CDC manager of recruiting and coordinator of the annual Employer Expo

Denbow is still uncertain as to whether there will be an internship or another type of expo next semester.

"We are taking a wait and see approach. Right now our plan is not to do one, but we are open to consider possibilities," Denbow said. "Mid to later fall employers have a better sense of their job needs. We will share with students our decision prior to Thanksgiving break."

Complementing the upcoming parents' weekend, another on campus networking event takes place today from 3 p.m. to 4 p.m. in the Terrace Room. In this inaugural year, the Parent/Student Networking Event's goal is to provide students with information about a variety of career fields so that they are able to make a better decision about choosing a career path. Parents in executive positions from CEO to President will talk with students about their represented career field, including internship and entry level positions.

Unlike the Expo, this event will have representatives from industries not present at Expo, such as communications, healthcare, law, and public relations.

"This event is not booth-like, but very informal. It will give all students some good information from significant decision-makers," Denbow said. "I wouldn't doubt the possibility of resume exchanges. This event will give students a broader reflection of the world of work as well as help educate. This program is something brand new. If parents and students enjoy the event it could be expanded in length for next year."

The Employer Expo has been held for over 25 years, yet the CDC is tirelessly planning more networking events. Students have the opportunity travel to New York City for the annual Finance Career Fair on Oct. 11.

Groups demonstrate effort

It has only been two and a half weeks since the catastrophic tragedy that occurred on Sept. 11 in New York, Pennsylvania and Washington, D.C., yet the campus community has mobilized all resources to demonstrate a tremendous philanthropic effort from many different constituencies and groups to benefit the relief efforts and victims.

The Bucknellian staff is incredibly impressed with the level of organization, planning and generosity that has gone into each fundraiser or project that supports those affected by the tragedy. While the campus is united in their efforts to help those afflicted, it's fascinating to witness the imaginative and dedicated routes that many groups have undertaken to support the cause. Some groups have opted to raise needed funds, while others have given necessary supplies such as blood. One group has even planned a long-standing project that will memorialize those affected by the attacks. It is virtually impossible to list all the efforts demonstrated by certain groups, since there has clearly been a wide-range of generous projects.

The Senior Gift Drive traditionally raises money from the senior class to give to the University as part of a large fundraising endeavor. However, this year, the group has decided to plan and raise necessary capital to create a memorial behind Rooke Chapel dedicated to the alumni, family and other members of the Bucknell community who were lost in the attacks.

Delta Gamma sorority and the sophomore Bucknell Student Government (BSG) class sold T-shirts and donated a share of each sale to support the cause. The junior BSG class creatively arranged for students to donate three meal credits, cash or declining balance to aid the Red Cross. They raised an impressive $2,100. The first-year BSG class is selling raffle tickets for a chance to win tickets to the Lifehouse concert and donating the proceeds to the Red Cross.

Management 101 companies have decided to possibly donate whatever profits they incur from their respective projects to charities related to the tragedy. Traditionally, the companies have opted to "make a difference" by donating their profits to local constituencies, a common theme across all five companies this semester is to find a charity that will make a difference to the victims of the attacks.

Many students were eager to donate their time and/or money, but the call to donate blood received a flood of willing individuals. Many local communities, churches and hospitals responded rapidly and organized blood drives to assist the blood shortage in the cities affected by the tragedy. Alpha Phi Omega, the national service fraternity, has worked hard to bring a blood drive to the University. While the organization traditionally organizes a campus blood drive, the upcoming blood drive will obviously be more successful than in years past.

The students, faculty, staff and community members have demonstrated exceptional zeal and dedication towards aiding the cause. The efforts we just listed were only a small portion of the campus community's response to the national crisis.

It is truly amazing to imagine that the University is three hours away from both New York City and Washington, D.C. and still the campus community members have illustrated that we are really not in any "bubble" in Lewisburg.

The Bucknellian applauds the efforts of all groups on campus and we hope that these endeavors continue for this cause and others.

Peace rally stays calm and patriotic

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

Saturday was one of those crisp, clear, early autumn days when anything seems possible. The patriotism so apparent in the media, that has been so easy to take unfair advantage of was challenged right here in front of the Lewisburg Post Office at noon. The respectful and peaceful rally—attended by many university students and faculty as well as local residents—was an honest attempt to question the mainstream desire for a violent retaliation for the murderous attacks on our country Sept. 11.

This rally was defined by what it was not. There were no confrontational speeches, but instead quietly crafted appeals against violence. No calls against the military itself or the soldiers under their command. No shouting of differing opinions. No confrontations with local police authorities.

The attendees of the rally were every bit as patriotic as those who died or those who are conducting the recovery operations. The role played out at the rally was that of the "other side" of patriotism. They were exercising the hard won and precious right to question the ideas and policies of our national government in this time of crisis.

The rally was not the stereotypical "hippie peace rally" of the '60s. The means of reacting to the terrorist attack without violently striking back were discussed. Concerns over the use of weapons of mass destruction and inevitable loss of innocent lives was also addressed. The social and political cooperation and organizational coordination displayed at the rally was impressive.

Alternative ideas were openly encouraged. A young man on his way to New York walking in support of those who lost their lives stated that he supported "the right of the people at the rally to question the use of violence by the military, but never to forget or disparage the soldiers themselves as happened in the past." His plea was met with respectful applause. Another speaker simply asked why the terrorists have this level of hatred against our country and was met with applause and affirmation.

History never repeats itself. This conflict will redefine us as a nation, a people, and as U.S. citizens. The less popular patriotism that was proudly displayed last Saturday argues against the negative stereotypes of the United States which terrorists embrace. In the battle of ideas, violence abandons many reasoned thought processes because solutions are made more difficult as violence escalates.

The terrorists depend on our rash responses to deepen their cause. Martyrdom is possibly their driving force. This crisis need not be resolved by violence. A non-violent conclusion does not result in increased market share or increased Neilsen's television ratings, or soothe the deep wounds of the surviving families. It does, however begin the work that is necessary within every true democracy of the careful, respectful, cultivation of thought that challenges knee-jerk violent reactions which are usually destructive and ultimately unproductive.

Hopefully the questioning patriots of Lewisburg will continue to feel free, through networking, to play their part in the democracy that is the United States. Only then can we begin to change the conditions that have spawned the terrorist mindset. That process has been set in motion. There is a new chapter being written in history. We have the opportunity to part in the outcome as individual citizens. Last Saturday's rally is just one way that we can participate.

Falwell can speak, though he shouldn't

By Peter Hackeman
Forum Layout Editor

I expect there to be popular outrage over the recent comments of Reverand Jerry Falwell, who blamed certain organizations for secularizing America and suggesting that they were partially responsible for the terrorist attacks in New York and Virginia. While there should be outrage over the content of his comments, there should not be a cry to restrict the rights granted by the First Amendment.

Unfortunately, Falwell's comments that liberal organizations and interest groups had some responsibility for the devastating terrorist attacks, is as protected by our Constitution as any other personal view. Falwell is allowed to say whatever is on his mind, as long as it doesn't violate the previously prescribed restrictions on free speech.

Falwell's exact words on a radio show were, "I really believe that the pagans and the abortionists and the feminists and the gays and the lesbians who are actively trying to make that an alternative lifestyle, the ACLU, People for the American Way—all of them who have tried to secularize America—I point the finger in their face and say, 'You helped this happen.'"

This view is possibly one of the most indefensible comments I've ever heard. But, his right to say this must be defended by members of a society where free speech is so highly valued.

In a really twisted way, his comments serve as the perfect example for why this freedom of expression is so vital to our country. The more outrageous and just plainly wrong his comment was, the more important it is to protect his right to make that comment.

> "The more outrageous and just plainly wrong his comment was, the more important it is to protect his right to make that comment.

Let me illustrate a frightful example: What if Falwell, through some quirk of the electoral system (or some Supreme Court ruling) was to become the President of the United States? He is eligible in age, citizenship and hasn't committed a felony or other disqualifying offense; he has just as much right to run as George Bush or Al Gore. And what if, as President, he signed a law that said that all of society's problems were the result of liberals and that it was now a crime to say otherwise. Now, saying anything except his venomous opinions would be illegal. The first thing any sane person would say upon hearing the new law would be that it violated the right to free speech.

It is in this way that Falwell's comments serve to remind us that it is vital that the broadest allowance possible of the freedom of speech, press and other forms of expression must be protected.

I don't think its too much of a stretch to say that the reason this provision was included in the Bill of Rights, not to mention its priority in that document, because the founders and their immediate successors understood that the right to speak freely is the most fundamental right of all Americans. They wanted to make sure that the government never dictated to the people what they could say or believe.

This right allows the people, as the audience for these expressions, to determine how much sense a comment makes, regardless of what the government thinks. As difficult as it may be, we should celebrate Falwell's right to say something that almost no one else believes, while condemning what he actually said.

If he is smarter than he seems, Falwell will stop and think next time he has the urge to spout intolerance. Unfortunately, this isn't the first time he has made headlines for his comments and it probably won't be the last. If we are smart, we won't question his right to make these comments; but, we should absolutely question the content of his comments. The more Falwell talks, the more people will realize that thinking of this kind is absurd.

If there is a silver lining to this cloud of hate, it is this: because we in America let everyone speak freely, even the idiots in our society, but we just have to listen to find out who the idiots are. By giving voice to preposterous claims as this one, we are all able to see just how far-fetched they are.

Falwell's comments of intolerance confirmed just how wrong those feelings are and by doing so publicly, let us all learn the same lesson; bigotry is unfounded and has no real place in our society.

Lyrics: Hit 'em up style or Oops?

Hit 'em up style

By Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

I was going to write an intelligent article, but then I got high. I was going to argue that music was degrading society, but then I got high. And now I'm thinking music's okay, and I know why. It's 'cause I got high, cause I got high, cause I got high.

Now I won't pretend to say that I have much respect for musicians, artists, or writers who resort to explicit words and images in order to elicit reactions from their audience. If your talents are not strong enough to stand without swears or nudity, then perhaps one should pursue a career in automotive sales. However, I will still argue that these songs exist for a purpose that is not only normal, but necessary for a society.

Every generation has its "Dennis the Menace," its Alan Ginsberg, its Afro-Man. People who push the edge of the acceptable and take a medium to new levels. It's nothing new. In the sixties, people grew their hair out to rebel against the crew cuts of the forties and fifties. Generation X-ers pierced and tattooed their bodies in protest to the "your body is a temple" propaganda in which they were raised ... freaks.

Each society finds its own distinct voice which its predecessors will inevitably reject. Some, like the "peace" and "free love" slogans of the sixties, were completely dumb, and therefore failed. Obviously the draft wasn't successful in thinning that herd.

Try to find a television show that has a grandparent figure in it who doesn't approve of "these kids and their newfangled technology." And on the other side, if they're not against the new technology, then the character is a satire of the elderly, like the "Hot Rod" Grandma. Right now, you could even ask your parents what they think of cell phones. Even I hate cell phones and I live in the mobile phone age. I notice these thirteen year olds in the theater or at the grocery store talking into their cell phones ... what's up with that? What do they have to close a deal? I can almost here their prepubescent, high-pitched voices squealing "Thirty shares of Lucent Technologies. I don't care what the portfolio ratio is, just buy!"

Afro-Man, Janet Jackson and Shaggy are not morally reprehensible. Aesthetically displeasing? Yes. Try waking up next to Gordon Dukes and see if you ever drink alcohol again. Intellectually stimulating? The only thing they're stimulating is my vomiting reflex.

They are not destroying the minds of our youth, at least no more than Michael Jackson, Billy Idol or the Ramones did to our generation. They are simply the voices of a society that groans to break free from the conventions its predecessors set.

These artists aren't the cause of society's problems, they are merely a reaction to it. Afro-Man would not be singing about getting high if people didn't, perish the thought, get high. Janet Jackson would have no audience if she commented on a man's package and suggested she "ride it tonight" if I weren't so sexy. The framework for these songs and artists are already in place in our society and they are merely reacting to public sentiment.

In addition, its not as if these songs are representative of the entire population. They appeal to just as large a segment of the world as country music, sadly enough. Not that we'd be hurting anybody by cutting these two cultures off the genetic map, but to condemn people for expressing an alternate perspective on the world is to be naïve about different social viewpoints.

I'm not claiming that these artists are making political statements or using psychological devices to make the world a better place. If they knew what half of the words I just used in that sentence meant, I would probably roll a fatty out of sheer excitement, even though I do not inhale. I'm simply saying that they are communicating themselves through a certain medium in reaction to a society that has already taking these steps in their everyday lives.

In the end, all bands sound the same. Shaggy, Puff Daddy, Aerosmith, Led Zeppelin. It's like listening to Genesis with Peter Gabriel versus listening to Genesis with Phil Collins. Has nobody picked up on the fact that they are the same person? You will never see them in a room together. It's a Clark Kent-Superman complex. And I have to say it; is Oasis not the greatest band since the Beatles?

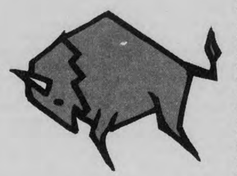
Imagine we're raising a child-this is the Bucknell family after all. I'll be his guardian, Aunt Nat, and I'll call our collective son Buck Lewis. Buck's about eight years old; he proudly wears his visor and Reefs with a neatly pressed shirt from <insert catalogue here> and always says hello with a cool, upward jerky nod of his head. But Buck has developed a problem as of late and I can't quite figure it out. He's making excuse after excuse for not cleaning his room, he won't answer me about the missing spare house key, and now he denies the credit card bill from Neiman-Marcus.



Looking for answers, I turned to the venue that soothes, comforts, entertains and raises money for disaster victims: The radio.

I think I know where Buck got the idea that it's OK to not clean his room; Afro-Man. The lyrics explained it to me, plain and simple: "I was gonna clean my room until I got high. I gonna get up and find the broom but then I got high. My room is still messed up and I know why (why man?) Cause I got high." So there's answer number one. Buck was high. Eh, that's OK. Dooood, it's only, like, what, one point or something if we, like, smoke up and, like, get caught. I can't remember. Besides, this Afro-Man guy-he's been on Billboard's Top 40 for seven weeks now and peaked at 13. Obviously, it's OK to get high if that many people have idolized this song.

But back to expanding on Buck's bizarre behavior; our spare key is missing and Buck seems to be really depressed about it. Shaggy-you know, the artist we paid to bring to campus last semester-had a similar situation in his Top 40 song, "It Wasn't Me." Geez, I thought everything was going well with Buck and his girl. Guess not. Shaggy's explanation fits though: "Honey came in and she caught me red-handed creeping with the girl next door. Picture this, we were both butt naked bangin' on the bathroom floor. How could I forget that I had given her an extra key ... "

This could be my fault though; when I heard Buck singing that line, "Picture this, we were both butt naked bangin' on the bathroom floor," I thought nothing of it. Buck's just a kid and he doesn't know what that means. Besides, if it's on the radio, it must be OK.

But now I still have those unexplained charges on my platinum card that I need to address. As I was flipping through the enormous statement, I heard Blu Cantrell's catchy tune, "Hit 'Em Up Style." Funny, those lyrics explained it all. What wisdom Top 40 music brings: "Can't believe that I caught my man cheatin,' so I found another way to make him pay for it all. So I went to Neiman-Marcus on a shopping spree, and on the way I grabbed Soley and Mia, and as the cash box rang I thought everything away ... Hey Ladies, when your man wanna get buckwild, just go back and Hit 'Em Up Style, put your hands on his cash and spend it to the last dime for all the hard times ..."

Sheesh, Buck really got himself into a mess now. He doesn't obey his ant gnat, er, Aunt Nat, and he lost his girlfriend. How can I blame him, though? I mean, it's preached over and over and over again that lying, cheating and delighting himself with psychotropic substances is cool. And we all want Buck to be cool, right?

So I haven't heard from Buck for a while ... I'll just let society continue to educate him. In the meantime I'm trying to be cooler. I was with my girls at a party, looking at his body, shakin' that thing like I never did see and I thought to myself, gee, he's "Got a nice package alright, guess I'm gonna have to ride it tonight." Maybe this weekend, I'll try to find out how many licks it takes to ...

Last I heard from Buck was a message on my answering machine from him and his friends: "Now I am a paraplegic and I know why (why man?). Because I got high, because I got high, because I got high. La da da da da da."

Falwell goes too far

Remark a dangerous step toward hate

By Maren Johnson
Forum Editor

What does "freedom of speech" mean? I am not the first person to ask, and I will not be the last. I know that I cannot use the "F" word in The Bucknellian. I know that I cannot legally write racial slurs on the side of a building. But what I would really like to know now is what the hell was Reverend Jerry Falwell thinking when he tried to pin the recent terrorist attacks on the United States onto just about every minority group, as well as groups who support minority groups, in the country? What happens when our "freedom of speech" allows us to speak far too freely? For one thing, hate. For another thing, intolerance, ignorance and, oh yes, more violence.

As a writer, I cannot deny anyone their freedom to express their opinion because I have the freedom to express mine. As a human, I am outraged and frustrated at the ignorance that abounds in this country. Falwell believes, as he told Pat Robertson, host of "The 700 Club," an evangelical Christian talk show that pagans, gays, feminists, abortionists and the American Civil Liberties Union (to name just a few) "helped this [the terrorist attacks on the United States] happen". He believes that these groups have helped to "secularize America" a high handed euphemism for "selling our country's soul to the Devil".

Falwell is rumored to have issued some sort of an apology for attacking specific groups in his statement. My hope is that he saw a tape of himself and realized the glaring irony of what he was doing. I think that many will agree that the terrorist attacks on America were actually caused by hate, ignorance, and narrow-minded thinking. I also believe that many will agree Falwell's remarks were caused by hate, ignorance and narrow-minded thinking.

Falwell would appreciate it if we would keep our secularization out of his religion, but what right does he have to put his religion into a secular country? In this time of crisis we have all become a little more religious, a little more conscious of a greater power to look to for support and comfort. A short drive down our own Route 15, with "God Bless America" gracing every sign from car dealerships to Burger King, will reveal that.

Believing that God, and by that I mean any god, goddess or other, will take care of us as citizens of a country so much in need of unity right now brings some small relief. For Falwell to tell us that God is angry, and instead of protecting seeks only to punish those who live differently, obliterates the notion of unity. Of all the numerous "God Bless America" signs I have seen, not one of them has said "God Bless America—Except for Those Who Are Not God-Fearing, Heterosexual Christians".

As a citizen of the United States, Falwell had a right to voice his thoughts, but as an intelligent and compassionate man, he failed. His remarks bring to my mind thoughts of another man, not too long ago, who wanted to purify his country as well. Let us hope Falwell learned from Hitler's mistakes.

Unique charms of University captures heart

A reflection on the campus visit that convinced one first-year student to enroll

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

Ah ... there is nothing like the fresh smell of cow manure to get you going in the morning. Welcome to Bucknell University-the institution that exactly a year ago this weekend, I fell in love with.

That's right, it was love at first stench. What can I say? Cornfields, being miles from civilization, cows, farms, and that fragrant aroma, just turns me on. But like every girl, its not just the "material" things that matter ... I enjoy "long walks on the beach" and "deep talks." And that is just what I got at Bucknell, well except for that whole beach thing.

Maybe you would all know this better as the campus tour (you know that massive group of people you find in your hall moments after you step out of the bathroom in your towel or robe on a Saturday morn ... afternoon).

It was this long talk that made Bucknell seem like the perfect college, everything about it felt right, but it was later that day when I knew it was where I wanted to spend the next four years.

That afternoon I went over to the place I know now as "Bucknell West" to watch a softball game. I remember sitting on the hill overlooking the field and watching the players arrive while I talked to the coach. But it was sitting there during their game, that I knew I wanted to be a Bison (I know I am admitting that I wanted to be a big, hairy, stinky animal).

From my spot on the hill I could see the tops of the Chapel and the clock on the Library, I could see Route 15, the cemetery, and I think I even saw some corn (but I learned that is a commodity out here) and more importantly I saw myself on that campus.

I honestly don't remember if Bucknell won the softball game or not, but from that moment on I became a huge fan and learned everything about BU softball, from players to coaches, to positions and numbers to whether or not I could find a spot on that team.

Actually from that day on, I learned all I could about Bucknell and noticed that the words "out in the middle of nowhere" were mentioned in just about everything I read about the school ... but you can barely notice. I mean you take a plane to the closest Abercrombie. But so what?

Even though my parents only dropped me off here a month ago, I'm nuts about Bucknell. Maybe it is best described through the nut-loving creatures that run rampant throughout campus. Back home, in New Jersey (I know it seems everyone here is from New Jersey), anytime you went within 50 feet of a squirrel it would sprint in the opposite direction.

Here at Bucknell, if you come within that same distance, they run up to you. Seems odd, but it describes the atmosphere at BU. Everyone is just so friendly. I haven't met a person that I didn't like ... except for that one girl who lives down the hall ... just kidding.

You may wonder why I am writing such an article, people may actually read this, but that is the whole point. When I went on my "long walk" we went right through the Langone Center and my dad snagged a copy of The Bucknellian. I read the paper on the way home and recall reading an article where the writer reminisced of something from his campus tour and I was even more hooked on Bucknell.

Some may believe in love at first sight, but here at Bucknell, we know its love at first stench. We are big, hairy, stinky animals-how could we not.

2005 BSG begins efforts

Lifehouse tickets as donation incentive

By Peter Hackeman
Forum Layout Editor

One month into their first year of college, the 2005 Congress has already started to make a name for itself. As the sale of tickets for a chance to win a trip to a Lifehouse concert concludes today, the first year students have gotten the first look at their representatives.

The impetus behind the combination of the concert tickets and a collection to help the Red Cross was a desire to increase enthusiasm for this project. With the many other groups collecting funds for charitable causes, the 2005 Congress wanted to increase participation by students who hadn't yet contributed by offering an incentive in return for the contribution.

It appears the campus is seeing an early glimpse of what the Class of 2005 is like. What is impressive is the organization and timely execution exhibited in their first major project. The group met Sunday morning to finalize plans and to set up the times of the collection table.

The willingness to get up Sunday morning to set this up certainly quantifies the effort put forth by the congress members. With such a continued effort level, the Class of 2005 may well have a chance to filling the large shoes of the preceding classes.

This effort, with the proceeds donated to the Union County United Way, who will pass the money onto the American Red Cross, is a great use of time and energy.

As 2005 President T. Patrick Halley III explained, donating the money to the local chapter of the United Way will help that chapter reach its goal for donations in addition to helping the Red Cross. This sort of thorough understanding of organizational practices is a very encouraging sign. Such organizational understanding is necessary to make an impact in campus life, as committees make up the work horses of Bucknell Student Government (BSG) action.

The fundraiser is being orchestrated through a real team effort by the 2005 representatives. After Jessica Brimhall was instrumental in securing the concert tickets, the pairing of a donation collection with a chance for free concert tickets seemed to be a good match. This sort of creative and original thinking is quite a positive reflection on the 2005 members.

Most importantly, all members were eager to help make this a success. One of the more encouraging signs for this group of new BSG members is their enthusiasm.

"I've never seen more people jump to take responsibility," Congress Member Marissa Schmidt said. One can't help but be proud and excited about the future of the BSG with these members involved.

All of these signs point to a successful beginning for the representatives from 2005. The next steps for these leaders are to continue to increase the effort level and to learn from the current BSG leaders and to become more and more involved in all BSG activities.

A summer story: working in the Big Apple

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

Ah. The 6:25 a.m. train to Penn Station. The vinyl seats, a fresh copy of The New York Times, a few extra minutes of shuteye before work begins, the rising sun, relaxation instead of sitting on that strip of construction and eternal gridlock we Long Islanders call the LIE. Sure, it makes stops in Westbury, Carle Place, Mineola, Merillon Avenue, New Hyde Park and Jamaica along the way, lengthening the trip a bit. But it is quiet and comfortable and a prime place to sleep.

What can be better than sleeping on the train to New York City from Hicksville every morning? Simple—taking the 6:01 p.m. express from Penn Station to Hicksville every afternoon while talking about the day or doing the crossword puzzle with my father, who has been doing this for over 25 years.

But then there is the subway-more specifically the 2 and 3 trains that whisk-ok, slowly move riders away from Penn Station to stops like 14th Street, Chambers Street or mine, Wall Street. There is nothing quite like standing within one inch of 10 complete strangers for a few minutes that can feel more like an hour. And then there is the possibility that you will come across one of the Disneyland-style trial trains or some of New York's model citizens.

I spent thirteen weeks this past summer working in Manhattan for stock market commentator Jim Cramer at TheStreet.com, the Internet company he co-founded in 1996.

Although New York City is only 25 miles from my home in Long Island, N.Y. it felt like I was going to another world every morning when I got on the train. Manhattan—also referred to as The City, New York and The Big Apple, among others—is an amazing place. The people are diverse and generally very nice and the action never stops; the place is definitely different than Lewisburg.

Manhattan is the undisputed financial capital of the world, which you will see the minute you set foot on the island. Go downtown to the financial district and you will find headquarters for firms like Goldman Sachs, American Express, The Bank of New York among others and offices for almost all the world's financial institutions. You will also find the New York Stock Exchange, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the American Stock Exchange.

I worked across the street from the NYSE at the intersection of Wall and Nassau Streets. Every morning, I would get to walk to work from the subway station among the morning crowds through the canyons of Lower Manhattan. And I got to work for the dynamic Cramer.

He is the omnipresent commentator who started TheStreet.com in 1996 and continues to write for the site and advises the company's CEO. He also appears on CNBC's morning show "Squawk Box" every few Mondays, writes a monthly column in New York Magazine, hosts his own nationally syndicated radio program-"Jim Cramer's Real Money Talk"-which is carried by Clear Channel Communications and is in the process of writing a book about his career on Wall Street.

That is where I fit in. The book, due to be released sometime in 2002, will have a timeline that stretches over Cramer's entire career on Wall Street. My job was to make sense of the last seven years of his professional life from his personal and business correspondence that his assistants had saved. After reading through the data, I helped him identify the important events in the life of TheStreet.com and did further research to supplement what was already in the files.

Besides that, I helped Jim with articles he was writing or material he was going to use on his radio show and did other tasks you would expect a summer intern to perform, like copying and making phone calls.

And I even got to take an interesting side trip as part of my summer experience. One particular Friday afternoon, one of my neighbors, who is a specialist at the NYSE, admitted me to the floor where the business of the equities market happens. The place is abuzz with traders and clerks but the size of the place is not as it appears on television. It's much smaller than you would care to believe because of the sheer number of people that work there and the amount of technology needed to power the place.

Working in Manhattan, or living there for that matter, is like nothing you can imagine. The city is alive at all times-the only exception is the financial district, which is quiet outside the workday-and the people who populate it are amazingly diverse.

The first thing that strikes you in Manhattan is the fast pace of the lifestyle. Actually, it borders on hyperactive. Most of the people you encounter on the streets and in the subways are there because they need to get somewhere. They are late or just trying to be on time. So, do not be surprised if you are leisurely walking along and someone rudely bumps into you. It's all part of the game.

Something as simple as going to a deli in Manhattan is a thing to behold. There is nothing like the rudeness of the clerks who yell and scream at everyone—even each other. Think of the famous "Seinfeld" character that exclaimed "No soup for you!" Then there are the street vendors with their breakfasts, lunches and heartburn. The food is so good but so bad for you. My only suggestion: go for the fried stuff!

Another thing you will notice in Manhattan are the prices. Buying a full lunch, a deli sandwich, chips and soda, may cost you more than two or three meals at the Bison-and that is at an inexpensive restaurant. A night at the movies may require you to take out a loan.

The city also thrives when others sleep. Stores are regularly open late. Restaurants consider peak dinner time between 7:30 and 10 p.m. The city streets are buzzing with workers at the crack of dawn. Two nights this summer, I had to remain in the city till after 10 p.m. At home on Long Island, things would be quieting down at this hour. Not in Manhattan—the streets were filled with pedestrians, the train station was as busy as it is during rush hour and there was plenty of traffic.

Looking back on it now from quiet and pastoral Lewisburg, I would consider my summer a success and an eye opening experience. Manhattan is the place to work if you like an up-tempo environment that includes an amazing diversity of people and experiences that will last a lifetime.

Collectible Dreams offers a journey into the past

By Alyson Walker
Staff Writer

Are you looking for someplace to buy comic books, anime or trading cards? What about items about pop culture greats such as "I Love Lucy," Marilyn Monroe, "Wizard of Oz" and other classics? If you are, then Collectible Dreams, located in downtown Selinsgrove, is the store for you.

Owned by Stan Tychinski, Collectible Dreams has been open approximately a year and a half. Explaining why he chose to open the store, he said, "I've always had an interest in collectibles. I knew there was a market in this area [Selinsgrove] that no one was providing."

Tychinski also believes that this is the kind of store that people tend to come back to regularly because of the changing merchandise. "New items come in every day," Tychinski said.

Collectible Dreams offers a comic book selection including major publishers, such as Marvel and DC, and classic heroes such as Batman, Superman, X-Men and Spider-Man. They also sell the more recently popular comic books like Buffy the Vampire Slayer, Spawn and Tomb Raider.

For those patrons more interested in games, Dungeons & Dragons and Magic, two popular role-playing games are available, as are the newer games Mage Knight and Vampire. Collector's versions of Monopoly with diverse themes from Scooby-Doo to the Simpsons are also sold.

If games aren't your thing, don't fear, Collectible Dreams is a local dealer for Topps, Upper Deck and other major sport card brands and carries a full line of supplies for collecting.

Also, memorabilia for a wide variety of popular culture icons can be found at Collectible Dreams, ranging from Elvis to the Three Stooges and also including Harry Potter. Signed memorabilia is available from the popular television shows "Dukes of Hazard," "Gilligan's Island," "Charlie's Angels" and also from a variety of sports players.

Collectible Dreams also carries anime and manga. Anime is one of the fastest growing forms of animation, and it continues to become increasingly popular. It is shown on cable channels such as the Cartoon Network and the Sci-Fi Channel, both of which dedicate large programming blocks to anime shows. A few examples of these shows include the popular "Pokemon," "Dragon-BallZ" and "Gundam Wing."

Collectible Dreams also carries anime and manga. Anime is one of the fastest growing forms of animation, and it continues to become increasingly popular.

Manga is the printed version of the anime cartoons, and these can be typically found in black and white, printed either in trade paperback or in a comic book style. Collectible Dreams offers both the original Japanese texts and the English translations.

"Anime is a select market, but there are definitely many people interested who just don't know where to get it," Tychinski said.

Collectible Dreams recently had a display on SHOJO. SHOJO is Japanese manga or anime, which is most commonly targeted towards females, especially those of a high school and college age. This display won third place in a national display contest sponsored by ICV2, a pop culture website, along with magazine and comic book companies and distributors Diamond Comics Distributors, Dark Horse Comics and TokyoPop.

Collectible Dreams' display showcased popular anime shows like "Sailor Moon," as well as "Oh, My Goddess!," "Cardcaptors," and "The Magic User's Club." It included a variety of videos and books based upon the cartoon shows.

Also sold were Japanese Shitajiki (writing boards), T-shirts, plush dolls, and cards which mostly involved characters from these shows. Tychinski mentioned that several new customers were attracted by the display, as were many consumers who viewed the display online are contacting him through e-mail.

Although "Sailor Moon" is currently the most popular show purchased by far, orders have also come in for other lines, such as "Love Hina" and "Saint Tail," and Tychinski is able to order all different varieties of anime and manga. For their wonderful display, Collectible Dreams will receive a thousand dollar's worth of new products for the store. The store's display is available to be viewed at the ICV2 website, www.icv2.com.

Collectible Dreams is located at 12 N. Market St. in Selinsgrove. Stan Tychinski can be contacted at (570) 372-0824 or through email at cdreams@sunlink.net

Little Red Hen offers delicious food and friendly company

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

Whether you are looking for someplace to take your parents to eat this weekend or a new restaurant to help you and your friends escape the monotony of eating on campus, The Little Red Hen Eatery is a tasty and affordable option.

Located in the Roller Mills Marketplace on the corner of St. Mary's and 5th streets in Lewisburg, it is no more than a fifteen minute walk from anywhere on campus. It is open seven days a week from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m, perfect for a late breakfast or lunch.

The Little Red Hen Eatery is owned and operated by Dave Reed of Mifflinburg. He opened his establishment in 1991 and is responsible for the creation of the many unusual but delightful meals.

Reed enjoys and appreciates having the opportunity to run and cook in his own restaurant. One of the reasons for this is his love for interacting with people.

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian

Located in the Roller Mills Marketplace, The Little Red Hen Eatery is an affordable and tasty option for a late breakfast or lunch.

"I like the people, especially the University students. We have a good report with the students and I count many of the University's graduates among my friends. Often times students have come in after hours just to sit and talk," Reed said.

The food and atmosphere are really the aspects that draw its loyal customers. The Little Red Hen Eatery's menu boasts 50 reasonably priced entrees that range from quiches and pita pockets to specialty sandwiches.

Patrons eat in a cozy nook nestled among hundreds of antiques. The restaurant itself consists of no more than 20 tables surrounded by hen house memorabilia.

There is something very welcoming about eating at a place where the owner is not only the chef, but also a friendly host sitting in the dinning room and asking University students how their families are doing.

Many of these patrons have gotten to know Reed because they love his special sauces. The most popular of his special recipes are his tasty cabbage dressing and his unique gourmet mustard that complements many of his dishes. For those who enjoy Reed's special mustard, it is now available for purchase at the Little Red Hen Eatery and also at Weis Markets.

The famous twisted pretzel sandwiches are a great representation of the unique food that people are sure to find when they venture to the Little Red Hen Eatery. It consists of a fresh baked cinnamon pretzel with a choice of chicken, ham, steak and tuna, topped with Dave's special cabbage dressing. It is served with soup, chips and applesauce on the side.

Katie Kleissas, '04 enjoyed her Little Red Hen experience. "I found the food to be very different, but also very delicious. I especially enjoyed the cabbage dressing and the hand rolled pretzel. Eating at The Little Red Hen Eatery definitely got my day off to a great start and was a great break from eating breakfast at the caf," Kleissas said.

Although The Little Red Hen Eatery may not be well known, it is a favorite restaurant among those who are familiar with it. University students are often found sitting at one of the little tables with varied tablecloths or browsing the many antiques that the Roller Mills Marketplace offers. One thing that is certain is that they will be raving about the Little Red Hen Eatery.

"This is definitely a place I would return to. The atmosphere is very comfortable and inviting, the service was prompt and courteous, and the food was varied and enjoyable. It was a great place to just sit back, relax and enjoy a meal with my friends," Emily Thede '04, said.

After eating at The Little Red Hen Eatery once, you are sure to return many times in the future. It is one of those places that will always have something new to offer.

Reno coming to Weis Center

Janet Reno is coming to the Weis Center on Oct. 9.

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

Few universities can lay claim to hosting powerful and provocative lectures by the nation's most scrutinized public officials. In less than two weeks, the University community will experience this privilege. On Tuesday, Oct. 9, the Weis Center will open its doors to one of the most highly publicized political figures of the last decade: Janet Reno. Reno, our nation's first female Attorney General, will deliver a lecture on the meaning of civility at 8 p.m.

The Student Lectureship Committee (SLC), a sub-committee of Bucknell Student Government (BSG), is the group responsible for coordinating the efforts that bring Reno to the Universtiy. Having sponsored such lectures in the past as Richard Dawkins, Gil White, Danny Glover and Felix Justice, Howard Zinn and William Stout, the committee continues to provide the campus with interesting and entertaining speakers.

Last semester, the members, along with their advisor, Associate Dean of Students Ruth Burnham, petitioned BSG requesting financial support, as Reno's lecture price exceeded the committee's semester stipend. While unable to garner additional funding from BSG, the group did receive financial support from numerous clubs and organizations on campus.

"The SLC is allowed a minimal stipend, so the event had to be co-sponsored with many organizations. We thank them for all of their support. We are currently working with BSG to get a higher stipend to bring more prestigious and interesting speakers to campus like Janet Reno," said Sarah EnDyke, the leader of SLC.

The advantage of co-sponsoring a lecture with multiple organizations not only means increased financial feasibility, but also more publicity for the lecture because of the organizations' vested interest in it.

"I have every reason to believe that Reno will draw a good turnout from Bucknellians. The event is not open to the public, so we are making every effort to see that University students, faculty, and staff have the maximum opportunity to attend the lecture," Burnham said.

The members of the SLC chose to limit the lecture to only those on campus because the committee recognizes that their foremost responsibility is to the university. In addition, the evening is free of charge. Doors will open at 7:30 p.m. to admit all students, faculty and staff to the Weis Center, provided they have their University ID card. Anticipating that the lecture will draw more people than the venue can hold, the committee plans to offer a remote broadcast of the lecture in Vaughan Literature auditorium.

"Even though this event will only be open to the University community, we recommend getting there early," EnDyke said.

Interestingly, Reno is not only interested in lecturing when she comes to the University, but she would also like to interact with students here. "Provided travel arrangements allow it, Reno will meet with students prior to her lecture, so there is an educational opportunity available in addition to students being able to hear and see her in person at the lecture," Burnham said.

Prepared to speak about civility, there is no doubt that Reno can offer her own knowledge and experience. As the longest serving attorney general (the nation's chief law enforcement officer) since the Eisenhower administration, Reno's eight-year term was plagued with such historical events as the devastation in Waco, Texas (1993), the Oklahoma City bombing (1995), Monica Lewinsky's allegations towards President Clinton (1998), and the Eliàn Gonzàlez case (2000). In addition to her critical involvement in international situations, Reno recently announced her candidacy for Florida State Governor earlier this month.

In an exit interview with PBS broadcaster Jim Lehrer last December, Reno told the commentator, "Until the day I die, or until the day I can't think anymore, I want to be involved in the issues that I care about ... There is so much to do, and I want to continue those efforts."

As a significant figure in our nation's government in the past decade, Janet Reno's desire to continue her political influence is unquenchable. On Oct. 9, remember to get to the Weis Center early for what EnDyke foresees as "an opportunity to witness and question one of the foremost political figures of our time."

New Res Hall receives "divine" gift from Athena Rogers

By Jeff Bloch and Jack O'Donnel
Contributing Writers

Sing in me, Muse, and through me tell the story of that woman skilled in all ways of charity, the goddess, First Lady for years on end, after she welcomed the Class of 2005 in the proud tradition of the University.

Hall 3 South-East of the New Residence Hall was dreadfully bored throughout our first few days of existence. We sat quietly in our rooms, desperate for some form of entertainment. Our first opportunity to socialize arrived when alcohol came knocking at our door. We are all underage, therefore without any hesitation we all turned the down the chance.

Then we had a brainstorm. We needed something that would keep the boys' pants on and the girls thinking strictly of academics. A ping-pong table was the obvious solution. And so our quest began; a quest to win a ping-pong table for our hall. We knew what had to be done in order to obtain results quickly. We cut out the middle man and went straight to the ruler of this campus ... First Lady Athena Rogers, Goddess of Wisdom.

Fearlessly we walked to the University President's door. Athena floated towards us. She had been in her sunroom playing with her cats prior to our arrival. We delivered a letter we had written earlier, formally requesting that she buy our hall a ping-pong table. She gave the letter some attention, but was mostly interested in us.

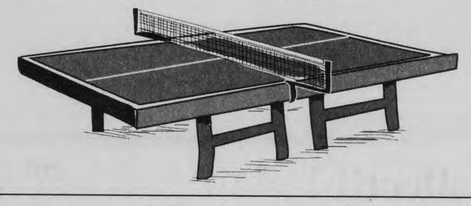
For the next 20 to 25 minutes we sat upon the swing on the porch of the President's house, talking casually about college life, home life, anything and everything. Athena was genuinely interested in what we had to say. Sadly, the time came for us to leave that holy place, and so we said our farewells and Athena informed us that she would do her best to work through our appeal.

And so our prayers were delivered to mighty Athena. We had survived the long journey downhill and anxiously awaited a sign from our goddess, anything to let us know that she would grant our humble request. We waited for her. Hours turned into days, and days into weeks. We had all but lost hope, and were actually preparing to (Heaven forbid) buy our own ping-pong table for the hall! We had all but given up on our hall's divine guardian.

Then one day, as suddenly as a thunderbolt explodes in the sky, Athena announced the date and time of a dedication ceremony for a new ping-pong table in the New Residence Hall. Our first reaction was disbelief, then shock, but finally we realized that our prayers had been answered! Our excitement rose further as the time drew near and we watched through our dorm windows as Athena entered the New Residence Hall.

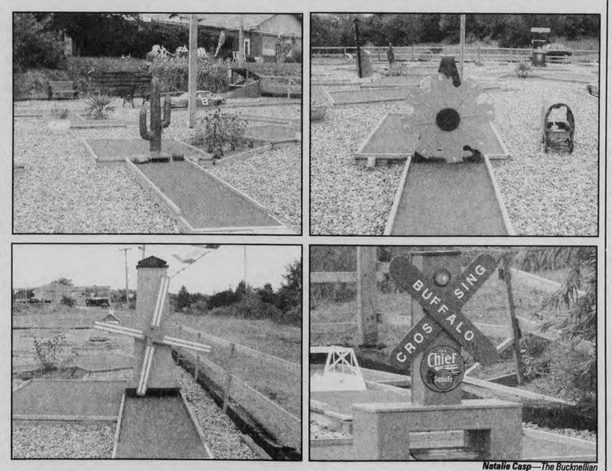
Cries rang out throughout the hall. "Athena has entered the building!" Our goddess was there, in mortal form, wishing us well with our new ping-pong table. She even bestowed upon us the honor of playing a few rounds as we christened the holy table. Needless to say, our mere mortal abilities were no match for Athena's divine power. We think she was going easy on us, yet she still put shame to our ping-pong skills. The table was centrally placed in the main lobby of the New Residence Hall, though we know of a more attractive spot in the vicinity of Hall 3 South-East.

And so here ends our tale of mortals and gods, humanity and divinity, but most importantly; ping-pong. May all who play on the immortal table know the tale of Athena, Goddess of Wisdom, First Lady of Bucknell University ... and last, but certainly not least ... our Mom.



Mini-Golf provides "grande" fun at La Piñata

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer



Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian

La Piñata offers customers with the opportunity to drink, dine and putt—all located just south of campus on Rt. 15.

While some may argue entertainment in Lewisburg is somewhat limited, places like Buffalo Bill's Tex/Mex Restaurant are hoping to make things a little more exciting.

Located just south of the University on Route 15, the bar and grille has opened a new miniature golf course, La Piñata Mini Golf, to provide customers with the opportunity to drink, dine and putt, all in the same location.

Managers Tedd and Sharon Biernstein came up with the idea about two years ago. They had often talked with friends and family who had expressed frustration at the lack of family orientated activities in the area.

"We knew mini golf would be something fun that all ages could enjoy. I think everyone has been enjoying themselves. Parents are especially happy to be able to have dinner and also watch their kids play a round," Tedd Biernstein said.

For example, by dinnertime Buffalo Bill's is often crowded with families and grandparents who enjoy a night of doing something different.

With two outdoor patios overlooking the course, kids and parents grab a bite to eat and then take up putting. While the course is small, it is well run, affording all players the opportunity to thoroughly enjoy the half hour that it takes to go through the 18 holes.

While there is no need for reservations, there could be a short wait at crowed times. It is first-come-first-serve when the course opens at 11 a.m. on weekdays, 4 p.m. on Saturdays and noon on Sundays. For those who want to stay past dinnertime, the outdoor lights allow for play until 10 p.m. On Sundays, the course closes earlier at 8 p.m.

"Our business plan was also to make the course economical," Biernstein said. For instance, tickets for adults are $4, teens ages 13 to 19 are $3 and children 12 and under pay $2.

Children have thus far been the most frequent visitors to the course. Parents often drop off their children for an hour, allowing them plenty of time to play a round of miniature golf and their parents still have time to go inside and enjoy a Shirley Temple.

While La Piñata Mini Golf has been attracting many Lewisburg residents, Bierstein hopes more University students will also visit the course soon.

Unfortunately, the location could pose as a problem for freshman students who are not permitted to have cars on campus until sophomore year. For students who have time to drive off campus, however, Buffalo Bill's is conveniently located.

"I think the course sounds fun. It might be nice to just get away for a bit and do more than just go to restaurants," Kristy Ellis '02 said.

Whatever one's mode of transportation though, La Piñata will be open be open until it snows for all those who wish to perfect their putting skills.

Campus celebrates Hispanic Awareness

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

Thirteen identical horizontal stripes starting with red and alternating with white. There is a blue rectangle in the top left corner bearing 50 small, white, five-pointed stars arranged in nine offset horizontal rows beginning with six stars and alternating with rows of five. The 50 stars represent the 50 states and the 13 stripes represent the 13 original colonies.

Francis Scott Key once wrote a song about it. Everyday millions of students across the nation stand and salute it. It is known as "Old Glory" and is a symbol of freedom and national equality. It is the flag of the United States of America.

Our country is known as a melting pot of many different nationalities and backgrounds. We are a diverse nation that succeeds in recognizing what makes each of us similar and yet celebrates what makes each of us unique. From Sept. 15 through Oct. 15, we take time to celebrate the Hispanic culture in what is known as Hispanic Awareness Month.

Originally named National Heritage Week, the U.S. Congress decided to implement this seven-day celebration over 20 years ago. It expanded into a month of commemoration in 1989 and is a national observance authorized by Public Law 100-402, which states: The President is hereby authorized and requested to issue annually a proclamation designating the 31 day period beginning September 15 and ending October 15 as "National Hispanic Heritage Month" and calling upon the people of the United States, especially the educational community, to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The University community is doing just that. On Oct. 3, Maria Echezeste is coming to the University to give a guest lecture on "The Growing Political, Social and Economic Influences on Hispanic America: Myth or Reality?" She will speak from 7-9 p.m. in the Langone Center.

A few of Echezeste's accomplishments include her rank as a representative Chief of Staff for former President Clinton and her fight as an activist for the Civil Rights movements, educational reform, AIDS awareness, and African American rights.

On Oct. 6 CUMBRE (an organization on campus involved with multicultural backgrounds) will hold a dinner and dance in the Terrace Room from six to nine p.m.

It is throughout this month of celebration that we look at Hispanic cultures, achievements, and heritage. Independence Day for Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua is Sept. 15. On Sept. 16, Mexicans and Mexican-Americans celebrate Mexico's Independence Day.

Oct.12 is Dia de la Raza (Day of the Race) and is a very important holiday in Mexico. It is on this day Mexican people celebrate their mixture of people, races and cultures with pride. This celebration occurs on Columbus Day, because Columbus opened the way for the Spanish to come to middle America, this day symbolizes the birth of the Mexican race.

During this national month of awareness, we celebrate and recognize the rich cultural influence of Hispanics throughout the United States. Our very own "Old Glory" was the basis for a number of other countries' flags, including Chile and Puerto Rico. Perhaps our flag is given such a name because it has influenced many occurrences in the past, such as the creation of another country's flag, but in today's frame, it unites people from numerous countries, and that is the glory.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

The necessary fight

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

There is a growing trend in the wake of the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, and that is to blame America. As a proponent of the First Amendment, I am obligated to defend the people who do this, no matter how obscenely untrue their allegations may be. People who make claims regarding our role in bringing these attacks on ourselves believe that we have severely abused the Arab and Muslim worlds. I whole-heartedly disagree.

During the 1990s, America embarked on three sizeable military campaigns. The first was the war against Iraq during 1990-1991. The United States led a broad coalition including numerous Arab nations in an effort to force Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait and contain him within the borders of Iraq. In Africa, the U.S. dispatched Special Forces and peacekeeping forces to protect the citizens in those countries. America's final campaign of the 20th century came when the Clinton administration launched a campaign of massive air strikes to protect ethnic Albanians. That entire campaign was carried out largely without international support.

Notice a trend? If not, look again. All of the aforementioned campaigns were conducted to protect Muslim peoples.

Yes, I realize there were other issues that caused Desert Storm, but the fact remains that we liberated one Muslim nation and protected at least one more. Which brings me to the subject of our forces that remain in the Persian Gulf. They are there to protect the sovereign nations of the Middle East from dictatorial oppressors like Saddam Hussein. We clearly have not ignored, nor have we abused, the Arab nations of the world.

Yes, the U.S. supports Israel. France supports Palestine. Do the Israelis have the right to destroy the Eiffel Tower? Of course they don't. Under the Clinton administration, Israel and Palestine came closer to reaching a peace accord than at any time in recent history. The reason we came so close was the fact that the U.S. put pressure on Israel to make certain, rational concessions.

Many of the fundamentalists feel that America has exported our culture to the rest of the world, and that it threatens their way of life. Do we export our culture? Yes, of course we do, because there is a massive demand for it. In no way do we force our commercial culture on the rest of the world. Those who wish to blame America would have us believe that they chose their targets simply for the way in which they symbolized American life. The Statue of Liberty symbolizes American life also, but it was not attacked. The reason the terrorists chose two of the largest office complexes in America is simply this: they wanted to kill Americans, and scare us. Symbolism was an afterthought of murder. We did not deserve this.

Now I want to turn to retaliation. I understand the fears of those who oppose action. Sadly, this will probably not be the last attack on American soil. However, that is no excuse for complacency after an attack on over 40,000 American civilians.

Opponents of military action argue that Osama bin Laden expects a reaction out of us, and we should not give him what he wants. This is true he does want a reaction. The fact of the matter is that we have no choice. He wants to force America into a reaction, and his attacks will simply become more heinous and costly until we do react, and shut down his network. Also, if we do not demonstrate that there will be some form of retribution, it will entice other entities to perpetrate similar atrocities against our country and its citizens. Yes Afghanistan has churned up other superpowers. Nevertheless, we have several advantages that they did not.

Ironically, we trained most of the people we will be fighting, and built many of the fortifications they will use. Also, we have the support, including the experience, of the two previous superpowers to be beaten. Finally, unlike their previous adversaries, we understand this is a different style of warfare. Rather than tanks, artillery and massive assaults, this war will be fought in the shadows.

The world now has the tools and the determination to defeat terror. We owe it to ourselves and our children to follow through.

Northern Alliance battles Taliban

By Amanda Kaufman
Staff Writer

In the days since Sept. 11, Americans have heard about little more than Osama Bin Laden and his cohorts in Afghanistan's Taliban government. The Taliban, however, is not the only political force currently active in Afghanistan. The Northern Alliance, a coalition of anti-Taliban forces, controls about ten percent of the country. Also known as the United Front, the Northern Alliance is presently considered by many to be an important element of U.S. military efforts to oust bin Laden.

The United Front was the government that assumed power after the fall of the Soviet Regime in Afghanistan. The Taliban seized power from them in 1996. The ousted United Front and its supporters joined to form the Northern Alliance.

In addition to the U.S., the Northern Alliance is also cooperating with Russia. In fact, Russia has had a long-standing support of the alliance, which actually gained its strength in fighting against the Soviets. The alliance has ties to the Afghan Mujahideen, which drove the Soviets out of the country in 1992. Besides Russia, at least two other former Soviet states support the Northern Alliance. Both Uzbekistan and Tajikistan are offering logistical support to the U.S. military from just north of Afghanistan.

While the Northern Alliance's ties are important, the group can be helpful in its own right. It would be a tough military ally if the U.S. decides to send troops in the country's mountainous region to capture bin Laden. The Northern Alliance soldiers are "sons of Afghanistan"–they know the land, they know the terrain, and they claim to eventually be able to locate bin Laden.

The Northern Alliance's efforts have not gone unnoticed in Afghanistan. They have proven their resilience. Despite the Sept. 9th assassination of their revered leader, General Ahmed Shad Masood, their fighting has intensified. According to CNN, Masood's assassins, who used a bomb hidden inside of a camera are believed to be to the Taliban.

Fox News reported that in recent days, the Northern Alliance has stepped up its activity. According to Northern Alliance Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, the forces took the towns of Zari and Keshendeh, both in the Balkh province, in the north. The Northern Alliance killed at least sixty Taliban fighters in those actions. Abdullah also reported fighting in Herat, a western province. This fighting took place in mountains near the town of Pashtun Zarghun. The Northern Alliance forces are attempting to advance to the town, which is controlled by the Taliban.

According to another Alliance official, the Northen Alliance has killed a number of Taliban fighters on the battlefront north of Kabul. The Northern Alliance is using tanks to pound positions along this front, approximately 19 miles from the Afghan capital. In addition to those successes, the Alliance has also seized four villages and a mountaintop from the Taliban in the province of Faryab, a southwest city of Mazar-e-Sharif in northern Afghanistan.

Years of fighting against the Soviets, followed by fighting against their domestic enemies have strengthened the Northern Alliance soldiers. The help they might offer the U.S. could be invaluable, and they seem more than willing to cooperate. Like other citizens of Afghanistan, the people of the Northern Alliance simply want their freedom, and their country back from the terrorists who stole it. Suddenly, Americans and Afghanis do not seem all that different.

Federal government moves to bailout ailing airline industry

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

The attacks on New York and Washington two weeks ago not only destroyed thousands of lives, but also a plethora of industries, chief among these the previously beleaguered airline industry. In the past week, major producers and carriers such as Boeing, United, Continental, and US Airways have cut over 100,000 jobs due to the public's newfound fear of flying and the resultant drop in ticket sales.

The President and Congress recently authorized a $15 billion bailout of the industry to ensure that the immediate panic will not cripple a vital piece of the American economy. Ten billion of this is in loans made available to the industry and five billion is direct cash assistance. This measure also limits the salaries of top executives accepting loans for two years, ensuring that these people do not take advantage of the tragedy for their own benefit. In return for the compensations, which are to cover everything from higher insurance premiums airlines must now pay, to liability suits, to helping airlines pay off new planes; the government is to receive stock, stock options or warrants from the companies so that the government might profit from the bailout, provided the airlines it helps survive.

The U.S. is not the only government to consider or enact a bailout of the airline industry after last week's attacks, however. Worldwide, airlines are suffering due to the terror of two weeks ago. SwissAir Corporation has found itself under considerable financial stress following last week's events and is lobbying the Swiss government to help it while it restructures its operations. Other European countries, such as Germany, are considering helping their airlines to a lesser extent, such as helping cover, for a short time, higher insurance premiums their airlines must now pay.

Despite the U.S. being, in general, a hands-off capitalist system, the idea of helping a company to avoid bankruptcy and failure is not a new concept. Back in the late 1970s and early 1980s, the government intervened to prevent the Chrysler Corporation from going under. Chairman Lee Iacocca was able to finagle a $1.5 billion package from the government to ensure that the third largest car manufacturer in the U.S. would not go under. Previous to that, the government guaranteed Lockheed Martin loans, a type of bailout, to ensure that the defense contractor remained a viable company. And, in 1989, the Savings and Loan industry was propped up to save the financial markets in the U.S. from collapse. Federal intervention into private industry is not unknown in this country, though it may seem strange in the land where free-market capitalism is supposed to be running independent of government intervention.

The U.S. government already provides hundreds of millions of dollars a year to subsidize the airline industry, so with this further infusion of funds the various corporations affected should have little trouble covering their losses for this year.

The danger for the industry is an instilled fear among consumers–if the public does not decide to resume air travel at a normal rate, the industry will most likely fail. To regain the public's trust is the combined duty of the government and the airlines, possibly achieved by adding more safety measures to an industry where safety already has to be the number one priority.

Governor Ridge appointed Director of Homeland Defense

By Nathan Blagrove
B&P Layout Editor

In the midst of his powerful address to a joint session of Congress, President Bush announced to the country the creation of a new, cabinet-level position. Pennsylvania Governor Tom Ridge will fill the new post beginning Oct. 5. The new position will require his resignation from his current post. With the official title of "Director of Homeland Defense," Ridge's chief responsibility will be to coordinate the efforts of America's intelligence agencies.

In the aftermath of the attacks on Sept. 11 people were appalled that such an operation could be undertaken without the government knowing about it. One of the main reasons for the miscue is the fact that the country's agencies do not communicate with one another. At least one of the intelligence offices was tracking a group of the terrorists prior to the attack. However, their failure to alert the other intelligence bureaus allowed the men and their operation to evade government investigation.

By placing these bureaus under one director, the Bush administration hopes to improve the effectiveness of the government organizations responsible for defense against terrorism. Prior to the attacks, foreign and domestic intelligence were treated as separate entities, with the CIA handling foreign matters and the FBI handling domestic affairs. Yet this setup created problems whenever investigations or intelligence initiatives crossed the borders of the United States.

The new office will need to create a free-flow of information between all concerned parties so that potential terrorists cannot evade investigations simply by crossing a border.

Outlining the reasons he decided to create a cabinet-level position for homeland defense, Bush said, "Today, dozens of federal departments and agencies, as well as state and local governments, have responsibilities affecting homeland security. These efforts must be coordinated at the highest level" according to CNN.com.

Ridge's position will likely be of utmost importance in the coming months as America leads the world in a war on terrorism. The U.S. will undoubtedly be the target of numerous terrorist plots, and Ridge will coordinate the effort to foil them. It is hoped that the Governor, a Vietnam veteran, will be able to accomplish this by improving the flow of information among the many arms of America's intelligence network.

According to CNN.com Ridge said of his appointment, "I think it's all right to admit that I'm saddened that this job is even necessary, but it is necessary, so I will give it everything that I have". Ridge has been considered as a Vice Presidential candidate in the last two elections, and is regarded as a potential Presidential contender once Bush leaves office. He was elected governor of Pennsylvania in 1995, re-elected in 1998, and was to serve until 2003.

Leopards squander lead but defeat Bison in OT

Field hockey squad knots score at two late in regulation, but Lafayette rallies to score game-winner in overtime

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

In their seventh game of the season, the field hockey team played their fourth overtime period. As with most Patriot League matches, the outcome could have gone either way. The fierce competition of the Lafayette Leopards was nothing that the Bison hadn't already experienced this season.

With only 10 minutes into the first half, the Leopards managed to find the back of the cage twice. The Bison rose to the challenge two minutes later with a goal by Melissa Maher '02. Maher responded off a rebounded shot taken by tri-captain Annie Hunsicker '02.

The Bison managed to keep Lafayette to only those two goals with the help of a strong defensive unit anchored by goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen '03. Wettergreen ended the game with a season-high of 10 saves.

Lindsey Gentle '04 said, "Even though we found ourselves behind early on in the game, this only made us want the win more and drove us to fight even harder."

The Bison dominated the second half of the game as they strove to obtain a second goal and tied the score. Their hard work paid off when, with 1:20 left in regulation play, Meiko Boynton '05 deflected a pass from Erin Plasteras '02 into the goal. With a tied score of 2-2 at the end of the game, the Bison found themselves in an all too familiar position.

"Finding ourselves in overtime again can only be described as frustrating. We thought that we should have been playing better in the first 70 minutes of the game," Maher said.

In an overtime period with seven-versus-seven full field play, as opposed to the normal 11-versus-11 play, the outcome usually comes down to nothing short of a coin toss. Both teams had opportunities to score early in overtime, but Lafayette was the beneficiary of a lucky bounce and walked away with the win 3-2.

"Looking back over the game, I think my team would agree that we didn't play our best hockey until about the last 15 minutes," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "I was very pleased with how we kept our composure and battled back. Particularly pleasing was the fact that we didn't stop playing or competing. If everything works out, I think I speak for the team in saying we'd like another opportunity to play Lafayette in the Patriot League tournament."

The Bison only have one game within the league behind them and a huge week approaching, with two Patriot League opponents. According to Lewis, they are going to prepare by concentrating on their mental game.

"Physically, this is a very talented team and once we reach a point where out emotions and mental focus are on par with our physical talents, we'll be tough to beat," she said.

These two games, against Ursinus and Lehigh, will be critical if the Bison want to put themselves in a position to compete for a league championship.

"In light of the tragic events of September 11th, I think it's important that we all keep these games and their outcomes in its proper perspective. What is most important is that I am truly blessed in the fact that I get to spend every day with a wonderful group of 26 young women. As much as I provide them guidance, they have been my source of strength these past few weeks. For that I am truly grateful. I wouldn't want to be anywhere else than out of the field with this team," Lewis said in a final message to her team.

Football defeats Columbia in OT

After an unscheduled week off due to the national tragedies of Sept. 11, the football team returned to action and slipped past the Columbia Lions 23-20 in overtime. The win evened the Bison record at 1-1 heading into their home opener Saturday, Sept. 29 against St. Mary's of California.

The game began with some good luck for the Bison. Columbia fumbled the opening kickoff, and Mike Leatherman '04 recovered the ball at the Columbia 31 yard line. After the Bison could not put the ball into the end zone, Chris Lundberg '03 connected on a 31 yard field goal attempt to cap off the six play drive.

With six minutes remaining in the first quarter, Columbia mounted the first impressive drive of the game, going 76 yards in five plays to score a touchdown and take the lead 7-3. Neither team moved the ball very far for the rest of the first quarter, but the Bison began the second quarter with the energy they had lacked for the first 15 minutes.

Quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 engineered a long Bison drive and capped it off with a four yard touchdown pass to J.C. Morgan '04. The drive took 6:33 off the clock, and gave the Bison a temporary lead at 10-7.

The Lions answered back with a long drive of their own, but the Bison defense was able to keep them out of the end zone. Columbia settled for a field goal to cap off their 11 play drive, and tied the game at 10. On the final drive of the first half, it looked as though the Bison were go overtime.

The Bison got the ball first in overtime, and were able to move the ball ten yards to the Columbia 15 yard line before Lundberg knocked in his third field goal of the game to give the Bison a 23-20 lead. The Bucknell defense held one last time, forcing a missed field goal by Columbia, locking up their first victory of the season.

"I don't think the players ever doubted that they were going to win this game," Head Coach Tom Gadd said. "We were able to make the plays we needed to make." "I think we wanted the game more than Columbia," Wenrich said.

The Bison were able to pull out this close game, but that was not the always the case at the end of last season.

"That was our goal, not to lose any games in the fourth quarter," said Rush. Gadd is making practices harder, with more conditioning. Some people felt we got tired at the end of last year."

"Coach Gadd's conditioning practice has been a big difference," Wenrich added.

"Time is now" for new university athletics logo, administration says

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

With the large number of changes occurring within the Bucknell Athletics department, one wonders if it has time to add just one more to the list. Consider the Bucknell University logo and its curious semblance to the Buffalo Bills NFL team logo, its many variations, and the lack of the word "Bucknell" on it.

According to the athletics department, the time for change is now, and steps have already been taken to unveil a new logo for the Bison on uniforms and equipment as early as next fall. The goal: to give Bucknell athletics a distinct identity that for once, will be associated only with the University.

The change, according to Project Coordinator and Associate Director of Athletics Todd Newcomb, was spurred by the retiring of Bison Club Director Jim Campbell.

"Jim worked for the NFL for a number of years and knew a great amount of people within the organization, which is how he got into a discussion with someone in the Bills organization," Newcomb said. "In 1988 or 1989 he asked for permission to use the Bills's logo in the letterhead of the Bison Roundup, the publication for supporters of the Bison Club, and that permission was granted."

Surprisingly though, over the years, the Bills' logo leaked out and began being used for more and more things, even though there was no official permission given for those uses.

"Before long, it had become our 'official' logo," Newcomb said. "Now, since Jim has left, and we are no longer connected with the Bills, our usage is opened up for scrutiny."

Although legal action by the Bills franchise doesn't seem likely, there is that opening, and it is an opportune time for change.

"The Buffalo Bills issue and as far as marketing goes, we have the opportunity to grab the bull by the horns and get our own identity," commented Newcomb. "Then Bucknell can finally have something that it can latch onto and call its own, and that is exciting for us."

> "We have the opportunity to grab the bull by the horns and get our own identity. Then Bucknell can finally have something that it can latch onto and call its own, and that is exciting for us.
> —Todd Newcomb, associate director of athletics

When approaching the new logo, several companies were considered, but the athletics department is currently working very closely with Joe Bosack Graphic Design Company, who has done many other logos for nationally known sports organizations. Most notably, they are credited with developing the logos for the Pittsburgh Penguins, Colorado Avalance, Cornell University, Drew University, and the NHL Stanley Cup tournament.

The work that has gone into the nearly-finalized design for the logo has taken on many forms.

"There was agreement across the board that the primary logo include the word 'Bucknell'," Newcomb said. "Bucknell also has a very specific word mark, which we wanted to keep as close to the original as possible and at the same time adopt an athletic feel."

As far as the appearance of the Bison on the logo, the company's artists travelled to a bison farm to photograph and make sketches that would add to a realism of the image.

"We are currently showing the logo to a number of different people and groups on campus including student athletes, public relations, and the BSG," said Newcomb. "So far the response has all been very positive, and once [University] President Rogers, who has a large part in the final say, feels that it has been viewed by enough people, we will get the go ahead."

It is important to note that the new logo will only affect the athletics department. The current Bucknell crest, seal, or wordmark will remain untouched throughout the process.

Newcomb is very enthusiastic about the direction that the logo change is taking Bucknell athletics.

"When this does come across, it will be an across the board initiation of athletics programs," Newcomb said. "There will be no variation in the logo—the primary, secondary and wordmark logos will become the standard."

N. F. L. Predictions

Justin McCarthy
Staff Writer
(4-1)

Miami (2-0) at St. Louis (2-0)
This is a premier matchup of two possible Super Bowl teams, and so far they have played up to the billing. Miami is showing that Fiedler is for real and St. Louis is showcasing a vastly improved defense. St. Louis gets the pick because they are playing at home.

Pittsburgh (0-1) at Buffalo (0-2)
Buffalo, in one word, sucks. The Bills defense has allowed 66 points in only two games, there is no way a team can give up that many points and be competitive. This game should allow Stewart to build up his confidence. The pick goes to the boys from Western, Pa.

Tampa Bay (1-0) at Minnesota (0-2)
Have teams finally figured out how to shut down the once dominant Viking receiving core? You know your running game sucks when your QB is your leading rusher. The Bucs still have their defensive core together. The Bucs in this one.

Baltimore (1-1) at Denver (2-0)
The Broncos have scored 66 points in their first two games and they are going against a once solid Baltimore defense that has looked very weak thus far. Baltimore relies upon their defense to win games. I don't envision the Ravens' defense containing Denver's offense. Denver will win, although they won't have an easy time scoring.

Cincinnati (2-0) at San Diego (2-0)
Both teams are rejuvenated and look like total opposites from last year. Cincinnati has finally exceeded their own expectations, and San Diego now has confidence in its offensive unit. However, Cincinnati has greater potential, so the Bengals win this one in a nail-biter.

Chris Perrella
Staff Writer
(3-2)

Miami at St. Louis
As predicted, Miami squeezed out a win against Oakland last week. St. Louis ran up the score early but let San Francisco back into the game in the fourth quarter. If the same thing happens this week the Rams won't be as lucky. Look for the Jay Fiedler show to keep on rolling. Dolphins again.

Pittsburgh at Buffalo
I can guarantee one thing after this game; one team will no longer be winless. The Bills are playing in a tough division this year. Pittsburgh is playing in an even tougher division and would finish last if not for the Browns. This game should answer the age-old question, who is better Rob Johnson or Kordell Stewart? I pick the Bills.

Tampa Bay at Minnesota
Tampa Bay and Minnesota's offenses have not been clicking this year. The Vikings have scored 23 points in two games while the Bucs trounced the Cowboys 10-6 in week one. To make matters worse, the Buccaneers haven't played in two weeks. Last year this game would be pivotal for the division title, but this year it won't matter.

Baltimore at Denver
Denver was having some difficulty with the Cardinals early on but turned it into a blow out. Baltimore enters the game following an upset by the Bengals last week. Baltimore needs to get some production out of the offense or they won't be going anywhere this season. Broncos.

Cincinnati at San Diego
Both of these teams are undefeated this year. San Diego has beaten up on two of the NFL's lesser teams while Cincinnati upset the Super Bowl champions last week. It will be an interesting matchup. I pick San Diego.

Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor
(3-2)

Miami at St. Louis
I've enjoyed Miami ever since Dan Marino left, and I've been disappointed in St. Louis ever since Trent Green left. I choose St. Louis anyway because you all thought I would choose Miami and I'm a loose cannon, you never know what I'm gonna do.

Pittsburgh at Buffalo
Umm... Kordell Stewart stands a better chance of getting a date with Elton John than he does of steering a football team to victory. I thought they dumped him five years ago. For a team whose logo has stars in it, there seems to be a surprising lack of people who are bright on this team.

Tampa Bay at Minnesota
I'm gonna root for Tampa Bay because I don't want to piss Warren Sapp off. Have you seen this man? We're not talking about a man having his own zip code, we're talking about a gravitational pull. Newton used this guy to theorize his equations. You want to know why the apple fell from the tree? Neither do I.

Baltimore at Denver
I'm disgusted that Baltimore lost to Cincinnati last week. Although I shouldn't be surprised given that Elvis Grbac has a mental capacity that rivals spore mold. The Bengals win a game every time Mariah Carey has her picture taken where she doesn't look like a tramp. Denver, simply out of spite.

Cincinnati at San Diego
San Diego, I'll root for you because Doug Flutie has his own cereal and because John Kitna is, hmm ... how shall I put it? A horrendous failure at everything he's ever attempted in life, save piss the heck out of me for his mere existence.

Tragedy at American Memorial

Alex Zanardi's racecar split into two pieces after being collided with.

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

This past weekend was, for the most part, uneventful in the realm of sports, as almost all major U.S.-based sports were cancelled or postponed. However, there were a few sports that decided to continue as scheduled; CART was one of them. Officials felt that the German 500, held at the Eurospeedway in Germany, would provide a distraction from the horrific events of September 11th, and boost the moral of American fans. In a cruel twist of fate, the race—renamed the American Memorial 500—would merely produce another terrifying scene.

Two-time champion Alex Zanardi was on the lead with twelve laps to go, but his good fortune was about to come to a screeching halt. After a routine stop, the 34-year-old Italian attempted to exit pit lane, but apparently accelerated too fast. His car veered out and slid sideways into the path of another car. The other driver, Alex Tagliani, had no time to react to the sudden obstacle, and violently broadsided Zanardi's vehicle at about 200 MPH.

Zanardi's car split in two, dispersing a shower of debris on the track. Spectators could be almost certain that this stomach-turning crash was fatal. But it was the same Zanardi who had survived a 1993 crash that yielded a G-force estimated at 18 times the normal fatal level. The Italian had escaped from the '93 crash with a slightly longer neck (the force actually stretched it) and a subsequent nine-month layoff. This time he would not be quite as fortunate, but miraculously, he did survive. Both of his legs had to be amputated above the knee, and he will require another surgery to repair a fractured pelvis. His celebrated career is over, and he will have to adjust to a drastically different life than the one he enjoyed before.

Before he can begin adjusting to his new life, however, Zanardi must survive the next few crucial days. He suffered from a moderately severe concussion, and is also at risk for delayed heart or kidney failure. For now, he remains in an induced coma. He is in stable condition, however, and doctors are optimistic that he can recover. Despite the life-altering injuries, Zanardi is certainly fortunate to be alive after the horrendous accident.

Even though his career was cut short prematurely, Zanardi left the CART world with plenty of fond memories. After an unsuccessful stint with Formula One, he began his CART career in 1996. He skyrocketed to Rookie of the Year honors that year, and proceeded to dominate the CART scene over the next two seasons, winning back-to-back championships in 1997 and 1998. In 1999 he reverted back to his Formula One struggles, and retired at the end of the season. His retirement was abbreviated, however, when Mo Nunn, who was Zanardi's engineer during the championships and had recently taken on ownership duties, lured him back into the CART circuit for the 2001 season.

He leaves the sport with modern records for points in a season (285 in 1998), most consecutive poles (six), front row starts (11) and on-the-board finishes in a season (15).

While leaving that glory behind will be difficult, Zanardi will have plenty to look forward to. He is the father of a three-year-old son Niccolo, and is reputed to be a dedicated family man. Particularly in the wake of last week's terrorist attacks, fans and acquaintances of Zanardi are simply thankful that he is still alive. Regardless of the loss of his legs, he will still be an able father, husband and friend—the things that count in the long run.

In time, when all the dust settles, Zanardi will surely feel the same way.

Cross country sweeps Gulden Duals

Men's Cross Country also captures team title at Mount St. Mary's Invitational

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

In their first meet of the year, the Gulden Duals held at the BU Golf Club Sept. 8, the men's and women's cross country teams swept their competition. The top five runners from both teams placed among the top ten in their respective fields.

Leading the way for the women was Becki Marshall '02 who finished first of the 42 women in her field with a time of 18:59:49 on a 3.1 mile course.

Greg Costello '03 led the men's team, placing first in a field of 59 competitors. He finished in 26:03:13 on a five-mile course.

Following this meet, the Bison had a two-week period without competition, leaving them well rested and ready for the Mount Saint Mary's Invitational this past weekend.

The men's team again placed all of their top five runners in the top ten and captured the team title with 31 points. Saint Francis was the second place team, trailing the Bison by 52 points.

Costello again led the pack of Bison again. He placed third in a 152-man field and earned a season-best 25:56:00 on the five-mile course.

Close behind was graduate student Kevin Weatherill who made a stellar 2001 debut after sitting out the team's first meet. He placed fifth overall with a time of 26:09:20.

Travis Etters also placed well, crossing the finish line at 26:14:20. This was Etters' fastest time since freshman year, nearly a full minute faster than his performance two weeks earlier at the Gulden Duals.

The final scoring runners were P.J. Ward '02 who placed seventh in 26:18:40 and Lou Palma '03 whose time of 26:19:80 earned him ninth place. These were season best performances for both men.

The women's team placed second among the 13 teams at the meet. With 76 points they fell short only to Georgetown University, a team that placed fifth in the nation last year.

Despite finishing 61 points behind the Hoyas, the Bison were 31 points ahead of their nearest opponent, American University.

Leading the way for the Bison was Theresa Dennis '03, placing 11th out of the 151 runners with a time of 18:59:00 on the 3.1-mile course. Following Dennis was Christina Crowe '02 who placed twelfth in 19:03:40.

Finishing off the Bison's scoring were Kelly McConnell '02 who placed 16th in 19:12:40 , Kristen Ferrell '02 coming in 17th in 19:14:20, and Katie Bishop '05, finishing 31st in 19:56:80.

Similar to the men's team, all of the Lady Bison's top five finishers ran season-best times.

The cross country teams will be in action again this Saturday when the "B" teams will compete in the Lock Haven Invitational.

The gun goes off at 11 am and, if the rest of the season is any indication, the Blue and Orange will be leading the pack.

Controversial no-call aids Colgate in spoiling Bison league opener 2-1

By Tara Utchel
Staff Writer

The men's soccer team failed to bring home a win this past Saturday in their Patriot League opener against Colgate University, losing 2-1.

This was the team's first contest in over a week, since its game against Holy Cross was cancelled due to the national tragedy Sept. 11.

Colgate was the first to get on the scoreboard with 5:39 on the clock, and the Red Raiders managed to hold the Bison scoreless for the entire first half. The game continued at this pace until the 73rd minute of the match.

Captain Andy Aurand '02 sent the ball sailing and found sophomore Chris Beekman inside the 18 yard-line. Beekman squared his hips to the goal and volleyed the ball out of the air to put it past Raider's goalkeeper, Jon Brunell.

Colgate retaliated six minutes later with the last goal of the game. The Raiders' Colyer Curtis capitalized on a cross to break the 1-1 tie.

The Bison battled for the remaining 11 minutes, but failed to put one in the net. The offensive attack and intense physical play of both teams illuminated Van Doren Field. A total of 39 fouls were accrued, 22 of which were awarded to Colgate.

According to Chip Witte '03, the Raiders' game-winning goal should never have been scored. "They scored because of an official's error," Witte said.

Nate Hopfinger '02 was taking the ball out of Bucknell's defensive end, when one of Colgate's forwards illegally tackled Hopfinger from behind. The referees refused to blow the whistle and allowed play to continue.

The Raiders stole the ball while Hopfinger was down and rifled it into the back of the net. Having no control over the officiating, the Orange and Blue were forced to watch the Raider's celebrate their game-winning goal.

Sept. 18, just four days before their devastating loss to Colgate, the Bison suffered another defeat against Monmouth College. The Hawks led the first half, taking a score of 2-0 into halftime. But the Bison refused to be shut out, and Nick Taylor '03 scored just over four minutes into the second half.

Taylor netted his second goal of the season off a pass from classmate Elliott Maruffi-Cowley. Relentless play by Taylor resulted in another Bison goal, when he earned his third point of the night with an assist to Hopfinger.

The score remained tied at 2-2 for most of the game, and the Hawk's goalkeeper made key saves to keep Monmouth alive. The Orange and Blue failed to produce and were punished by a goal from Colgate in the 67th minute.

"The game was very frustrating," Maruffi-Cowley said. "We played hard for 45 minutes. If we had shown up for 90, we would have won the game."

Bucknell moves to a 1-4 overall record, 0-1 in the Patriot League. Its next match is against Sacred Heart Saturday, Sept. 29 at 4 p.m. on home turf. The team knows that this weekend's competition is extremely important. "This weekend will be a great game to turn our season around," Kevin Clifford '04 said. "We put ourselves in a must-win situation—We must play with a sense of urgency."

Maruffi-Cowley agrees. "We've had some unlucky breaks," he said. "We are going to have to work hard this week and create our own luck."

Cy Young a tough call this year

By Rob Schmicker

Baseball is a strange game. Sometimes everything can go your way, and sometimes it seems as if the whole world is out to get you. Just ask Mike Mussina. After signing with the New York Yankees, many thought the Moose would finally get achieve the record to complement his excellent statistics that he achieved with the Orioles. But instead, Roger Clemens has wrongly overshadowed Mussina all season. Without putting the names with their statistics, lets compare the two this year.

Player 'A' has pitched 202 2/3 innings this year and has an ERA of 3.42. He has recorded 192 strikeouts, while giving up 41 walks and 193 hits. Player 'B' has pitched 208 2/3 innings with an ERA of 3.41. He has recorded 193 strikeouts while giving up 62 walks and 188 hits. Deciding who the better pitcher is an unenviable task because both pitchers have almost identical statistics. But if we now take their win-loss record in consideration, we see that payer 'B' is 15-11 while player 'A' is 20-1 and goes by the name of The Rocket. No one has ever gone 20-1 to start the season, and as a result Clemens is getting all the press. I am officially here to tell everyone not to be fooled by the record. Clemens receives 6.93 runs of support per game while Mussina only gets 4.57 runs per game. So who is indeed better? You make the call because it seems to be a deadlock to me.

They are only two of the six candidates for the American League Cy Young Award, though. The others are Freddy Garcia and Jamie Moyer of the Seattle Mariners and Mark Mulder and Tim Hudson of the Oakland A's. Looking solely at their stats, Freddy Garcia seems to be the 'best of the rest', posting a 17-5 record with a 2.85 ERA in 220 2/3 innings. Mark Mulder (20-7, 3.49 ERA) comes in a close second with Troy Hudson in third. But Hudson may be the sleeper in this race. He started off the season 2-3 with a 6.75 ERA and has since gone 14-5 while lowering his ERA to 3.38. I don't know if there is a more 'valuable' pitcher than Tim Hudson, since his success has been paralleled with the recent surge of his team. Oakland recently clinched the wild card even after beginning the year with a dismal 8-18 record. Therefore, I give the Cy Young Award to Tim Hudson, even in light of Clemens incredible year. I mean, without The Rocket, where would the Yankees be- probably still in first place.

In the National League, there is also no clear-cut winner. Matt Morris (20-7) and rookie Wade Miller (16-7) have been the real surprises this year, but they lack the big name and thus won't win. As a result, either Greg Maddux, Curt Schilling or Randy Johnson will win. Maddux is 17-9 with a 3.00 ERA for the Braves, and has only walked 25 batters all year. His control is incredible and a result has turned a 'subpar' year into a 17-win season. I don't know if he can completely be overlooked, because of his reputation.

Even in light of Maddux's good year, I believe the NL Cy Young Award will go to one of the Arizona Diamondbacks aces. They are simply the most overpowering pitchers in baseball and will be hard to handle come the playoffs. Schilling is enjoying his best season, posting a 20-6 record, with a 3.02 ERA and 264 strikeouts. Johnson (19-6) on the other hand has won less games but has an incredible 2.40 ERA and 350 strikeouts, a feat no one besides Nolan Ryan has accomplished. The Big Unit is making everyone look like John Kruk did in the 1993 All-Star Game. He is tall, he is mean, and he is down right scary. How many times have we seen him give up two runs and still lose because of a lack of support. A little more run support and he could well be 22-3.

Maybe Nick Bakay is indeed wrong when he says that "Numbers Never Lie." Three pitchers have won 20 games so far this year, and none of them deserve the Cy Young Award. They are beaten out by pitchers who give up less runs, with the support of less runs. My point is: If Roger Clemens gave up six runs a game, he could still be 20-1, just with an ERA of 6.00. How could he possibly be the best pitcher in that case? My advice to those who cast the votes—don't just look at records and gaudy statistics, but look inside the numbers to find the real Cy Young Award winners.

The Yankees' Roger Clemens, with a 20-1 record, is just one of the many pitchers in contention for the Cy Young Award this season.

At the Flight A singles, freshmen Nadezda Curcic and Ashley Diers enjoyed solid performances. Curcic went 2-2 on the weekend with a 1-1 performance on Sunday. She defeated Amanda Doetsch of Marist, 8-3, before falling 9-7 to Marist's Diana Perachio to end her singles day.

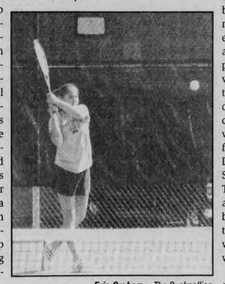
Diers went 2-0 on Sunday after a 1-1 finish on Saturday. She picked up huge victories over Loyola's Carolyn Pilkington, 8-1, and Pittsburgh's Jill Williams, 8-2. In doubles action, the rookie pairing faced Georgetown's Jordan Botjer and Chelsea Kammerer in the championship match, falling 8-0 for a second place finish.

Samantha Berthod '04 and Captain Kristin Inglis '02 were Bucknell's representatives at singles Flight B and at the Flight B doubles slot. In singles action, Berthod posted a 2-2 overall record on the weekend. On Sunday, she dropped an 8-4 decision to Kaitlin Russo of Loyola before ending the day with an 8-3 victory over St. Joseph's Jill Simondejka.

Inglis also went 2-2 in singles play, with a 2-0 performance on Sunday. She opened play with an 8-2 win against Kara Bliss of Marist and defeated Jena Fiore of Pittsburgh, 8-3, for her final singles match. In doubles action, the pair dropped an 8-1 decision to Villanova to go 1-2 for the tournament.

The day wasn't over for Sichko who teamed up with Kristen Pugno '04 for Flight C doubles. The duo advanced to the championship match, falling 8-3 to Pittsburgh's Jena Fiore and Hayley Hughes for second place.

Meanwhile, in the Garden State the men showed why they have been a force for years. Denefrio and Tien, both freshmen, exhibited maturity and poise in plowing their way through to the finals of doubles competition, while familiar faces Alex Davydov, Scott Allen, Tood Jacobs, and Lee Scarborough continued their winning ways.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Tanya Sichko '05 won the Flight C singles at the women's Invitational

The stars of the week were Denefrio and Tien, the doubles team that reached the championship match in its first competition in a Bucknell uniform. The duo, seeded second in the tournament, defeated the doubles team from Dowling, 6-1, 6-1, and went on to defeat Loyola's doubles squad in the semi-finals, 6-4, 6-1.

The only loss the tandem suffered was a tough 4-6, 6-3, 5-10 tiebreaker, to top-seeded Towson in the championship match.

"I expected them to compete at the level they did," Head Coach Bob Hammerlee said. "I was impressed that they came together and exhibited that kind of composure for their first time playing together. They played an excellent first couple matches and then faced a tough opponent in Towson."

'Tough' could describe the day in New Jersey when Alex Davydov set a record for longest ECAC tennis match with a grueling four-hour, 20-minute marathon versus John McConnell of Loyola, 6-4, 5-7, 7-6 (5).

While awaiting his next opponent, it was decided that he should rest rather than risk an injury, so he was kept out of the rest of the tournament. Davydov exhibited heart, something that can't be taught.

"He plays every match to his fullest ability and gives us 110 percent; a true champ," Hammerlee said.

In other action, Scott Allen '02 was impressive at the second flight, making it to the semi-finals before losing to second-seeded Ilye Ivenov of Dowling, 6-1, 6-0. Allen defeated Tyler Burt of Cabrini, 6-1, 6-0, and received a victory by default on his way to the semi-finals.

"Scott had a decisive victory in his first match of the day that did not test him enough," Hammerlee said. "He hadn't gotten his tennis blood flowing yet when he had to face Ivenov."

The men's tennis team is in action again on Sunday, Oct. 7 when it hosts Duquesne for a 2 p.m. match.

The women's tennis team travels to St. Joseph's on Saturday, Oct. 6 for a 12 p.m. match.

Fresno State, North Carolina add unexpected to college football season

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

Perhaps the strongest statement in college football this year was made by the Miami Hurricanes in their season opener at State College. The Nittany Lions (2-0), determined that a win over the 'Canes would remedy a pathetic 2000-2001 campaign, were slaughtered in front of 109,313 quiet fans at Beaver Stadium.

Heisman Trophy candidate Ken Dorsey picked apart the Penn State defense, connecting on 20 of 27 passes for a career-high 344 yards. After demolishing a pitiful Rutgers team 61-0 in their second contest, the stage was set for the number one 'Canes to host number 13 Washington, in what looked to be a dogfight. Washington (2-0) had just come off a victory in heroic fashion against Michigan in their opener. Husky cornerback Omare Lowe single-handedly stole the game from the Wolverines in less than one minute of play. He blocked a Michigan field goal that was run back for a touchdown, and then ran back an interception for another touchdown, giving the Huskies a 23-18 victory.

However, due to the tragedy that struck the nation on Sept. 11, the Husky-Hurricane showdown was re-scheduled for Nov. 24. That game will now have even bigger bowl implications if the teams can fight through their tough conference schedules. Washington defeated Idaho on Saturday 53-3.

Undoubtedly, the biggest surprise of the season has been Fresno State.

Quarterback David Carr is making a shocking early case for the Heisman. He has thrown for nearly 1100 yards and has 10 touchdown passes in four games.

After squeaking out a 24-22 win on the road in their opener at Colorado, the Bulldogs were set to do battle with Oregon State, who was ranked 12th at the time. In a game that initially looked doubtful for Fresno State to even compete, the Bulldogs hammered the Beavers 44-24. The Bulldogs' Cinderella story continued when they strolled into Madison and beat the Badgers, who were ranked 23rd at the time. This was the first game since 1993 that Fresno had played in as a ranked team.

On Saturday the Bulldogs hammered Tulsa 37-18 to improve their record to 4-0, with three of their wins coming on the road.

Florida State was supposed to cakewalk through their first four games before facing Miami. The Seminoles (2-1) did just that in their first two, smacking both Duke and UAB by a combined 64 points. However, the 'Noles were shocked on Saturday at Chapel Hill in by far the biggest upset of the year, losing to the Tar Heals (1-3) 41-9.

This was the highest-ranked opponent that North Carolina has defeated since its win over Duke in 1960. However, Florida State, who has been in the national title game for the past three years, is not completely out of contention for the championship this year. They lost their second game of the season in 1998 at North Carolina State and still made it to the Fiesta Bowl. However, the Seminoles have Miami, Florida, Georgia Tech, and Clemson remaining on this year's schedule.

Nobody has forgotten about number 2 Florida, it's just that they have not been tested yet. They have won their first three contests by a combined 118 points. Quarterback Rex Grossman threw for 375 yards in a 49-14 win against Marshall and proceeded to toss for 331 yards in a 55-6 victory over Louisiana-Monroe.

On Saturday, Grossman continued to display the hot hand as he threw for 302 yards and four touchdowns in a 44-10 punishing of Kentucky. This was the 15th straight victory for the Gators (3-0) in their series with the Wildcats. Perhaps their first true test will come this weekend when they host Mississippi State.

Although most of the Top 25 have taken care of their business thus far, there are a few exceptions. One in particular is Notre Dame. The Irish (0-2) strutted into Lincoln for their opener against Nebraska with high hopes to compete for the national championship. A win over the Corn Huskers would have sent them well on their way.

This was not possible, however, as the Irish offense was completely shut down. The Husker defense allowed just 43 yards on the ground and 119 yards in the air. In a game that was not as close as the final score indicated the Irish took a 27-10 loss.

Looking to bounce back on Saturday, Notre Dame hosted Michigan State. In a contest that was as "must-win" as it can get for the Irish, they were stifled once again, this time by the Spartan defense. Notre Dame quarterback Matt LoVecchio was held to just 124 passing yards.

Ultimately, it came down to a Spartan quick slant play with the Irish blitzing that resulted in the game-winning touchdown. Ironically, this play was almost identical to the one that beat the Irish last season in East Lansing. The road does not get much easier for Notre Dame as they travel to College Station this week to face 3-0 Texas A&M.

American deals women's soccer first loss on year

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

The women's soccer team saw their four-game winning streak come to an end this past Saturday in Washington, D.C. as they fell to new Patriot League member American University 2-0.

The Bison were slow coming out of the gate and fell behind early when the home team put two in the net in a span of six minutes. This position was a familiar one for the Orange and Blue, as they have given up a goal within the first 20 minutes in three of their four previous games.

"I told the team that if we didn't score early we would put ourselves in a tough situation," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

But Bucknell turned things around in the second half, dominating play but still having difficulty hitting the back of the net. Tri-Captain Tara Utchel '03 came close in the 54th minute when she banged the crossbar from 25 yards out. Forward Savannah Rennels '04 almost scored four minutes later but was denied by a diving American goalie.

"We played much better defensively in the second half," Findlay said. "We didn't pressure them in the first half, and because of that they could make their own decisions. That is how the two goals were scored."

Findlay says her team has shown a tendency to wait until the second half to get going. "It has happened every game this year, and we are more talented than that," she said.

"We had chances to score, but we couldn't capitalize," midfielder Lauren Schwarz '02 said. "We dominated, but when it came down to it, we couldn't put the ball in the net.

"As a team, we need to focus on our finishing. Playing against American showed us that other areas of our game are strong, but we need to score in order to win games."

"We have a lot of players who can take shots, but we are lacking depth in finishing," Findlay agreed. "The difference between finishing and shooting is a certain mentality that we lacked on Saturday, but it's tough to coach mentality. You can try and bring it out of someone, but teammates need to bring it out of each other."

Some bright spots for the Bison included the play of frontrunner Kristie Simon '04 and midfielder Melissa Lawson '03.

"Kristie played her best game of the season so far," Findlay said. "She created key opportunities, while Melissa was consistent in the middle and won the 50-50 balls."

Abbey Seaboyer '04 also kept up her effective play in the back. "She was strong in organizing the defense and going forward," Assistant Coach Meghan Lynch said.

"American was not a better team than us," Utchel said. "They happened to capitalize on the few chances that they had; we just had problems putting the ball in the net."

"I think playing American was a learning experience," Rennels said. "From this game, we realized we need to challenge ourselves more to become the best that we can be so that we can compete for the top in the Patriot League."

The Orange and Blue will be at home this Sunday in a non-conference matchup against St. Joseph's at 2 p.m.

"They are a hard-working team and they play a very straightforward attack," Findlay said about the upcoming opponent. "If we don't score early we could find ourselves in another position of coming from behind."

Major League ... Wiffleball?

Commentary

Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

I suppose it will be easier for everyone if I just come right out and say it. I'm a closet wiffleball player. I've been playing in the minor leagues for a few years now. My friends and I will play homerun derby, night-ball and any other variation on the game we can find. Whatever suits our fancy that evening.

I never thought about being called up to the majors before. I didn't even know there WERE majors. I can still remember where I was when I got the call though: sitting in my dorm room, typing on instant messenger, jamming to some tunes, not doing homework, an evening just like any other. I'm tapping my foot to a particularly catchy riff of Hootie and the Blowfish when, being unaccustomed to receiving telephone calls, the phone rings and startles me.

"Hello?" I shakily whisper into the receiver. "Hey Aaron! It's Ads... what's up?" The next few minutes were a blur to me, but I do remember a warm mass of urine trickling down my leg and myself faintly uttering the words, "Of course I'll be there. I won't let you down."

When the initial shock wore off and I put on a clean pair of pants to hide my embarrassment, I ran to a friend's room and shared the news. She was so excited for me, I could tell. I remember her saying "Wiffleball? Uh, okay...." She put to words exactly how I was feeling. The most magnificent feeling of my life. The day I got called up to four-man Bronxville D.R.A.Ms (do NOT ask). We were heading to Natick, Mass., just outside of Boston, for the World Tournament Federation's wiffleball contest.

With over $2000 at stake, I began my grueling training regime that very night. A combination of ten pushups, ten situps, four dorm room shuttle sprints (approximately 10 feet each sprint), and a voice preparation lesson where I yell at myself in the mirror saying "Come on! Pick up the pace! Leave your 'B' game at home, you bring your 'A' game to work."

The day after my first training session was the hardest. I couldn't move my muscles and my head was pounding. Not enough Evian. I had worked on my voice preparations so much I had made myself cry, but I knew it would be worth it when I was out on the field, staring out 100 feet to center field, knowing that there were numerous people watching the game, eight to be precise, and knowing that any one of them could have bet on me, could be banking their entire future on whether or not I come through in a pinch.

The weeks went on like that. Training, crying, eating, sleeping, talking with friends, going to bars, watching movies, reading books. In fact, those weeks were the same as any other, just with this ominous shadow looming on the horizon that only had one name: Natick, Massachusetts' World Tournament Federation Wiffleball Series.

We drove up to Natick in two cars, driving in tandem, with walkie-talkies in each car to keep player morale high. We would use our aggressive New York driving skills to force cars out of the fast lane to make ourselves feel more powerful than we were, all the while laughing nervously about the challenge ahead. We stopped at Subway for dinner and I could barely touch my meatball wedge. The other guys were so nervous they just kept eating and acting like nothing was happening. Maybe they just hid their terror better than I did, but I could tell they were just as scared as I was on the inside.

After arriving at our sleeping quarters, a house turned major league dugout, we went out to some local school's soccer field and practiced. I practiced pitching. Forty feet away and a speed limit of 50 miles per hour seems impossible, but it wasn't. I worked on my curve ball and my fastball mostly. They both looked the exact same with a high sweeping arc and roughly the same speed. I hadn't worked on my knuckleball, but I doubt it would have done me any good. These were pros. They didn't get to these tournaments by not being able to hit a 10 mile per hour wiffleball. After our midnight practice, I ran our plays over in my head a thousand times: run to the ball, catch the ball. It was so simple, yet so complex and I was worried I would forget it in the middle of the game. I had trouble focusing, not to mention sleeping that night.

As day broke we strapped on our gear of shoes, socks, shirts and shorts, to intimidate our opponents by the sheer normalcy of our attire. We got our team number and our opponent and headed to the field. The sight was more beautiful than I could imagine. Over a hundred people from all walks of life communing with a thin yellow bat and a big ball of love.

Batting practice was tense as my teammates kept telling me to stop crying and swing the bat. I knew they understood though, and were just trying to look normal for all the other players. Intimidation factor again.

Our first game went splendidly until we lost. We were held to one hit and only four walks in seven shutout innings in a 1-0 loss. The highlight of the game came in the third inning when I was in the outfield, my eyes still blurry from crying and the batter launched a solid shot towards the center field fence. I tracked it in the sky, shielding the sun from my eyes and reaching out to catch the ball like our game plan had prepared me for as I smacked into the iron fence and caught the ball before it could leave the yard, stealing a three run homer from the visiting team. In order to balance out my performance in the game, I went 0-4 with a walk at the plate. The pitcher was throwing high and inside and I couldn't get full extension on the bat to knock it into fair territory.

I won't bore you with the details of our remaining three games. We lost them all and only mustered a total of 10 hits and two runs. My spectacular grab over the center field wall was the only defensive play I made, after a hamstring injury forced me into the DH role.

I look back on that magnificent weekend where I touched the highest echelons of the sports world and soared among the pigeons of wiffleball tournaments. It's still hazy, like a dream. It's not easy to climb to the top of Mount Olympus only to crawl back down. I never touched a wiffleball after that summer. I hung up my shorts in my closet where they still hang, smelly and unclean, just like I left them two years ago. I was never asked back to play because my friends knew I had nothing left to prove to anyone. Who knows if I'll ever return to the sport I loved so much. I suppose only time will tell.

Volleyball 2-0 in league play

Bison knock off Lehigh with clutch performances from underclassmen

By Pat Evans
Senior Writer

Raving Bison fans' chants of 'it's all over' halfway through the first game of a women's volleyball match-up against Lehigh may have been premature, but the poise and intensity of the Orange and Blue let everyone in Davis Gym know that there was little hope for the frustrated opponents.

Bucknell improved to 2-0 in the Patriot League by knocking off the Mountain Hawks 3-1 (30-24, 26-30, 30-26, 30-28) over the weekend.

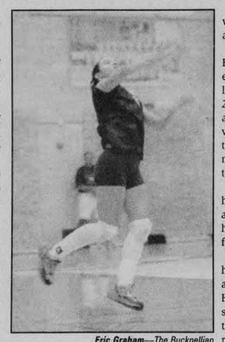
It was the underclassmen that led the way for the Bison. Brandi Trapasso '04 posted a team-high 14 kills and a match high four service aces. Defensively, Trapasso dove all over the floor, recording another match-high 20 digs.

Jackie Leahy '05 also had a solid match, recording 13 kills and 14 digs to create a much-needed balanced attack against Lehigh.

"We played really good defense against their outside hitters," Trapasso said. "Last year we had a problem digging outside against Lehigh."

In fact, Lehigh had been a struggle for the Bison for a few years. Senior Shannon Walker had never before beaten the Mountain Hawks in regular season play. But this year an intimidating home court advantage for the Bison and a nucleus of returning players put an end to the losing streak.

"That was the best we've played as a team all year long," Walker said. "The crowd support was a great advantage for us as the home team."



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Brandi Trapasso '04 recorded four aces in a victory over Lehigh.

Earlier in the week Bucknell struggled, losing an extremely close match to Villanova 3-2 (30-19, 16-30, 30-22, 28-30, 16-14). The Bison answered every Wildcat advantage, coming from behind twice in the match, but the final and deciding game went to Villanova.

Whitney Williams '02 had 38 assists and 10 digs, and Walker tallied a match-high 24 kills in the losing effort.

"Given the fact that we hadn't played in a week, it was an excellent competition," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "Our main intention for the Villanova match was to get ready for Patriot League play."

Bucknell proved that they had done just that by responding to a three-match skid, winning its Patriot League opener at home against Lafayette 3-0 (30-17, 30-15, 30-22).

Walker tallied a match-high 14 kills and four blocks to lead the way, while Williams put up 27 assists and Trapasso pounded ten kills.

"It was really important for us to start the Patriot League season on an upswing," Opalski said.

The win the following day against a strong Lehigh squad shows that the Bison have what it takes to continue their winning ways in the League. "One thing that will make a difference in repeating as Patriot League champions is the depth and talent of our team," Opalski said. "This is the best team we've had in the last five years."

The team will face its ultimate challenge when it takes on newcomer and League favorite American University this weekend.

"American is a very balanced team," Opalski said. "They have the ability to attack you from a bunch of different positions."

The confidence that the Bison have built up will play a vital role when the team travels to Washington, D.C. for the big game.

"American laces up their shoes the same way we do," Opalski said. "It's about putting together the preparation to get the job done."

Bucknell plays St. Francis next, and then face Navy the day after their match with American.

"We're going to take this one match at a time," Opalski said. "We don't want to over emphasize the importance of any one match."

Men's water polo sinks Hopkins, GW

By Barb Morgan
Staff Writer

Hosting League games at home this weekend, the men's water polo team went 2-2 bringing their overall record to 3-4.

Opening the weekend with Johns Hopkins, who beat the Bison in a tournament two weeks ago, the Orange and Blue came out strong and ready to play. The Bison gained a three goal lead early in the fourth quarter, fueled by freshman Elliot Benoist's four goals and senior Ryan McCarty's three. Hopkins answered back, however, with three, fourth quarter goals to Bucknell's one. McCarty's goal would prove to be the game winner as the Bison held on 11-10 with tight defense led by senior Dave Kennedy, who also had 12 saves in the cage.

With the stands of Freas-Rooke pool filled, the Bison next took on Navy. The Midshipmen built a 4-1 lead by the end of the first quarter, and had a 6-2 lead by the half.

"Although we're well aware of Navy's driving strategies, we weren't quick to react position-wise and had to play catch up against a strong defense," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

The Bison were able to tighten their defense and hold Navy to three second half goals, but the deficit incurred was too large to overcome as the Bison fell 9-3.

Despite the tough loss to Navy, the Bison were ready to take on number-14 ranked Princeton the following morning. Solid play by the Bison kept the game close, as the team went into the third quarter down by only a goal to the Tigers. Defense and controlling the Princeton offense were the main objectives of the third quarter and Bucknell accomplished these tasks well, as the score remained 6-5 at the end of the third quarter.

Head Coach John Zeigler talks to his squad over the weekend.

In the fourth quarter, the Tigers responded with tight defensive play of their own kept the Bison from scoring while putting three of their own in the net to end the game 9-5.

Jamie Saettele '02 paced the Bison with two goals, an assist, a steal, and an ejection. Benoist also scored two goals with a steal and an ejection drawn, while McCarty added a goal, two assists, two steals and two ejections drawn.

Senior Dave Kennedy had a season best performance in the cage recording 18 saves.

"I was pleased with the defensive performance, but I would have liked to see the guys be more productive offensively," he said. "We need more goals against big teams to have a chance to get the wins; but to be down only one goal going into the fourth quarter against the fourteenth ranked team in the nation is a good indicator of where we could be in a few weeks."

In their fourth and final match, the Bison took on the well-rested George Washington squad, playing its only game of the weekend. Bucknell and GW battled back and forth, trading goals all game long. The largest lead held by the Orange and Blue was two goals at 6-4 in the fourth quarter. GW quickly scored two unanswered goals, making the game even yet again.

With six ties the game would come down to the wire as Saettele made a key steal with 1:49 left which translated into the game winning goal. Freshman Aaron Platshon also made a critical steal with seconds left, which thwarted a GW tie attempt. McCarty scored a team high three goals and had three steals, while Saettele and Benoist each added two and Junior Chris Saxton added one. Kennedy finished another big day in the cage with 17 saves.

"Although playing solid defense, Bucknell did not move on offense and counter GW enough. Even though we came away with the victory, the Bison know we cannot afford to stop our transition and offensive pressure in any game," Zeigler said.

Zeigler looked at the weekend very positively. "It will set us up well in seeding for the next round of league competition where all Southern teams come together. We wanted to knock off Navy and/or Princeton and though falling short in that task, we learned that we are capable of beating those teams already," he said.

Benoist echoed these sentiments. "We knew coming in that we would have to beat Hopkins and GW, especially after losing to Hopkins earlier in the season. The Princeton and Navy games showed us what we have to work on," Benoist said.

The Bison are in action again next weekend on Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 29-30, at the North/South Invitational at Princeton.

Tanya Sichko '05, Nick Denefrio '05, and Leland Tien 05 headline Bucknell's "fresh" start to the 2001-2002 tennis season. Playing in their first competition of the fall season, the men traveled to Mercer County, N.J. for the ECAC Men's Open Southern Division Tournament, while the women hosted their own fall classic here this past weekend.

Sichko had an impressive collegiate debut, finishing as the champion in Flight C singles at the women's Invitational.

"I didn't expect to win the tournament, especially when I had to face Georgetown," Sichko said, "but things worked out after all. The weeks of practice and the support from the girls who came to watch really gave me the motivation to win."

The tournament included players from Bucknell, Bloomsburg, Georgetown, Loyola, Marist, Pittsburgh, St. Joseph's and Villanova.

"The overall magnitude of the tournament was huge, with eight solid teams from the area," head coach Rebecca Helt said. "The fact that we can guarantee four single matches for each player is good for

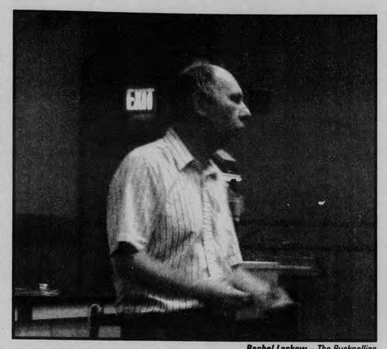
Introgression lecture explains origin of A. strigosa

Mark Blumler discussed the development and future of the genotype in society

By Nate Ivanick
Staff Writer



Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian
Mark Blumler spoke Friday on "Introgression as a Spatial Phenomenon" during a University biology series lecture.

Mark Blumler, this week's speaker at the Biology Department's series discussions, spoke on "Introgression as a Spatial Phenomenon." His studies consisted of both biological and geographic factors influencing the evolution of organisms. Blumler's main research concentrated on an invasive species of wild oat, Avena barbata, in California.

Introgression is an important topic in many aspects of biology and everyday life. It is the second step of a process that can potentially create new species. The first step is hybridization. In simplest terms, if two separate species are somehow able to overcome species boundaries, and mate, their offspring is said to be a hybrid of the two. Often, this hybrid is infertile, and dies without leaving offspring.

Sometimes this generation is able to mate and mates with one of its parent species. This it is known as introgression.

In agriculture, introgression is the cause of crop-weed interactions that can lead to lower crop productivity.

For conservation biologists, introgression can lead to extinction of native species through the cross with alien species. This is not to say that introgression is negative. In fact, the modern species of corn consumed today is the result of introgression of corn.

Introgression is very rare among hybrid animals because they rarely survive long enough to reproduce and most are infertile.

In plants introgression is more common. Plant classification is a genetic nightmare because plants hybridize and introgress very often. In fact, introgression is currently the major source of plant evolution. An estimated 50 percent of the world's plants may be the result of hybridization and introgression.

Blumler's work focused on Avena barbata, a species introduced to southern California from Spain in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Being well adapted to Spain's Mediterranean climate, A. barbata thrived, becoming so widespread in California that it threatened the native species.

In the 1970s, geneticists at UC Davis studied the patterns of certain genes in A. barbata throughout California. They found that in all of southern California, the A. barbata had only one pattern, but in northern California, where the climate is much wetter and cooler, another genotype had emerged.

The geneticists explained that natural selection and evolution must have favored this new gene, and thus spread it quickly.

Blumler analyzed their data and found that natural selection was not a valid explanation for this phenomenon, for in some forests in California, which are suited to this new type of plant, Blumler found no A. barbata at all. From a biological standpoint, this does not make sense.

Blumler examined the distribution of organisms based on where railroads used to cross, and currently, where the most highways are, and found that the oat is more common in areas well traveled by humans. This suggests that humans are spreading the new genotype over geographical barriers.

But what exactly is this new type of oat? Blumler determined that it was the result of an introgression of a hot climate ancestor oat, Avena strigosa. Geneticists probably did not consider this because A. strigosa is now almost extinct. Surprisingly, A. barbata is almost identical in every respect to A. strigosa.

This new genotype is even better suited to California because it can now survive in both moist cool climates and hot warm climates.

Blumler has predicted that in the next several decades, A. barbata could become a major agricultural and wildlife problem because it is so well adapted. Blumler's research may be useful in combating this potential problem.

Every Friday in the Rooke Auditorium, the Bucknell Biology Department hosts a seminar with guest speakers from across the country. These speakers are usually professors who do research on everything biological from cancer research, to evolutionary ecology.

Internet now provides low cost "intertainment"

By Erin Grim
Staff Writer

Hate to have to choose between the season premier of "Friends" and a biology study group? Wish you could have seen Dave's last concert? Well, worry no more. Bucknell now offers to its students the Intertainer(tm).

The Intertainer allows students to choose between a large selection of movies, TV shows, classic and independent films, as well as concerts and free music videos and to enjoy them all on their own computers. Prices range from $0.75 for a TV show to $3.99 for new movie releases. The Intertainer promises 24-hour access and free registration.

This new program can save a trip to the video store. It is convenient for the average student who does not have a car, VCR, TV or DVD player. The Intertainer caters to the busy life of a college student. Also, payments are done per show, so the Intertainer will not overcharge its customers for programs that they are not watching, nor will students have to pay any late fees.

On the other hand, some may argue that, here at Bucknell, we have our own network which offers movies, videos and TV shows for free. So what is the benefit of the Intertainer? For one thing, the Intertainer could offer better quality, as well as a bigger selection of programs to choose from.

The question now is how will students react to the new system?

First-year student Eric Steinbach said, "Yeah I'm definitely signing up. I miss stuff I want to see all the time."

First-year student Lauren Turkington feels the Intertainer is very practical. She believes it could make dorm life a little better. "I'm ordering it because now there won't be fighting with eight other people in the lounge over one TV," she said. Turkington also realizes the potential of a personal cinema, "Since I've been at school there are lots of movies that have come out that I wanted to see."

Convinced? All you have to do is log on to http://www.intertainer.com/bucknell to start your free account. The service will be billed automatically to your credit or bank card.

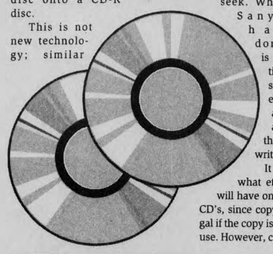
New CD-R disc may put a stop to illegal bootlegging

By Parker Terril
Staff Writer

With the Internet file swapping community under constant fire in the media and engaged in numerous legal battles, software and music companies have decided to attack the problem of illegal pirating at its roots. Sanyo recently released a brand new CD-Rom disc that allegedly prevents illegal bootlegging of the material contained on it. The disc is hard coded with a secret imbedded file which Sanyo claims causes errors when copying from the original disc onto a CD-R disc.

This is not new technology; similar files have been standard in CD-R discs for some time. However, shortly after the older discs were released, software was developed to find and bypass the hidden file. When the protection file was moved or changed on newer batches of disc, pirates would change their software to match it in a continuous cycle of hide and seek. What Sanyo has done is create a copy-protection file that varies in size and location on every disc, making it almost impossible for a program to identify the file unless it is rewritten for each disc.

The hidden program causes errors to occur in the copying process, thereby making the burned CD unable to run properly.



It will be hard to say what effect these new discs will have on the copying of music CD's, since copying music is not illegal if the copy is intended for personal use. However, copying software, such as games, programs or operating system discs, is illegal and therefore most of these new discs will be sold to their appropriate software vendors.

The hidden file will not affect sharing of programs and music over the Internet. Music or programs obtained through the Internet and then solely used on a computer will still run fine, even though they might contain the hidden file. Also, older programs and files will most likely still work because they were made before the introduction of Sanyo's smart disc.

The program takes effect when a file containing it is burned onto a CD-R disc, or when a person tries to directly burn a copy of a disc containing the hidden file. The hidden program causes errors in the copying process, thereby preventing the burned CD unable from running properly.

Sanyo has said that it expects to receive an extra $3 - 5 million in profit from the first year of the discs release.

Lisa Roney and Junse Kim present prose readings

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

The Stadler Center for Poetry kicked off the new season with prose readings by Lisa Roney and Junse Kim last Sunday night.

Roney, the author of "Sweet Invisible Body: Reflections on a Life With Diabetes," is a new addition to the Nonfiction area of the English department. She is from Memphis, and holds a BA in art from Carleton College, an MFA in fiction from Penn State and is currently working on her PhD in American literature at Penn State.

Kim is also a new arrival, after receiving the University's Philip Roth Residence in Creative Writing. He was honored with the William Faulkner Award for short fiction last year, and has published short stories in ZYZZYVA and the Ontario Review. Kim is a professor at the University of San Francisco, and also teaches fiction for the University of California, Berkeley Extension Program.

Roney began the reading by describing how the recent national crisis has affected her students and their writing.

"Because of this crisis, now is the time for nonfiction writing," Roney said. "Now my students can't say that nothing worth writing about has happened in their lifetime. This is a time when they need to write with passion."

The crisis also affected Roney's choice of material, forcing her to be more cautious with her decision.

"I struggled all week with the issue of what I would read tonight," Roney said. "I wasn't ready to read my immediate thoughts in a public forum."

Roney finally decided to read one of her older stories published in Harper's entitled "Nothing by Comparison"—a war story which tells of a couple watching the news on television as civil war begins to break out in Yugoslavia. The man once had an affair with a Yugoslavian woman—the memory of this woman haunts him, while the intensity of their past haunts his current girlfriend.

Roney refers to the Yugoslavian woman as "M," keeping her characters anonymous. The woman becomes obsessed with the idea of M, knowing that her distorted memory lives in the boyfriend's mind, creating the image of a perfect person that probably doesn't exist.

"Both the woman and her boyfriend romanticize his affair with the Yugoslavian woman," Roney said.

Roney succeeded in communicating the woman's dream of M's return, and the simultaneous feelings of terror and curiosity. This idea is conveyed through the woman's line, "I have let her grow in the soil of my love life—watering her with my fear."

Perhaps this openness and emotion is due to the source of inspiration for Roney's story.

"A personal experience inspired me to write the story," she said. "While it does intensify and magnify my own reaction to my personal situation, the basic 'facts' are true—I dated a man who had had an affair with a Yugoslavian woman shortly before the civil war began there."

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian

Lisa Roney entertains the crowd with a reading of original poetry from her book.

Junse Kim continued the reading with excerpts from his novel, a work in progress tentatively entitled Belay. The novel is told from the points of view of three different people, spanning three generations of a family that has lived in Korea and the U.S.

Kim read excerpts from chapters that fluctuated between the son, Steve, and his mother. Tension rises as both mother and son attempt to bridge the generation and culture gap that exists between them.

Kim spoke with added emotion as he adopted the voice of each character. Steve's mother lives in a state of confusion, struggling with her own identity as a Korean woman living in the United States.

"I was not who I thought I was," Kim said, speaking in the mother's voice.

The mother also struggles with the identity of her son—what she thinks he should be, and how he views himself. She expresses this supposed loss of identity through a powerful line: "My son thinks he is American, but he is Korean."

The sense of family is poignant in these excerpts, as Kim describes a scene where Steve's mother, as a child, is meticulously imitating the way her father eats a peach. Another moving scene comes when Steve's mother is annoyed with her son, yet still wonders if he is hungry or tired—if there is anything she can do for him. She has even kept his room the same since he left, because "if you destroy the nest, the bird never comes back."

The inspiration for Kim's novel came from the grandfather he never met, "a wealthy man who got into trouble with the Korean government, which the United States installed after WWII, for funding an opposing political party." Kim said that the Korean CIA tried to "persuade" his grandfather to stay out of political affairs.

"What interested me was, how would my grandfather feel if he had to live in the United States, the country responsible for backing the oppressive government that directly affected him?" Kim said. "And how would he feel interacting with a third generation that was assimilated into American culture, a generation who had learned a modern history of Korea that portrayed the United States as saviors and negated his own experiences?"

University students were generally able to relate to the authors' works, and respected their readings.

"The authors read beautifully," Lauren Dana '04 said. "They chose topics that really connected with the audience."

Kim expressed his feelings about writing, echoing the idea Roney presented earlier, the need to write with passion.

"Writing allows me to become much more self-aware and empathetic to others," he said. "It forces me to critically analyze how emotions are processed internally, then expressed externally. Passion for writing is about taking risks. You have to be willing to do something that may not feel safe."

DePiano speaks about theater career

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

Students sometimes feel they need to give up their passions and take up more career-oriented studies when they begin their college years. Unfortunately, hobbies such as theatre, art and music often fall by the wayside.

However, Hillary DePiano '02 is one University student who refused to let that happen. She has consistently been involved in theatre on campus playing many different roles. DePiano, a senior double-majoring in English and Theatre, started performing in elementary school in her hometown of Parsippany, N.J. She continued performing throughout middle and high school but said she never planned to be as involved in theatre when she came to University.

She decided to try out for the cocktails, student-directed plays, during the fall semester of her freshman year.

"Just for fun," she said.

She won a role in the cocktail play "Home Free." She then tried out for both spring semester main-stage productions during the second half of her freshman year and got parts in each of them, prompting her to major in theatre.

"I realized theatre had sucked me back in," she said.

Since making that decision, DePiano has performed in numerous plays, including "Merrily We Roll Along," "Tea in a China Cup," "As You Like It" and "Sister Mary Ignatius Explains It All For You." She is currently rehearsing for her role in "Hard Times."

However, her talent does not stop at acting. She was also assistant director of "The Game of Love and Chance," and directed both "The Chinese Restaurant Syndrome" and "Joined at the Head." As if that weren't enough, she is the president of Cap and Dagger, the theatre club on campus, and has been chosen to direct and rewrite "The Love of Three Oranges," which will run next semester.

DePiano said she enjoys theatre because it gives one the chance to be someone else, and there is always the opportunity to affect one's audience.

"I love getting to place yourself into a world that is the creation of the cast and production staff," she said. "It's also satisfying when you are able to touch an audience; to illicit laughter, tears, or even just sympathy for characters that exist only in the mind of the playwright and actors."

On the production side, she said she likes the workshops that occur before plays. She particularly enjoyed the accent workshops she participated in for "Tea in a China Cup" and "Hard Times," and the stage combat workshop for "As You Like It."

"The workshops are an exciting opportunity to work with a professional," she said. "They are enjoyable and expand my theatrical knowledge by opening my mind to new experiences."

Theatre is an exciting and rewarding experience for DePiano.

"I have been most proud of 'Joined at the Head,' which I directed at the beginning of the Spring semester," DePiano said. "We had a short rehearsal period, but I had an amazing cast and we completely revamped the script to do it with a very minimalist set in a very intimate setting. It was my first time directing completely on my own and it was especially amazing to have that control over the production and then see it come out as well as it did. We had rave reviews for that production, but I am hoping we will be able to wow them anew with 'The Love of Three Oranges.'"

Courtesy of the Department of Theatre

DePiano said that while she loves theatre, her true passion is family entertainment. This past summer she worked at Sesame Workshop, formerly Children's Television Workshop, which brought the world the beloved "Sesame Street." She acted as assistant to the Egyptian and Russian co-productions of "Sesame Street" and also helped with the promotion of a new cartoon, "Sagwa, the Chinese Siamese Cat," which premiered this fall on PBS. DePiano hopes to find a job in the area of family entertainment after she graduates.

"Working there not only crystallized the fact that this is what I truly wanted to do with my time but also made me realized that my dream is not that unobtainable," she said. "Television and movies are amazing mediums that have only begun to tap all the potential they have for reaching and educating people."

Stephen Carlson plays glorious notes at Weis Center

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

The glorious notes composed by Haydn, Schumann, Scriabin and Liszt rang throughout the Weis Music building last Friday during the guest recital by pianist Stephen Carlson.

A native of Minnesota, Carlson is pursuing his doctoral degree in the musical arts in piano at the University of Iowa. His list of accomplishments include seven season performances at the Minnesota Valley Sommarfest, appointment to the performing artist roster of the S.C. Arts Commission and a current assistant professorship of music at Coker College in Hartsville, S.C. During the evening, Carlson took his audience on a stroll through the history of piano composition.

The evening started with "Sonata in A-Flat Major, Hob. XVI/46" by Franz Joseph Haydn. Carlson opened with a piece from this classic composer because it showed the versatility of the piano as a music instrument. The crisp and clear notes enhanced the intricate and calculated quality of a classical-period masterpiece.

"It epitomizes the Age of Enlightenment with its refined elegance and emphasis on proportion," Carlson said.

The second piece of the evening hailed from the romantic period. The innovations in both the piano-playing and composition of that period pushed the music to the extreme.

"These innovations, coupled with the Romanticist's aesthetic goals, led composers to push the physical capabilities of both performer and instrument alike to levels previously unimagined," Carlson said.

Robert Schumann's "Symphonic Etudes, Op. 13" certainly exemplified these traits. The powerful notes of this piece contrasted sharply with the reserved nature of the first composition. The heroic and emotional feeling of the music was expressed with full force from both the instrument and the performer. This outpouring of emotions culminated dramatically during the colossal rondo finale.

The audience enjoyed the superb use of contrast demonstrated by Carlson with these two different pieces.

"It was very virtuoso in performance, a lot of emotion, power and facility," said Jackson Hill, composer and professor of music at the University. "He really showed good contrast when interpreting the Haydn piece with restraint and performing the Schumann piece with flamboyance."

Alexander Scriabin composed the third piece of music of the evening, "Sonata No. 3 in F-Sharp minor, Op. 23" during the late romantic period. The notes of this sonata displayed the style of music during the final period of the romantic era.

"This composition clearly predates the notorious quartal harmonic language of his later works, but, nevertheless, offers us a glimpse of later Scriabin and certainly epitomizes the late Romantic spirit," Carlson said.

The final piece in the program was "St. Francis of Paola Walking on the Water" by Franz Liszt.

"This is the second of the Liszt's "Two Legends", and is based on an episode from the life of St. Francis of Paola, a saint who lived during the Middle Ages," Carlson said. "St. Francis invoked divine help and successfully made it across the straits to Sicily with his raft made of his cloak and staff."

His interpretation of this composition and its images brought a sense of hope and faith to the audience.

"The music of this piece is an amazingly descriptive work, with portions conjuring up images of waves, a storm, triumphant exultation and a thankful prayer," Carlson said.

The applause convinced Carlson to perform an encore. He performed Chopin's "Aeolian Harp Etude", as the audience enjoyed his impromptu performance.

With his performance, Carlson not only took his audience on a tour of classical piano composition throughout the ages, but he also allowed his audience to feel the full range and persona of the piano. Most importantly, his music gave the University's community an uplifting evening that could be accomplished only with the power of music.

Comedian brings laughter back to BU

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

It felt good to laugh again.

A certain level of normalcy was achieved when comedian Michael Dean Ester entertained University students in the Bison. A Saturday night filled with jokes, chuckles, giggles and laugh-induced tears was indeed a surprise luxury.

In the wake of a crisis, Ester made a point to explain his reason for still laughing. He even gave a soliloquy addressing the issue, making students realize that laughter is a relief from all intense emotions that national tragedies evoke.

"Comedy is a giant sign for [Osama] bin Ladin, saying that he cannot dampen the American spirit," he said.

Ester graduated from Dickinson College with a degree in theater. Since then, he has contributed to shows on "Comedy Central" and "E! Entertainment Television," and recently made an appearance in "Senseless!," a film starring David Spade.

Though Ester hits the club scene, he is well-known for his college comedy. The National Association of Campus Activities adores him, inviting him to over a dozen conferences. He was even the feature entertainer at their national conference.

It was easy to identify with Ester's jokes, ranging from dating mishaps to professor miscommunications to cracks on RAs.

Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

Ester jokes around with the Bison crowd

"I was especially entertained by jokes concerning the outrageous price of tuition," Erin Connell '05 said.

Some students felt that his comedy lacked some flavor.

"He was mildly amusing, but not side-splitting funny," Andrew Maddox '05 said.

For others, his straightforward attitude was appealing.

"I thought he had a really honest approach," Kelly Raffety '05 said.

A charismatic fellow, Ester was comfortable walking amongst the crowd and even standing on a chair with his foot on the table for emphasis. He was energetic and outgoing, keeping most of the audience in hysterics with his antics. The night was enjoyable and stomach muscles received a workout.

BSG disheartened by Borough meeting

BSG met with administrators and members of the Borough Council to address downtown tensions

By Paul X. Benedetto
Staff Writer

Members of the Bucknell Student Government (BSG), Lewisburg Borough Council and University Administration met last Wednesday in the Langone Center to air long-standing grievances, discuss new civil ordinances and to try to bridge a gap that has been dividing the two social components of Lewisburg's residential community.

Sentiments of contempt and disdain for one group or the other are perceived in the actions and attitudes of students and townsfolk, depending upon whom one asks. Local residents complain that students' late night boisterous activity is an unmistakable sign of their disrespect for the local working community. The University population contends that local proprietors snub student customers, making them feel uncomfortable and unwelcome in the local community.

At the request of BSG, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro invited members of the local community to speak with BSG representatives and encouraged open discussion between students and local residents.

BSG President Nate Sorber '02, who lives downtown on St. Catherine Street, requested the meeting to address specific tensions developing between students living off-campus and the permanent downtown residents, using a personal experience as a basis for the meeting.

"I was on my porch one night a few weeks ago and I saw Lewisburg police sitting in strategic locations on the street," Sorber said. "They were not making any arrests, they were just there. And that made me uneasy. It's not a natural feeling to go around in your daily life with the police watching you and your activities. Maybe while the townspeople see it as protection, the Bucknell students who live down there see it as something totally different."

Sorber then spoke to Ferraro.

"I told Dean Ferraro that I saw a possible riot that night; when parties were cleared out, students were being pushed around, and most of the students I had seen were not intoxicated and were not breaking any laws or ordinances, but were being moved around," Sorber said. "Everyone is really concerned to not see a repeat of the [1998] riot, but watching a large group of people who don't think they are doing anything wrong and creating forced interactions with the police asks for a major problem."

According to Sorber and Jen Collier '03, vice president of operations for BSG, this was not an isolated event. Sorber brought a similar story to the attention of the members of the Borough Council visiting the University.

"We know of one downtown party that was out of control which the police responded to and successfully cleared up," Sorber told the council. "But then the police proceeded down all of Sixth Street to empty every house that had something going on. People were having private get-togethers, keeping everything under control without any problems and were not violating any

BSG launches voter registration drive

By Natalie Casp
News Editor

As a result of ongoing tensions between University students and permanent residents within the Borough of Lewisburg, the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) has begun an ambitious campaign to register students to vote in the upcoming Nov. 6 election. The decision to register students to vote in Lewisburg came from the BSG executive committee after meeting with members of the Borough Council; the executive committee feels that in order for the student body's voice to be heard by the Council, the students themselves must speak by voting.

BSG faces two immediate challenges in initiating the campaign: In order to vote in the Nov. 6 election, constituents must be registered by Tuesday, Oct. 9 and to vote for positions within the Lewisburg gov-

Administration holds future of cable

By Katie Marston
Senior Writer

Two years ago, the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) began conducting an extensive investigation into the procedures and implications of installing cable TV in campus dorm rooms. This past March, BSG's Fiscal Affairs Committee met with representatives from the administration, Office of Housing and Residential Life and Information Services and Resources (ISR) to emphasize students' desire for cable television and discuss possible action.

> "The events of September 11th would have been very different if students had easy accessibility to cable TV.

"Last spring, the University President's Staff made a decision to make a decision about cable TV on campus," said Charles Pollock '70, vice president for student affairs.

After the meeting, the possibility of installing cable on campus was determined to be enough of an issue to authorize ISR to research the costs and feasibility of the process. Since then, the Physical Plant and ISR have been compiling information and will report the results to the President's Staff to facilitate a final decision on the matter. The main focus of the final decision is "whether installing cable TV on campus is consistent enough with the University's educational mission and the character of residential life," Pollock said.

BSG, as the initiator of the proposal for cable television on campus, has principally worked with CATV as a possible cable provider. After taking a walking tour of campus to determine the ramifications of cable installation, CATV estimated a cost of $750,000 to $1,000,000 for the completion of the project. This would encompass a choice from a variety of options for the University, ranging from the basic 15 channels to such additions as HBO, Showtime and Pay Per View. As part of this package, the University could opt to operate up to five "Bucknell Channels," including a student-run news channel and a venue for classes to show group videos.

The Fiscal Affairs Committee conducted a student survey and out of the 400 responses received, 93.1 percent would like some form of cable TV. Of this 93.1 percent, 67 percent said they would be willing to pay for the service while 33 percent would not be willing to pay for the service.

Due to the large expenditure needed to install cable on campus, BSG has researched several options, such as raising the Student Activities Fee or requesting funding from the University under the "Capital Equipment" section of the budget allocation.

"Another major conflict in the decision is between technology and cost," Fiscal Affairs Committee Chair Katy Timer '04 said.

ISR is investigating whether to spend this large sum of money to wire all of the dorms for cable access through a jack, or if technology will progress within a few years to allow students to receive cable through their Ethernet connection.

Although there is a significant portion of students wanting cable on campus, the University faculty is fairly split over the consequences of this issue. On the one hand, the view is that the student body would be much more informed

Wrestlers' petition could spark legal battle

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The varsity wrestling team enters its last season after the program was terminated last spring to create gender equity under Title IX.

By Andrew Burr
Sports Editor

Despite the onset of its last official varsity season, the wrestling team is continuing efforts to raise campus awareness about the issue and pressure the University into reevaluating its decision to terminate the program.

Most recently, according to wrestler Andrew Bernstein '03, the team has been attempting to demonstrate "campus-wide contempt" for the University's actions regarding the wrestling program. Wrestlers are seeking support from the student body in the form of petitions, which the team hopes can provide evidence of the campus' perceived dissatisfaction with the fate of wrestling.

"The main effort of the petitions," Bernstein said, "is to show campus contempt for the decision to cut wrestling."

The wrestling team has been soliciting signatures in dorms, on fraternity row and in the LC mall as well as other campus locations. Support for the team's cause has been great so far according to Bernstein, causing cautious optimism among those with a stake in the outcome.

Although the first goal of the wrestlers' campaign is to influence the University with an overwhelming outpour of emotion from the campus community, other measures have been considered as well.

"The University doesn't seem to want anything to do with the petitioning," Bernstein said, "but legally, they may have to."

> "The University doesn't seem to want anything to do with the petitioning, but legally, they may have to.
> —Andrew Bernstein '03

To determine if athletic programs are Title IX compliant, a three-pronged test is administered by the Department of Education's Office for Civil Rights. To meet Title IX legal standards, a school must be in compliance with one of the three prongs.

The first prong dictates that varsity athletic participation between the number of males and females must be "substantially proportionate" to their respective enrollments in the overall student population.

The second prong dictates that if the first prong is not met, the school district or university must "show a history and continuing practice of program expansion" so that proportionality is met and the first prong may be achieved.

The third prong relates to the current actions of the wrestling team, and would be the basis for any legal action against the University stemming from the petitions. It states that if the first and second prong cannot be satisfied, than the school or university must demonstrate that "the interests and abilities of the members of that gender have been fully and effectively accommodated by the present athletic program."

By collecting signatures expressing the displeasure of the campus community that the wrestling program was terminated, the team is attempting to demonstrate that the campus feels, by and large, that the present athletic program is "effectively accommodating" the underrepresented gender, thus meeting the third prong of the gender equity test.

"As far as campus opinion goes, I am sure there is support for the continuation of wrestling as well as for the decision the University made," Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said. "We would not have done something we thought was illegal."

The administration's stance, while sympathetic to the situation regarding wrestling, has not changed since last spring when the decision to terminate wrestling was announced.

"We've pledged to continue to monitor the legal environment and try to imagine other ways to achieve our gender equity objectives, including proportionality," Pollock said. "We have listened to arguments, revisited calculations and scanned the legal landscape, but at this point, I don't think we have been in a position to be encouraging a different solution might surface."

In a written statement, Athletic Director John Hardt echoed the same sentiments, reiterating that "the announced actions are necessary for Bucknell to address gender equity issues and the legal requirements of Title IX."

Parents attend campus activities

By Matt Ellis
Staff Writer

This past weekend was a chance for students and their parents to reunite and reflect after the attacks of Sept. 11, as well as an opportunity for parents and students to enjoy a weekend of University events.

More than 1,000 parents registered this year for parent's weekend-and increase from previous Parents Weekends—and, according to the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers, more parents visited campus but did not register with the Office.

"I believe that the Sept. 11 tragedies caused the increase in attendance this year," said Director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers David Flinchbaugh '82. "Parents told us they were really looking forward to reconnecting with their sons and daughters and relaxing with them. Parents Weekend provided the perfect backdrop for that."

Parents, too, enjoyed visiting their children on campus.

"I had a wonderful time. It was really nice to see my son again. There was so much for us to do," said Otto Tancraitor Jr, father of Otto Tancraitor III '05.

One such event was Christy's. The Christy's line up included the performances of the University's three a capella groups: the Silhouettes, the Bison Chips and Two Past Midnight.

"I feel Christy's was a huge success. I was incredibly impressed with all the talent that was displayed," said Silhouette member Molly Campbell '02.

During the Saturday night show, the Bison Chips received a standing ovation for their performance of "Ave Maria."

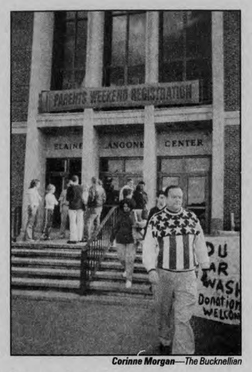
"This was the only time since I have been performing at Christy's that we have received a standing ovation," said Bison Chips member Matthew Hoy '02.

Another extremely successful show was We Brake for Nobody's Comedy Improv show. The improv troupe performed in front of two sold out audiences during their third Parents Weekend performance. They donated over $1,000 to the American Red Cross with the proceeds of the show.

"It's always worrisome to perform improv, especially in front of parents. You always run the risk of offending someone," said We Brake for Nobody member Ben Wellington '02. "You don't always have the opportunity to audit your thoughts before you speak."

The troupe will be performing at Lycoming College this week.

Other events included a golf tournament on Friday and Saturday. Over 200 golfers entered the two tournaments. Dining service served over 500 people at the International Dinner and over 7,000 filled the football stands for Saturday's game against St. Mary's.



Corinne Morgan—The Bucknellian

Parents and other family members were excited to reunite with their children, especially after the Sept. 11 tragedy.

"Weather helped the attendance, but I think parent's simply wanted to spend time with their sons and daughters and celebrate with each other in a festive Bucknell way," Flinchbaugh said.

The weekend also offered a chance for students to see familiar faces from home and see the sites of the area.

"It was nice to see my mom again. I haven't seen anyone from home since I moved in on the 24th," Rebecca Schofield '05 said.

Students, particularly first-year students, also enjoyed a meal at an off-campus restaurant.

"This finally gave me a chance to get off campus and eat at somewhere besides the cafeteria. It was also very enjoyable to see my family again," Student Tancraitor said.

Overall, students appreciated the opportunity to relax and visit with family members.

"It was nice to have time to hang out with my parents and my little brother after being away for so long," Thomas Franklin '05 said.

Students abroad react to attacks

By Meredith Atkinson
Staff Writer

The tragic events of Sept. 11, 2001 shook the entire University community. Members of our community who are miles away and countries apart, have been equally affected. In addition to the concern for safety and security, there are difficult emotional tolls that have been faced by students living abroad this semester.

Being away from friends, family and loved ones during this tumultuous time has been an added burden faced by students living out of the country. Two of the 137 students who are studying abroad this semester have opted to return to the University from their studies in France as a direct result of last month's events. This decision was made by the individual families and not by the University.

"If students brag about being American, talk loudly and are opinionated about Islam, this may draw unwanted attention and be cause for aggression."

Currently, there are three University students studying in Washington, D.C. Carmen Mauriello '02 is studying at American University in the nation's capital for the fall semester.

"My initial reactions to the attack were shock, anger and a degree of fear," Mauriello said. "I'm studying in a journalism program, and my classes have actually become more exciting as we've had extensive discussions about the media coverage of the attack and had major media figures speak to our class. I'm just trying to get the most from the experience."

Interim Director of the Office of International Education Marianne Torza confirmed that there are currently no students in locations that would be considered compromising or vulnerable and that every possible safety precaution is being taken by the programs in which the students are participating to ensure the security of students living abroad.

"Our Bucknell programs in London and Tours continue to monitor the situation via the U.S. State Department, the local consulate or embassy, local experts and faculty, other directors in the vicinity, the news media, etc. They are all in constant contact with Bucknell," Torza said.

Torza also refuted the recent rumors about canceling programs in progress.

"After all the available resources for an accurate assessment of the local conditions in London and Tours were consulted and we felt reassured that our students and staff were safe for the foreseeable future, the University decided not to cancel our programs. None of the other non-Bucknell providers of programs on which Bucknell students are studying this semester has canceled its programs," Torza said. According to Torza, all students have been given specific instructions regarding how to conduct themselves in public. As a precaution, they have been advised to blend in and not provoke anyone with extreme rhetoric about America.

Mariette van Tilburg, the study abroad advisor to engineering students said students abroad need to use common sense to prevent problems.

"If students brag about being American, talk loudly and are opinionated about Islam, this may draw unwanted attention and be cause for aggression," van Tilburg said.

The majority of students living abroad, 106 out of 135, are affiliated with non-Bucknell programs such as Arcadia University, Butler University, Boston University, Syracuse University and the International Education of Students (IES). All of these programs were chosen by University students because of their long history of reputability and responsibility.

Within 48 hours of the attacks, the University was notified by all of the programs and told that all students living abroad were safe. Many of the programs sent several e-mails regarding safety and crisis management.

Immediately following the attacks, IES phoned 969 sets of parents to inform them that their students were safe. IES did this despite the fact that their Chicago headquarters had been evacuated, clearly demonstrating that parents' peace of mind and their children's safety were of utmost importance.

In addition to the five most popular destinations—England, Spain, France, Italy and Australia—there are also Bucknell students in China, Costa Rica, Czech Republic, Ecuador, Greece, Kenya, New Zealand, South Africa, Tanzania, Germany, Ireland and Scotland. All with the exception of two felt that their needs were being sufficiently met by the programs.

While nothing like this could ever have been expected, all programs have been working to ensure the safety, security and emotional and psychological health and well-being of their students. Students reflect that they are being cared for in the best way possible, and while nothing can replace proximity to family during this time of uncertainty, professors and faculty have demonstrated openness and availability by often taking students home with them and tailoring their class curriculums to accommodate students' needs for open discussion.

"It seems that the general attitude has changed in the sense that there is a greater awareness of what it means to be an American and in the light of study abroad, what it would mean to be an American abroad," van Tilburg said. "It is still too early to know how the events have changed students' attitudes in regard to actually going abroad for a semester or a year long study."

While we will not know the ramifications that the Sept. 11 incident will have on study abroad, it is clear that the universities and international study offices have been very supportive and that students who are currently abroad have settled in and are enjoying their experiences.

ordinances, but were cleared out of their gathering because there was noise elsewhere on Sixth Street. That's definitely, totally unacceptable."

BSG members who attended the meeting feel that this behavior—clearing out all parties because of an infraction at a nearby but unaffiliated location—is dangerous and cannot continue.

"Everyone was safe in the houses where moderate parties that were going on, and there were no problems, but when everyone was in the street with nowhere to go, it became a dangerous situation for the students and everyone else," Sorber said.

How students' behavior is monitored and what check exists on that authority is also an issue of concern. BSG members addressed their concerns about the new "Disorderly Gathering" ordinance which carries a $1,000 maximum fine. Both factions question the criteria that constitutes appropriate behavior from the students.

"We're dealing with obscure details like noise, which depends on the subjective judgment of an officer who decides, just by listening, if a party is too loud or not," Sorber said.

Ferraro, who has been seen by both parties as a mediary in this situation, revealed his own reservations concerning the purpose of the law.

"They're writing poor law and hoping good men will handle it," Ferraro said. "Why don't they write good law for good men to enforce?"

Yvonne Morgan, chair of the Borough Council, takes an entirely different approach. She sees the new ordinance, and all laws, as being there to protect the students and the other residents.

"Police do not want to arrest students," Morgan said. "It's just another tool, actually, and it wasn't necessarily meant for students and it is at the discretion of the police officers. I'm very supportive of our police department. I think they do an excellent job in being fair to the students."

"I think that we all realized that there's so far to go to reach some of our goals about what we would like to see. That meeting did open up communication, but it didn't make us feel like a lot of these things are going to be resolved any time soon,

Morgan viewed the meeting between the University and the town as an opportunity to bridge the gap that exists and encourage students to be more involved in the community.

"I welcomed the opportunity," Morgan said. "I thought it was a great idea."

When the issue of the "Disorderly Gathering" ordinance was brought to her attention, she assured the students that it was an entirely unfounded fear.

"I'd like to get past this 'Disorderly Gathering' ordinance, and maybe some of the hysteria we are developing over it, since we haven't even tested it yet," Morgan said. "I would like to see us work from the positive, in getting more publicity for the students who do so much more in our community and giving them more opportunities to do those things. I have never had, in the six years I've been on council, a negative experience with a Bucknell student. They've all been extremely positive."

According to BSG members, the problem with students and residents of the Borough goes beyond ordinances and party violations.

"The overwhelming sense of animosity in the town/gown relationship exists because of an ignorance of who we are and why we're here," Collier said.

Sorber agrees.

"They have to identify that there is a culture clash. There are families with small children, there are elderly persons and there are college students," Sorber said. "We're asking the Borough to approach policy making from a reasonable approach that includes protecting us, not always discriminating against us. We want them to recognize that these different cultures living here are not always bad. They need to accept things like people talking on their porches late at night and hosting mild gatherings."

Students and Council members alike left the meeting with an overall feeling of reservation. All were hesitant to say that any of these issues had been resolved.

"I think the majority of us who were at this meeting left feeling a bit disheartened," Collier said. "I'm pleased that we established open dialogue, but on the other hand, they were hearing us, but they weren't necessarily listening."

Morgan's sentiment was of a similar accord. When asked what she felt coming away from the colloquium, she said, "I'm not certain."

Sorber was slightly more optimistic.

"It was a positive step. Whenever you communicate with the other side, it's a positive first step," Sorber said.

But even he was not entirely pleased with what transpired.

"I think that we all realized that there's so far to go to reach some of our goals about what we would like to see. That meeting did open up communication, but it didn't make us feel like a lot of these things are going to be resolved any time soon," Sorber said.

BSG also stated that the University's response was not what they had hoped to hear.

"It's also disheartening when you hear the University take the position that students need to be brought back on campus because downtown is so bad," Sorber said. "That's really disheartening because that's where students want to be."

Russian jet believed to be hit by missile

MOSCOW, Russia—A Russian plane flying 77 people from Israel to Russia has exploded before crashing into the Black Sea, Russian officials have said. It is feared 66 passenger and 11 crew members were on board the regular weekly charter flight 1812 when it crashed.

Russian President Vladimir Putin had earlier told a meeting of European Union Justice Ministers that the explosion was possibly the result of terrorism.

One informed U.S. source told CNN that "initial analysis indicates" that at least one SA-12 surface-to-air missile was fired from a shore-based, air-defence system during the Ukrainian exercise and appears to have downed the airliner.

Greyhound service resumes after fatal bus crash

MANCHESTER, Tennessee—Greyhound Lines resumed bus service at 1 p.m. EDT Wednesday after one of its buses crashed in Tennessee when the driver's throat was slit. Authorities said six people were killed in the crash. The driver, who survived the attack, told doctors that a man cut his throat with "a razor or box cutter," then grabbed the steering wheel, sending the bus careering off an interstate highway.

Swissair fall strands thousands

Thousands of passengers have been left in the lurch after Switzerland's national carrier, Swissair, grounded entire fleet. About 19,000 passengers on 262 flights around the world were stranded when it was forced to stop flying on Tuesday amid a struggle to salvage parts of its operations under a bank-led rescue plan.

Wall Street likes Bush proposal

President Bush told business leaders today he is pushing a $65 billion to $70 billion economic stimulus package to encourage consumer confidence and assist workers displaced by terrorist attacks. Investors found the news encouraging, pushing the Dow Jones to its highest mark since markets resumed trading after the attacks.

Ten die in fresh Mideast violence

JERUSALEM—Ten people have been killed in the latest round of clashes in the Middle East, according to Israeli and Palestinian sources, dealing another blow to the peace process. Israeli forces struck back—rolling tanks and bulldozers into northern Gaza Wednesday — after an attack on the Elei Sinai Jewish settlement left two Israelis dead. Israeli sources said two Palestinians who entered the settlement and opened fire Tuesday afternoon were killed. The Palestine Red Crescent Society said four Palestinian security officers and a farmer were killed in the Israeli retaliatory strike.

First lady consoles nation and children

WASHINGTON—First lady Laura Bush said Tuesday night the September 11 attacks have forced Americans, including herself, to shift the focus of their daily lives, but she urged people to try to continue a normal life.

"I understand why people are frightened, but at the same time we don't want our lives to be totally disrupted by a terrorist act," she told CNN's Larry King in an interview.

Taliban continue to profit from drug trade

WASHINGTON—Afghanistan's ruling Taliban government appears to be benefiting from sharp spikes in the price of opium that have come about after it banned cultivation of poppy, the plant that produces the drug, United States officials said Wednesday.

Officials said the drug market in Afghanistan appears to be flourishing, based on record drug seizures this year in neighboring countries, as well as the seizure of materials used in drug production that were intercepted on their way in to Afghanistan.

Giuliani rules out third mayoral bid

NEW YORK—Rudy Giuliani told reporters Wednesday he would not seek a third consecutive term as mayor of New York City, but that his offer to remain in office an extra three months remains on the table.

"I'm not going to run for another term," he told reporters. "It's too divisive to be a candidate on the ballot."

The Conservative Party had offered to put him on its ticket, but Giuliani called party Chairman Michael Long Wednesday morning and nixed the idea.

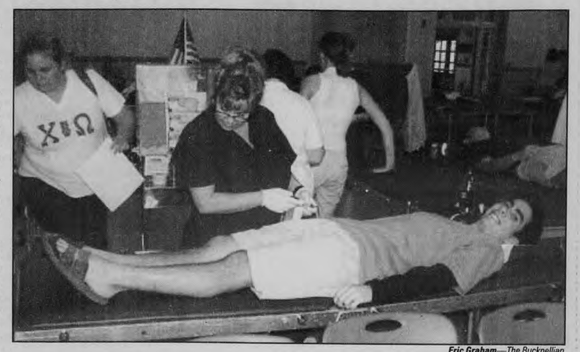
Donors surpass goal of 250 blood units

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Red Cross collected 262 units of blood, out of 344 people who showed up to help meet blood demand.

More than three weeks after the tragic events of Sept. 11, the University community has been able to reach out to survivors by donating blood. Immediately following the attacks, students, faculty and staff rushed to give blood at local hospitals and tried to acquire a date for the campus blood drive.

The Red Cross was unable to provide an immediate date, but told the University that blood would still be in great demand in October.

In anticipation for a large number of donors, Wednesday's blood drive was moved from the Weis Center to Larison Dining Hall; a record numbers of donors signed up to give blood. The original goal was for the campus to have 250 donors. Three hundred and forty four people actually registered to give blood and 262 productive units were collected. Of the 262 people who donated, 71 of them were first time donors.

Braving her fear of needles, Katie Breitenbach '05 decided to donate blood.

"I felt like I couldn't do anything for the people in New York City and this was my way to contribute," Breitenbach said.

Jessica Kerper '03, a member of Alpha Phi Omega (the co-ed national service fraternity on campus) and the student organizer for the blood drive was pleased with the turnout.

"It is wonderful to see people trying to reach out and do something to help people at a time like this."

Kerper said that the Red Cross would only be able to handle about 350 donors because they did not want to collect excess blood that would eventually have to be discarded. For students who were turned away for various reasons or for students who were unable to attend Wednesday's drive, Kerper said that Alpha Phi Omega would sponsor another blood drive on campus Feb. 27.

The Red Cross also asks the University community to make an effort to donate over the next several months. Blood will still be in demand. There are several blood drives in the weeks to come, and even more over the holiday breaks.

Associate Dean of Students Ruth Burnham complemented Alpha Phi Omega for doing a "great job of planning and running the event."

Kerper is grateful for the community members who were willing to help facilitate the blood drive.

"I am proud of my fellow Alpha Phi Omega brothers, my fellow Bucknellians and the faculty, staff and administration for pulling together during such a national crisis and trying to make a difference by donating or volunteering at this blood drive. This truly illustrates the strength we have as a campus community," Kerpa said.

While all downtown student residents live in the Borough, Seventh Street divides the Borough and East Buffalo Township. Students living west of Seventh Street in Swartz Hall, the New Residence Hall and in houses on Fraternity Road technically reside in East Buffalo Township, thus preventing them from voting in Lewisburg elections. Nonetheless, BSG wants to register as many students as possible.

"Student participation in Lewisburg politics is essential in order to keep students living off-campus, make living downtown a positive experience and to fight against the unfair ordinances the Borough has aimed at students," BSG President Nate Sorber '02 said. "If we want this to be an integrated town, students must be part of it. Voting will do that."

Sorber said that students living in the Borough must register the physical address of their dorm room and not their campus mail box because the Langone Center (LC) is located in East Buffalo Township.

The campus is split right along 7th Street into the East Buffalo Township and the Lewisburg Borough.

The campaign began Thursday with the BSG executive committee pooling resources from within the rest of the organization to physically go out and ask students to register.

"We are taking a very proactive approach to get this done in time," Sorber said. "Rather than asking students to pick up a form and return it to us, we'll wait for them to fill it out in person. By being visible—visiting residence halls, fraternity houses and organizations' meetings—we'll get more students registered. The whole process of registering takes two minutes."

Vice President of Operations for BSG Jen Collier '03 said students must vote in the upcoming election in order to make changes in the relationship between students and Borough residents.

"Let's say there are two candidates running for a seat on the Borough Council and one is hard-line against Bucknellians and the other has been known as more of a middle-of-the-road candidate who is sometimes a student supporter. In a normal election, the candidate who is against Bucknell students would most likely win," Collier said. "If students are voting, we have the potential to completely dominate the numbers and overwhelmingly elect the student supporter. In the end, the candidate who is more student-oriented will make huge strides in improving Bucknell-Lewisburg relations," Collier offered as an example of why students should vote.

Sorber, who researched with Collier the feasibility of student votes making a difference, points to a 1997 study by The Pennsylvania State Data Center, from Penn State at Harrisburg.

"Over 41 percent of the people who live in Lewisburg are between 18-24 and the median age for residents in the Borough is 22.8 years," Sorber said. "Since we make up such a large portion of the community and the actions taken by the Borough council effect students to a large degree, the best way to positively influence the leadership is to participate politically."

Sorber and BSG feel that the University is just as much a part of the Lewisburg community as permanent residents.

"The students who live on campus are part of the Borough of Lewisburg," Sorber said. "They shop at the business, they use the services and they go into the community. This is their home. We might be two entities living side by side, but we need to be an integrated community. Voting will further facilitate that integration."

Collier agrees, hoping a strong student-voter turnout will improve the town-gown relationship.

"Once we communicate to students how important it is for them to vote and inform them of the problems that currently exist, I think they will understand that these problems can be solved in the long run with their efforts," Collier said.

Sorber hopes that the students' voice will be heard in the upcoming election.

"A lot of students have a plethora of opinions on what they think Lewisburg should do, from businesses to ordinances, parking tickets to trash collection—students have opinions on all of this," Sorber said. "Instead of just complaining about the issues, it makes much more sense to register to vote and to participate in the legislative process."

How students will participate and use their vote is still uncertain.

"Because of the immediate deadline to register students to vote, we are focusing on that initiative first," Sorber said. "But, we're also researching candidates and we're trying to uncover some of the best choices they can make in the upcoming election. We will be in contact with all of the student body to let them know what the issues are. After everyone is educated on the candidates and their issues, students can vote and make informed decisions on what's in their best interest."

BSG began registering students in the LC on Thursday, but will begin going door-to-door on Sunday.

"We've identified 18 target areas, including dormitories, downhill fraternities, special interest houses, the Gateways and different regions where students live off campus," Sorber said. "Each of these regions will be assigned to a group of volunteers; they'll go with the registration forms and clear instructions as to how to properly fill out the residency portion of the form to avoid discrepancies. We're asking students to take two minutes to fill out the form and then give it back to the volunteer. If they give them back right then, it will ensure that they are registered by Oct. 9. The volunteers will also any questions."

There are roughly 2,000 registered voters in Lewisburg and more 2,000 students live in the Borough.

"If we can get a substantial amount of our 2,000-plus students to vote, I really think we can make a dent in the politics of Lewisburg," Sorber said.

of current events, while the other side fears students holing up inside their dorm rooms and neglecting their studies and other outside activities. However, this concern has diminished slightly over the past few years with the increased variety of quality television programs. And this has encouraged the initiation and consideration of the BSG's proposal.

"The events of Sept. 11th would have been very different if students had easy accessibility to cable TV," Pollock said.

According to Pollock, this brings to light the two opposing sides to the implications of this issue. The University has to consider whether we are bringing the campus together and encouraging community, or are we simply making it harder for students to gain access to an important medium? During the terrorist attacks students may have gathered together in small groups in their rooms, rather than flocked toward the campus community as a whole. However, the student body may have been more immediately informed of the events with easier access to television.

While the University's administration works toward a final decision, "BSG will not forget about it and will continue to remind them of its importance to the student body," Timer said.

Students must be allowed to go abroad

One of the most coveted experiences of attending the University is the opportunity to study abroad. Traditionally, most students go abroad in the spring semester of their junior year. However, with the anxiety of the anticipated situation in Afghanistan, the safety of these students is being questioned for the upcoming semester.

Despite rumors, the University has contended thus far to still provide students with the study abroad opportunity.

One of the main safety concerns is that Americans will be targeted in "hot spots," or cities or countries that are common destination points for American students. For example, cities in Western Europe, like London or Paris, prove to be popular study abroad locations for many University students. University students often say it is not easy to assimilate into another country's culture in the short time that they are in the country. Therefore, Americans can be easily recognized among natives.

One of the major perks of studying abroad is traveling to other foreign cities, but the safety of worldwide transportation has been pinpointed as a caution since the recent terrorist attacks. This travel concern also includes the often-long round-trip plane flights to and from the United States.

Similar to how two University students came home early from overseas this semester, The Bucknellian ultimately believes that it is the student's decision to deliberate the risk, not the University's.

Although there has been sweeping and sometimes dramatic safety precautions in both the United States and abroad since the attacks, is it really safer to stay here in the States rather than spend the semester overseas?

The main argument for the consideration of disallowing abroad opportunities is the safety of University students in dangerous locations throughout the world. However, many people speculate that the chance of another terrorist strike in the United States is more probable than an attack on students in foreign city.

This disappointment would not only inconvenience the dreams of many Bucknellians, but also disrupt the University's student population on campus next semester. Housing problems would most likely be created, as well as class enrollment figures might be nontraditionally overwhelmed for the spring semester.

Many Bucknellian staff members, as well as contributing writers of the abroad perspective articles, have shed a positive light on the experience of spending time in a foreign country. Most people will reminisce about cultural, personal and academic growth. They also learn to break down stereotypes and naivete and explore outside the University.

Studying abroad also allows students to see how the world views Americans as a whole. Some people are saying that the worst thing that Americans can do is become isolationists. If students are not permitted to study abroad, this could be the catalyst to the isolationist pitfall.

Falwell shouldn't be condemned for beliefs

Conservative beliefs like Falwell's are no more immoral than liberal beliefs

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

I find myself facing a most unpopular assignment: defending Reverend Jerry Falwell.

Quick recap: Falwell, a prominent social conservative, offended many when he declared that the recent attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center were caused in part by God Himself as punishment for America's sins. Falwell specifically cited left-wing political activities—those of homosexuals, feminists and pro-choicers—as the cause of God's wrath. Though he later apologized, Falwell's analysis—that America had only itself to blame—was widely scorned.

I'm in no position to say whether Falwell is correct—whether God was in fact punishing America for its spiritual condition—nor is anyone, for you and I do not know the mind of God. Nor is it enough, I think, to hide behind tired. I disagree with him but the First Amendment says we can't stop him from saying "it" arguments. Being "for" free speech (a bold position, certainly) teaches us nothing, not in this situation. We can look even deeper.

Many students were irritated by the content of Falwell's Sept. 11 remarks. Some are criticizing his general approach to politics; specifically, his belief that some things, like abortion or homosexuality, are not morally right; that we can know what is truly right and what is wrong; and that we should reflect these truths in our social policies. For his advocacy of Biblical standards of right and wrong, Falwell is called an "idiot," a "bigot" and even compared to Hitler. A glance at our political landscape shows that this is misguided criticism.

Most laws or policies are themselves public approval of some moral principle.

We recognize civil rights because we have judged that the society that does so is morally superior to the society that does not. We have minimum wage laws because we find it offensive— or, one could say, wrong—that any worker should be paid less than a certain amount for an hour's work. We have Medicaid programs because we have judged it wrong that the poor should go without some minimum level of health care. The list is endless—social Security, food stamps, public education—all examples of notions of right and wrong, moral beliefs, reflected as public policy.

Some Bucknellian students support the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice's petition for a living wage. They obviously believe that it is right that staff's wages be raised, just as Falwell thinks it is right that every unborn child be given a chance at life. Fair enough; start debating. But the idea that one cause is more righteous than the other, one worthy of praise and one worthy of ridicule—that's ridiculous.

The only differences between Falwell and most Bucknellians are a) some of the issues that they care about and b) their positions on those issues. Meanwhile, they share something far more fundamental. In political argument, each launches his case from the notion that there is some identifiable wrong that needs redress- he appeals to some standard of what is just and what is not. Falwell uses the Bible; some of us don't. But the source of the standard is irrelevant for our purposes; the important part is, each of us has a standard.

Upon careful reflection, even Ralph Nader and Falwell are really quite similar. Different causes, different positions, sure—yet they engage in essentially the same brand of political advocacy. For that, Nader is praised and Falwell abused. Incredible.

Pacifist professors endanger America

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

With the proud arousal of a fevered patriotic spirit as a backlash to the Sept. 11 attacks, college professors nationwide have responded predictably and overwhelmingly; with typified anti-American garbage. It seems these washed-up revolutionaries still haven't learned.

It seems all of America is on the same page—90% according to most polls—favor a retaliation to punish this incident, and protect against future ones. However, there is still a dissenting faction alive and well, nurtured in their protective communes—feeding each other's revulsion for America while living in the sanctity of America's college campuses. Ours is clearly unexceptional.

"Teach-ins" are being held in campuses like ours nation-wide. The themes are often demoralizing. A lecturer at University North Carolina claimed that if he were president, he would apologize to "the tortured and the impoverished and all the millions of other victims of American imperialism." "Blame America First" is an eerily popular theme.

At Georgetown University, there is a debate entitled, "Resolved: America's Policies and Past Actions Invited the Recent Attacks." Yale University held a panel discussion of six professors who focused on the "underlying causes" of the attack and America's many faults, including our "offensive cultural messages."

Professor Paul Kennedy asked the audience to understand the reasons people had their hatred of America—he gave some of his theories-our military and economic power as well as our culture. Donald Kagan, of the classics department, expressed how the panelists seemed intent on "blame the victim" and asked why Yale couldn't find one panel member somewhere to focus on the enemy and "how to stamp out such evil." A University of Texas Professor Robert Jensen wrote that the attack "was no more despicable than the massive acts of terrorism ... that the U.S. government has committed to my lifetime."

Learning the lessons of typified Bucknell, I envisioned our "teach-ins" to be on the same wavelength, consequently choosing to stay at home instead. Nonetheless, from what I have gathered, the same troubling themes seemed all too popular. Professor of International Relations Hilbourne Waston and former Professor of Political Science Gene Chenoweth challenged Professor Tom Travis's notion which equated our situation to that of Israel's and argued that retaliation is neither necessary nor justified.

> This is elementary common sense. If you hamper the war effort of one side you automatically help out that of the other.

Nonsense.

These calls for pacifism are unmistakably unsubstantiated and decidedly counterproductive in both their desired effects on the students as well as juxtaposed against this actual situation. Pacifists see themselves on a higher moral ground: two wrongs don't make a right, violence begets violence etc. However, in a case of self defense, when our nation is being attacked, pacifism is most positively immoral.

In 1942, George Orwell wrote about the pacifists of Great Britain who wished not to fight against the Nazis, "Pacifism is objectively pro-Fascist. This is elementary common sense. If you hamper the war effort of one side you automatically help out that of the other. Nor is there any real way of remaining outside such a war as the present one. In practice, 'he that is not with me is against me.'"

Such is the case today. It has been made abundantly clear that these terrorists are attacking America as destructively and effectively as possibly, effectively, they desire for Americans not to fight back. America's pacifists do not want America to fight either. Inherently, terrorists will attack again if this were to come to be.

Michael Kelly of The Washington Post has pointed out that we have seen that they are capable of killing thousands of innocent Americans (and their target was much larger—approximately 50,000 worked in those buildings), and so the American pacifists, therefore, are on the side of future mass murders of Americans. They are objectively pro-terrorist.

No one can legitimately argue that the groups who attacked America, if let alone, will not attack again. And no one can deny the probability of escalation of innocent deaths in the next attack. To be a pacifist is, in practice, to accept this outcome.

Not only is this peace-speak illogical—its dangerous. It seems many want to relive their anti-Vietnam peace movements. But this isn't Vietnam, this isn't even the gulf war. This enemy has directly attacked the U.S. Despite some biased intentions, promulgation of propaganda and suspicious syllabi, it is a blessing that so many students have managed to come to understand what it means to be an American in the 21st century especially since it wasn't in the lesson plan

Where are you going tonight?

The Highlands Pub

By Natalie Casp
News Editor

Alumni and students of age only seem to talk about "the bar." But now there's a refreshing twist to the mix, a splash of lime in the Jack-n-coke, if you will. I'm going to let you in on a little secret, a new cozy establishment that holds true to our slice of small-town America: The Pub.

This local watering hole, nestled between old, picturesque houses on the east side of Market Street and just a short walk from campus, boasts an atmosphere unlike any beer-sludged fraternity house or Starbuck-esque bar. Sure, it's a matter of taste—some people like the dress-to-impress, see-and-be-seen scene—but I don't think I'm crazy for preferring to lounge on comfy leather couches with good friends at the Pub over playing playboy poker video games that rest on a Formica bar at the Bull Run Inn.

Inside The Highlands Pub, I can actually relax, converse and lose myself with friends, new or old. The dark, wooden walls and dim lighting seal me off from the outside world. The candles, table clothes and bay windows, too, create an atmosphere much different than that of "the bar;" it's peaceful.

The Pub's food is absolutely unbelievable—their shepherd's pie, apple wood chicken wrap and crab cake sandwich compliment their extensive drink list. I can choose from a variety of tasty imported beers on draught or have the bartender create an exquisite mixed drink.

The entire Pub experience is personal and intimate; I go with a friend or two for an evening of solid conversation. There is no competition or shouting over loud music to get a drink. There is no sense of segregation between patrons.

In fact, I think the Pub represents the perfect conglomerate of people in Lewisburg; here, students blend with the local population seamlessly without preconceived notions based on appearance, intelligence or what type of plastic used for the tab.

My friend and I were talking with one of the owners of the Pub the other night (imagine that, talking with the owner over a drink) and we complemented him on the ease the atmosphere brings. What he said sticks with us both, "People come here to converse. Those who are uncomfortable with themselves go elsewhere to socialize."

I feel honored to relax with my friends at a place built by friends, for friends. In talking with the owners, I found out they sanded the floors and finished some of the woodwork themselves in order to open on their scheduled date.

Several times now, I've seen the owners, manager and chef working late hours to develop their upcoming seasonal menu. But they're never too busy to float around, chat with patrons and make sure everyone's having a good time. The people who work there aren't worried about punching a clock, they're worried that your beer is poured properly and that you're having a good time.

And the Pub doesn't get old. It's not the same crowd listening to the same music every night. Aside from meeting new people—students, professors, local business owners, pilots and even state politicians—I've also listened to great live bands there. Where else in town can you listen to a quality Celtic band, enjoy a Guinness and talk with a former professor about cultural influences on modern literature?

But maybe best of all, Who would have thought the day would actually come where we're debating which local watering hole is better? That, alone, is a relief.

The Bull Run Inn

By Maren Johnson
Forum Editor

It seems that all students at Bucknell who have reached that chronological benchmark known as the 21st birthday has also cultivated a taste and loyalty for a local bar. There are a number of factors that play into one's watering hole affinity: atmosphere, crowd, variety, and the all important proximity to one's living quarters.

For most of us the latter is the Bull Run. However I'm convinced that while the central location of the Bull Run (which will be referred to, as we all affectionately do, as "the bar" from hereon in) plays a large part in its enduring popularity in the face of newer establishments, we cannot overlook the historical factor.

The bar is as much a Bucknell institution as the academic quad, the much analyzed statue in front of Vedder, and fraternity row. While I was unfortunate (or fortunate depending on which incarnation one prefers) to remember the bar in its original glory of a dark, wood paneled vault of Bucknell memorabilia, it seems that it's renovated appearance did not do much to change the bar's status as a Bucknell favorite. Ever since I have been legally allowed to drink there I have known the bar as the brighter and airier structure that remains packed on the weekends-and by weekend I of course mean Wednesday night on to Saturday.

There is a certain sense of unity created by the bar. I love being able to walk in and see tons of familiar faces. I also get a strange sense of nostalgia from knowing that I'm having an L.I.T. in the same place (despite the different façade) as seniors I remember as a freshman and alumni from years ago. In fact, just about any alumni I've met has shared fond memories of the Bull Run.

The set up of the bar makes it highly conducive to the favorite college past time-hanging out. Basically it offers four different areas, and thus four different "modes", to enjoy the bar scene. You can be in the center of the action and brave your way around the area directly in front of the actual bar. This tends to be the favorite spot for most since trying to squeeze through to hug a friend or even get a drink seems to involve a certain level of skill.

For more intimate gatherings you can huddle around the tables or squish into a booth with about ten of your buddies. And if you absolutely can stand to sit and chat there's always the distractions offered away from the dining area-pool and video games. While, from my observation, these seem to be popular hangouts for the male sector of the student body, they offer to everyone a social option that may or may not include a beer.

Finally, if nothing else can lure you to the bar there is always location, location, location. Not having to drive, and for some downtowners, only having to walk a few yards makes all the difference in choosing where to go out. We all know that Baja Joe's (formerly Skip's) is a good time, but the effort of having to find a designated driver and actually get in the car to go there can be a major deterrent. The Bull Run is our neighborhood bar. It's undoubtedly a part or our community. While we may sometimes wish that Lewisburg nightlife had a little more to offer, isn't nice to know that all you have to say is "the bar" and you'll be at a place where everybody knows your name.

Students shouldn't be tracked

Records on foreign students proposed

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

As we read our newspapers, the ramifications and unforeseen outcomes of recent events in New York and Washington are continuing to come out. Worrisome disclosures of the schooling and education of those that perpetrated the attacks in U.S. institutions shows the vulnerability of our "open" social structure.

In an article appearing in The New York Times in late September, a sad history of this global dilemma shows the areas for concern. The article reports on the many foreign born students who have attended U.S. educational institutions over the years and performed with distinction. Unfortunately, some of those few that studied in the system have gone on to work for Saddam Hussein.

The men Hussein sent to England and U.S. universities in the 1970s and 1980s were representative of the problem. One must take into consideration the times involved. Iraq was being used as a buffer state by Western foreign policy since it was at war with religious fundamentalist Iran. The United States and the West supplied Iraq with weapons and expertise in support.

Some young Iraqi students were sent to the U.S. One attended Michigan State and earned an engineering degree there. He later became the head of Iraq's nuclear weapons program. Another that went to a British university graduated and became the head of Iraq's biological weaponry program.

After the World Trade Center bombing in 1993, Congress ordered the Immigration and Naturalization Service to create a system for tracking the 515,000 foreign students attending U.S. institutions of higher learning. The system was to be put in place by 2003 giving access to information about students' names, universities, dates of attendance and academic majors.

The now-known schooling given to the perpetrators in New York and Washington at Florida flight schools reinforced legislator resolve. Universities in the United States balked at this and debated the merits until Sept. 11. The Texas Republican that sponsored the legislation that created the system now wants it expanded into their personal lives as well. Senator Diane Feinstein (D-Calif.) proposed a six-month moratorium on new student visas.

Our open society and economic system has provided us with an array of advantages. The students that we have allowed to enter our institutions of higher learning have rewarded us in many ways. The United States need to maintain its ties with our foreign friends and students.

We should not forget it is the vast majority of students that attend our universities and colleges who enhance our economic standing and cultural awareness. Surely we will resist the temptation to become so worried about security that we lose sight of our human liberties.

In our technologically and economically interrelated international system neighbors overtime can become enemies. Less developed countries like Afghanistan can become major adversaries overnight. The English, our staunchest ally, once called our George Washington a terrorist. Time and history has a way of changing things. What determines the greatness of a country is how they react in times of stress.

What we have to figure out is how to protect ourselves without giving our current adversaries another win by altering our society. There are no easy solutions to this question. With time, the adversaries will change but will we as a nation have changed so much to lose our identity as a open society?

The excellent record of the accomplishments of foreign students must be encouraged and continued. We have too much to lose if they are forced to attend elsewhere. The world will be that much more impoverished if we do this in a hasty manner. We will have diminished ourselves as well if we turn inward as a nation. Neither of these negative outcomes must be allowed to happen. A deliberated solution that is wisely implemented is much better than a legislation quickly rammed through the system that we will have to tinker with later after too many abuses have been shown.

Americans must overcome fear to overcome terrorism

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

How long will the United States continue to follow its current path? Some may respond to this question by asking, how could you expect us to answer such a vague question? According to President George W. Bush, in his Sept. 20 address to Congress, the country and the rest of the world, Bush told Americans that they should not expect one battle, but a lengthy campaign, unlike any other we have seen.

For this "war on terrorism," the country does need to keep on the path to gaining global support and serving justice to those who have committed such heinous acts against the United States, but my question of how long the United States will continue down its path does not exactly follow the war.

I ask you, despite the tragic events of Sept. 11, are our spacious skies still beautiful, are our fields of grain still waving, are our purple mountains still majestic, are our plains still fruited, are our seas still shining? The U.S. Congress seemed to think so, which is why they stood at the steps to the Capitol and sang, "America the Beautiful."

Although the attacks impacted the nation, they by no means touched the foundation of the United States. Then you may ask what exactly my concern is? My concern is that our foundation has remained intact, but are we still the same America that we were prior to the attack on Sept. 11, 2001?

> In a sense, the terrorists did not mean to destroy America themselves, they only pushed the self-destruct button so that we can destroy ourselves.

Prior to this attack, there had never been a more devastating act of violence on the U.S. mainland. This unprecedented attack did more than bring down the two tallest buildings in New York City, did more than destroy large parts of the Pentagon, did more than taking the lives of nearly 7,000 innocent people of all nationalities. This deadly strike instilled fear in the hearts of Americans.

No matter how strong our government, no matter how strong our armed forces, no matter how strong our national security, terrorist were still able to strike a devastating blow against the United States. In a sense, the terrorists did not mean to destroy America themselves, they only pushed the self-destruct button so that we can destroy ourselves.

The country is lead by very brave men and women who are doing everything they can possibly do to help those in New York City and at the Pentagon, and are trying to enlist the help of nations across the globe to put an end to terror once and for all, but beneath these great leaders are people; people who are scared.

The people from who the government draws all of its authority are scared to get out of bed each morning. They fear the coming of each new day. Fear has landed many airlines, and has put thousands upon thousands of people out of work. People, fearing a deep economic recession have started to withdraw stocks, causing an already battered stock market to sustain more damage. This fear is how the terrorist are playing the game and how they are fighting their war.

In the declaration of the World Conference against Racism, "Tolerance and Diversity: A Voice in the 21st Century," fear is defined. "Human fear is in itself ineradicable, we maintain that its consequences are not ineradicable." This statement tells us that fear is part of human nature, but we have control of where it leads us. We can abandon our faith in the government, in the airlines, in the economy and helplessly watch ourselves fall into recession, or we can choose to place our confidence, although we are afraid inside, back into the government and overcome this tragedy that has befallen our nation.

In 1945, President Franklin D. Roosevelt told the country that, "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today." If we continue to doubt ourselves we will never get past this and we will let the terrorists win. President Roosevelt also told the people of the United States that: "My firm belief that the only thing we have to fear is fear itself; nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyzes needed efforts to convert retreat into advance."

Roosevelt proclaimed this during the Great Depression. He knew how dangerous fear was to the restoration of America. He knew that it was possible to eradicate hunger, homelessness and poverty, but he also knew he could never eradicate fear. Americans had to be brave, go beyond their fears, and find the courage to take risks again and to fight to restore the country to prosperity.

Today we face the same problem. When President Bush addressed the nation and told Americans what they could do, he mentioned fears, telling us to be "calm and resolute, even in the face of continuing threat," but Americans need to do more.

Do we take up arms? Do we volunteer to be part of some invasion force? No. First, we support those who we have elected to speak for us and the brave men and women of the armed forces. We tell our armed forces what we want and let them deploy the force necessary. Our main responsibility is to society. No American can do this job alone.

> This unprecedented attack did more than bring down the two tallest buildings in New York City, did more than destroy large parts of the Pentagon, did more than taking the lives of nearly 7,000 innocent people of all nationalities. This deadly strike instilled fear in the hearts of Americans.

It will take all of us to put trust back into our monetary system. It will take all of us to put trust back in our transportation. It will take all of us to take charge of the consequences of fear and to not let it conquer us. It will take all of us to show the terrorists of the world that no matter what they do, they cannot kill America.

America is something within all of us that can never die. It is the candle that can never be extinguished. Give into fear and the candle light will fade along with the memories of all those civilians who were killed and the firefighters and police officers who heroically fought to save lives. Overcome fear and the candle light shall thrive and from the ashes, the grief, the despair, the anger of this tragedy America will rebuild and continue to forge new relationships with the rest of the world and hunt down and destroy every last terrorist organization. Stand tall, stand proud America and together we will overcome.

after this, the corporate ladder will be a piece of [cake].

In the course of facing challenges like this, you'll learn how to think on your feet. Stay cool under pressure. Take charge. Talk to an Army ROTC rep. You'll find there's nothing like a little climbing to help prepare you for getting to the top.

This Week In London...

You could be ...
- catching the red hot hit "Mama Mia" in the West End
- shopping in Covent Garden for one-of-a-kind clothing and jewelry
- sitting next to a rock star in a trendy Kensington eatery

Or...
- cheering like crazy at a football match between Arsenal and Tottenham (that's soccer to us Yanks).
- taking a train this weekend to Wales for horseback riding and some of the best scenery in Britain

Sound good?
In many ways London is the classroom for the BU London Internship Program. Quite aside from taking classes in Advertising, Film, Theater, Political Science or the Liberal Arts, you'll learn about England by living in London. All the while you'll be preparing for a career when you graduate with a for-credit Internship as part of the Program. That means you'll be working in London as well as enjoying it to its fullest.

Special forces operating in Afghanistan

American and British special forces have been conducting reconnaisssance reportedly with orders to pin down bin Laden

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Citing information from senior U.S. and Pakistani officials, USA Today has reported that American and British special forces have been in Afghanistan since shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks on the United States.

Unsuccessful to date, the teams of commandos, backed by Blackhawk helicopters, have reportedly been ordered to capture or kill Osama bin Laden. Barring that, they are to pin him down until airstrikes can be launched against his position.

Several English and Urdu language newspapers in Pakistan have been reporting the story for more than two weeks. The effort supposedly includes personnel from the U.S. Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs, and the British army's Special Air Services.

The paper also added that Pakistan has never given the United States permission to deploy troops within its borders.

As the New York Times reported, Pakistan has issued a rather "artful" denial that U.S. troops were within its borders, a statement which seemed to leave open the possibility that troops could have entered Afghanistan from Pakistan.

The actual statement by Riaz Mohammed Khan, a Pakistani Foreign Ministry spokesman, was that "There are no foreign troops in Pakistan at present." Khan's use of the word "troops" may have been evasive, deliberately avoiding the subject of undercover commandos or intelligence agents.

The New York Times also reported that CIA agents had been going to Afghanistan for the past three years, trying to convince the leader of the anti-Taliban Northern Alliance to pursue and perhaps kill bin Laden.

There is a U.S. presidential ban on assassinations, issued by President Jimmy Carter, but Clinton administration lawyers concluded that killing bin Laden was defensible due to his being traced to such crimes as the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa.

Additionally, The New York Times has described the U.S. force that has been positioned outside Afghanistan. The United States has assembled 28,000 sailors, airmen and troops, along with more than 300 warplanes and two dozen warships for what President Bush and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld are calling "a new kind of war."

Courtesy of Department of Defense

Despite a U.S. ban on assasinations, the Clinton administration justified killing bin Laden.

Special operations troops have also been mobilized, but their numbers are kept secret.

In a more recent development, The New York Times has reported that the United States will be trying to avoid using Pakistani bases, or at least use them rather modestly, in an attempt to keep anti-American sentiment there in check.

The United States fears that by heavily using Pakistani bases it will destabilize Pakistan, an important ally, and the government of General Pervez Musharraf.

Defense Secretary Rumsfeld has, due to the recent change in logistics, left Washington on a three-day trip to Saudi Arabia, Oman, Egypt and Uzbekistan with hopes of gaining permission to use bases in those nations.

According to the BBC, the Taliban has denied that any U.S. special forces are operating within Afghanistan.

Another rumor surfaced last week regarding the capture of several commandos by Taliban forces. However, both sides have denied the incident.

With an American retaliatory strike on Afghanistan apparently imminent, many military strategists are, according to Reuters, heeding the words of Soviet General Boris Gromov, who in 1989 asserted that "It wasn't a mistake to take the troops out. The mistake was to bring them in."

1989 was the year in which the Soviet Union finally ended its 10-year losing effort of a war in Afghanistan.

That failure, sometimes known as "the Soviet Vietnam," serves to caution the United States and its allies about the possible hazards of a conducting a ground war in mountainous Afghanistan.

The guerilla's Russian and American weaponry, along with their knowledge of the landscape could make them a difficult foe for the coalition.

Bush orders financial strike

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

On Monday, Sept. 24, President Bush signed an executive order that moved the war on terrorism to the financial front. According to CNN, Bush's order applies to "terrorist organizations, individuals, terrorist leaders, a corporation that serves as a front for terrorism and several nonprofit organizations." The list included 27 individuals and corporations with terrorist connections. Although utilizing tough rhetoric, Bush conceded in a Rose Garden ceremony that most of the terrorists' financial assets are overseas. MSNBC reports that Bush then put all foreign financial institution on notice. If they fail to comply, he said, the Treasury Department "now has the authority to freeze their banks' assets and transactions in the United States." The President and his administration were unreserved in their language on this issue, saying that anyone who does business with terrorists "won't do business with America."

The problem with the international banking system is some of the so called "secrecy regulations." In approximately 60 nations around the world known as "offshore" or "tax havens" people can establish corporations or accounts with no identification. These foreign banks, which are often nothing more than a funnel, routinely move the funds into U.S. banks. According to current banking laws in the U.S., domestic institutions are not required to ask questions as to the origin of the money, or its intended purpose. For example, MSNBC reports that there is currently a bank named Al-Shamal Islamic Bank in Khartoum, Sudan. There are no measures in place to stop this bank from wiring money into U.S. accounts at will. The bank was established by Osama bin Laden.

Despite these uncooperative regulations, the financial campaign has met with a fair amount of success. Even in the short time since the attacks, President Bush reported that the financial freeze is making progress. MSNBC reports that the offensive has led to the seizure of around 50 accounts, 30 of which are domestic. In all, approximately $6 million have been frozen, as well as the assets of several companies with potential terrorist connections. It is hoped that by attacking the terrorists funding as well as their personnel, the governments of the world can further hinder their effectiveness. CBS reports that in the press conference where he announced the executive order, Bush explained the list as "the financial equivalent of law enforcement's most-wanted list." The financial strike is supposed to starve terrorist of their funding, possibly even turning them against one another as resources become scarce. However, several news sources including Fox News and CNN have reported that Afghanistan has a large supply of opium that can be used to make heroin, which could provide the Taliban and the terrorists with cash if the asset seizures continue. Nevertheless, there are signs that President Bush and the worldwide community are just as committed to fighting terrorism on this front as they are on the military front. According to MSNBC, in a warning to terrorists and their associates, President Bush declared, "This list is just the beginning."

Panel discusses aftermath of attacks

By Tamanna Hye
Staff Writer

Last week, the University held two forums to discuss the fallout of the Sept. 11 attacks. The second forum was held on Sunday, Sept. 30. The panelists were Professors Elizabeth Crespo of the Sociology and Anthropology department, Stephen Stamos of the International Relations department, and Tom Travis of the International Relations and Political Science department.

Crespo talked about the social and cultural dimensions of the terrorist act. She quoted Lawrence Eagleburger as saying, "There is only one way to deal with people like this. That is to kill some of them."

One key thing she pointed out was that many described how New Yorkers helped each other out. The newspapers also highlighted President Bush's meetings with Muslim clerics and visiting mosques. It is important for people to realize that this act of terrorism is about terrorism and not Islam.

Crespo also spoke about how this nation symbolizes freedom, liberty and peace, but there exists those who continue to hate America (Washington Post). And these terrorist acts curtail our rights of freedom. She leaves us with a question to ponder: what definition of freedom and liberty will prevail today, and which one will we support?

Stamos spoke of the economic dimensions of the terrorist act. He spoke of how petroleum is the center of foreign policy in the Middle East. It is petroleum that shaped alliances with the Middle East. Stamos also stated that Saudi Arabia has one-fourth of the world's petroleum resources. One very startling fact he offered was that the United States spent nearly $60 billion to fight in Desert Storm, which was over petroleum. We refused to let Saddam Hussein take over the oil. Over 200,000 Iraqi soldiers died in Desert Storm.

Stamos also stated that the United States is more dependent than ever on imported oil and that it consumes 19 million barrels of petroleum per day. Annually, the United States spends roughly $123 billion on imported oil. He stated that the successful war against terrorism will not end the problem of consumption.

Referring to the book, "The Lexus and the Olive Tree", author Thomas Friedman stated that anti-globalization protests have been held in past years, showing public unwillingness to let the United States continue their dominance in the world economy.

Before Sept. 11, the economy was already slowing down. Corporate and consumer debt was growing, and the dollar was very strong. Unemployment is rising and corporate profits are worse now than ever before. After Sept. 11, the United States lost $60 billion in damages. The United States, Japan and Europe are moving toward a recession. A final note that Stamos mentioned is that now the global economy needs to cooperate in ways never imagined before.

Travis spoke of U.S. policy options and the dilemmas. He stated that effective foreign policy will be extremely difficult after Sept. 11. U.S. foreign policy has to have clear and direct goals. It needs to define national interests that are compatible with other nations. It needs accurate nuance about the world, as, historically it misunderstood the world. It must also consider the long-range effects of the actions it takes. It must minimize loss of life, and it must minimize terrorist actions against itself.

Travis was quick to point out that terrorism violates global justice and international law. In addition he said that the United States should try to mitigate relations between Israelis and Arabs. It should try to provide dignity and foster human rights. One vital point he made was directed toward Israel, he said that the United States should place pressure between Israelis and Palestinians to come to a final solution.

Trying to shed some light on why the United States is hated so much, Travis stated that the extremist groups are using terrorism to convey a message. They want to overthrow non-Islamic governments running Islamic countries and they want Israel to cease to exist. Travis was keen on pointing out that Israel will not cease to exist without the rest of the Middle East also going up in flames, over the dispute. Unfortunately, he added, some conflicts cannot end through negotiations.

If the United States is not careful, it could further stimulate and enrage Islamic extremist groups. The United States can stop the violence by organizing coalitions with other nations and Islamic nations as well. Travis pointed out that stopping all terrorism will take many years. He concluded on a rather sad note by saying that the Bush administration will not be able to do everything they say or promise.

Al-Queda and the Righteous Fists of 1900

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

In the late 1800s, China was a land carved up by European countries, not exactly a colony, but a slave to the whims of these states. Slowly, nationalist groups began assembling, wishing for an independent China and freedom from the foreigners.

The strongest of these groups was known as I Ho Ch'uan, or the righteous fists. They were also known as the Boxers on account of their fighting style. Beginning in 1899, this group, protected by the emperor, numbering almost 150,000 believers, struck against foreigners and Chinese Christians.

This group occupied Beijing in 1900 and besieged the foreigners and Chinese Christians there, killing many whose only crime was being in China. Some two months later, an international force of French, British, American, German, Russian, and Japanese troops defeated the Boxers in battle.

China was then subsequently occupied by foreign troops and forced to pay reparations to the winning powers, remaining as it began, a subject power.

Today, a bit of the same situation is seen in Afghanistan and much of the Middle East. Americans are viewed as unwelcome intruders by much of the populace of these regions, especially the religious zealots such as the al-Queda movement, headed by Osama bin Laden. At least a fair portion of the people of this region seem to be uniting to force the United States, representing the largest portion of the Western influence, to leave their lands. The reasoning is much the same as for the Chinese in the last century—to ensure independence, both political and social, from Western power and influence.

The organization is also much the same, though more widespread than were the Boxers. Al-Queda is protected by the Taliban of Afghanistan, which has allowed this group to run training camps and intelligence from Afghan soil.

The question remains if the response will be similar. Based upon what we have seen the Bush administration doing in the past few weeks, the response may be very similar.

By building a coalition, Bush ensures that all the workload does not fall upon America, and also that the world realizes that not only America will be targeted, but a great portion of the world is a potential target for the fatwa. Likely, the response to al-Queda will be a multinational action, whether military, political, economic or a combination of all these, to ensure the defeat of this terrorist group.

What we do not learn from the past will certainly repeat itself—as in China, so in Afghanistan, people want to feel themselves their own masters, and will fight to achieve that, whatever the consequence for the innocent.

Men's soccer romps Sacred Heart 5-1

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Captain Andy Aurand '02 helped lead the young team to victory.

By Tara Utchel
Staff Writer

The men's soccer team ended its two-game losing streak with a 5-1 win over Sacred Heart Saturday. A weeks' worth of frustration exploded on the field as the team put on an impressive display in front of a large Parents Weekend crowd. Five different Bucknellians, from all over the field, contributed to the scoring fest.

Midfielder Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 commenced the festivities just eight minutes into the game. Forward Ori Adrabi '05 and midfielder Greg Buzzell '05 connected a series of passes that resulted in Maruffi-Cowley's shot to the upper 90 of the goal. Adrabi did not stop with his assist. He continued to penetrate the Pioneer's defense and found the net eight minutes later, from a cross by Chris Beekman '04.

"I'm just happy that we got on the board first and early," Adrabi said. "We're tired of chasing from behind. Hopefully, we will continue this scoring mentality in the future."

This dynamic offense, something the team has been struggling with in the past, never left the field Saturday afternoon.

"We had been missing some intensity in our earlier games, so we wanted to come out strong," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "We came out with the intensity needed and hopefully it will carry over for the rest of the season."

The starting 11 for Saturday's game reflected inexperience and youth, but they provided the missing vigor needed to drive the team to success.

"It was a young lineup, with four freshmen and three sophomores starting," Nash said. "To come out and score four goals in the first twenty minutes was exactly what we needed to realize the potential we have when we are willing to work hard."

"Kevin had a strong game," Beekman said of the rookie goalie. Clifford won the starting role as goalkeeper for the first time in his collegiate career, but he worked out his first-game jitters with a few saves.

"He stepped it up and played really well," Sweeper Mike Lookingland '05 said. Lookingland was one of four freshmen to start the game, and he showed everyone that he is capable of making a large impact.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Ori Adrabi '05 chipped in a goal and an assist.

"Lookingland is doing a great job," Beekman said, "especially for only playing two games as a sweeper." He has played the past five games as a marking back, but has recently found his comfort zone at the sweeper position.

"I feel more comfortable as a sweeper. I have played there all through high school and club soccer," Lookingland said.

In addition to his defensive role, Lookingland maneuvered his way in and out of the Pioneer's defense to score an unassisted goal. Players in Lookingland's position do not have many opportunities to score, and the goal was received with excitement from the crowd. The reaction brought Lookingland over to the sidelines, where he planted a kiss on his nine-year-old sister. His entire family and many other Bucknell fans were on the sidelines to cheer him on.

"The crowd was great and we need to keep getting the fans out to the field to create our home field advantage," Nash said. The large crowd of family members and soccer fanatics created an intense atmosphere, and there was not one empty seat in the house.

Beekman closed the first half with the fourth goal of the game, with help from two of his teammates. Ryan Webber '02 beat his defender on the outside flank and crossed the ball to the top of the 18-yard line where Nick Taylor '03 was waiting. Taylor then headed a through ball to Beekman, who pounded the shot past Sacred Heart's goalkeeper.

The rest of the game was very physical. Both teams tallied a total of 21 fouls each and four yellow cards were issued. Amidst all the physical play, Sacred Heart was able to capitalize on a penalty kick in the second half.

But Bucknell was not satisfied with a score of 4-1. Tom Ryan '03 dribbled the ball up field and found Senior Captain Andy Aurand's foot in the middle of the field. He then crossed it in front of an open net to Steve Feather '03, who pounded in the final goal of the game.

"I do not think we have yet reached our potential, and we need to before American and Lehigh come to town," Nash said. "But to score five goals in one game helps everyone's confidence."

Adrabi agrees. "This win really boosted our confidence, but we will be playing better teams and we'll need to pick up our play," he said.

The next home game for the Bison will be against American University, Oct. 7 at 1 p.m.

Bison clean up Gaels 38-6

Sloppy play, five fumbles doom Saint Mary's College in Parents Weekend game

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Leading just 14-6 at halftime, the Bison emerged in the second half to score 24 unanswered points.

By Cory Nadler
Staff Writer

When the Bucknell Bison defeat an opponent 38-6 like they did against Saint Mary's College on Saturday, the offense usually receives the praise. But, when the Bison defense holds the Nation's leading running team to 108 yards on the ground, and forces five fumbles that lead to 21 Bucknell points, the acclaim can also be given to the defense.

Team of the Week

On their first drive, the Bison moved the ball relatively well, but had to settle for a 41 yard field goal attempt. Chris Lundberg '03 hit the top of the left upright, and the ball bounced straight in the air, but fell short of the cross bar.

There was almost no offense for the remainder of the first quarter, and it looked like this was going to be a defensive struggle.

After the Bison gave the Gaels good field position on the Bucknell 31-yard line, St. Mary's began to show why they were the best running team in the nation. They moved the ball into the Bison red zone, but the defense held on the goal line and the Gaels settled for a field goal to make the score 3-0.

While the Bison offense still had not come alive, the Gaels engineered another drive toward the Bison goal line. Yet again, the Bison held tight inside the five yard line, and made St. Mary's settle for a 22 yard field goal to go up 6-0.

"It was huge keeping them out of the end zone," Bucknell Head Coach Tom Gadd said.

"A field goal is a lot better than a touchdown," line backer Mark Tallman '02 added.

After a Bucknell time-out with 3:38 remaining in the first half, Todd Wenrich '03 completed one his of 13 passes on the afternoon to Jabu Powell '02 to spark the Bucknell offense. On the following play Wenrich connected with Albert Marquardt '04 for 33-yard gain deep in to St. Mary's territory. Powell capped off the drive with a seven yard touchdown run to make the score 7-6 Bison.

"We just couldn't get things going. You just need something to get you going," Wenrich said.

On the ensuing drive Joe Massey '03 forced a fumble that was recovered by Eric Storm '03 at the St. Mary's 31 yard line. Wenrich immediately made the turnover hurt the Gaels, connecting for a 20 yard gain to Jim Horan '03.

Wenrich finished off the drive himself with a two yard touchdown run to make the score 14-6 in favor of the Bison at the half.

Mid way through the third quarter the Bison moved in for another score. This time Wenrich completed a 10-yard pass to Horan for the score, capping a 42 yard drive to make the score 21-6.

On their first drive in the final period, the Bison moved the ball in the Gaels red zone, but were not able to put the ball in the end zone. Lundberg knocked in a 33 yard field goal to increase the Bison lead to 24-6.

On the following drive, Gary Carruthers '03 came up with the first interception of his career, and returned it seven yards to the St. Mary's 19 yard line. This set up yet another scoring opportunity for the Bison, and they wasted no time doing so. Jess Brinson ran the ball in from eight yards out, one minute later, giving the Bison a 31-6 lead.

Then, with 3:21 remaining in the game Juan Morales '03 recovered a Gaels fumble on their 15 yard line. On the next play Brinson ran the ball in for his second touchdown of the game making the final score 38-6 Bison.

"We were just thoroughly beaten by a better football team in every facet of the game," St. Mary's Head Coach Tim Landis said.

Turnovers on the part of the Gaels turned out to be a big part of Bucknell's success. "The team that takes care of the ball the best is going to win the football game," Gadd said. Bucknell recovered four St. Mary's fumbles, while the Bison did not fumble the ball once.

The Bison look to extend their winning streak to three games when they open Patriot League play against Towson University Saturday, Oct. 6, at Christy Matthewson Memorial Stadium.

The Bison took advantage of five St. Mary's turnovers Saturday.

Volleyball rebounds to beat Navy

First league defeat of season by American followed by a rout of the Midshipmen

By Patrick Evans
Senior Writer

A commanding win over Navy restored the confidence and optimism that have always been the key ingredients for Bison volleyball success. A characteristic balanced attack from the Bison stifled all Midshipmen attempts, winning 3-1 (17-30, 33-31, 30-21, 31-29). The day before, American University handed Bucknell its first League loss of the season 3-0 (30-15, 30-25, 30-19).

Melanie Gray '02 led the Bison effort against Navy, slamming 15 kills, and recording a match-high five blocks.

"It was one of Melanie's best outputs of the season from the front line," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said.

Consistent performances from Shannon Walker '02 and Brandi Trapasso '04 were also critical in the win. Walker posted 14 kills, and Brandi Trapasso earned herself a "double-double" with 11 kills and 12 digs.

Two of the four games came down to the last two points, forcing the Bison to come together as a squad. The resilience of the Herd played a key role in coming out on top.

"As a team we all seemed to work together," Gray said. "Everything flowed, and we communicated well."

The supporting cast also helped get the ball to the Bison power hitters. Whitney Williams '02 and Breean Trapasso '04 added 35 and 13 set assists respectively.

"A lot of people stepped up and made some nice contributions," Opalski said.

> "As a team, we all seemed to work together. Everything flowed and we communicated well."
> —Melanie Gray '02

The day before the Navy match the Bison faced newcomer and League favorite American University in a battle of two undefeated teams within the League.

An uncharacteristically rattled Bucknell squad was defeated by defeated by the Eagles.

"I wish I could say that American got the best of us," Opalski said. "We just didn't get off the bus ready to play volleyball."

Brandi Trapasso once again showed her versatility, posting six kills and five digs in the losing effort.

"We all had our moments in the American match," she said. "But as a team, we had no chemistry."

Bucknell struggled in the area of serve-receive, an aspect of play that they are usually very strong in. Strong hitters like Walker were unable to get a chance to make kills because of the Bison inability to take control of the ball.

"When we're not able to defend the ball where they can execute, we become a one-dimensional team," Opalski said.

Before facing American, the Bison swept St. Francis 3-0 (30-21, 30-21, 30-21). Bucknell had hoped that its drubbing of St. Francis would provide momentum that would carry them into the American match.

Despite St. Francis' winless record, the Bison had a lot to be proud of, playing consistently, and never relenting.

"St. Francis is a very good team for their record," Opalski said. "They run a very good attack, and they never stray from their game plan."

Shannon Walker recorded 16 kills and three blocks in the convincing win. "It was a big match for us," Walker said. "It was important to have a win before the weekend to boost our confidence."

Although the Bison were unable to carry the St. Francis win over to the American match, the team remains optimistic. American will travels to Davis Gym later in the season, a place where Bucknell plays its best volleyball. The Bison have already bounced back with the win against Navy showing the Herd's resilience and mental toughness; two things they will need if they want to beat American.

"We're going through some growing pains right now," Opalski said. "The most important thing for us is to focus on our execution, not on our opponent's, but on what we do."

So it's the NBA off-season and Michael Jordan has announced his return from retirement ... again. But a new generation of ballers have taken the reigns of the NBA since his last game, and they are looking for blood.

Here's a guide into who the movers and shakers were this NBA off-season.

With Jordan returning, the Wizards have become the overwhelming favorite for the next six NBA titles or until Mr. Nike himself decides he needs to work on his golf game, whichever comes first. It's true the Wizards will improve on its 19-63 record from last year and hope to contend for a playoff berth in an already dominant west conference. What Jordan will bring to the Wizards is a sense of stability to lead high school sensation Kwame Brown selected No. 1 overall by the Wizards in June, and veteran forward Christian Laettner.

In Phoenix, Anfernee Hardaway is back from lingering knee problems and ready to demonstrate his seven-year, $86 million contract was worth the price. Hardaway will have to get used to playing alongside Stephon Marbury, who was acquired in the blockbuster trade that sent Jason Kidd to New Jersey.

"It's weird for me, because I really didn't get to play a lot with Jason," Hardaway said to reporters. "But now that Stephon's here, and I'm healthy, it's going to be interesting."

Moving westward, Arvydas Sabonis' agent said he is "98 percent certain" the center will opt to retire rather than re-sign with the Portland Trail Blazers. Sabonis, regarded as the finest center in the world in the early 1980s before a series of injuries limited his quickness, had been unhappy with Portland players and management at the end of last season. Two weeks ago, it was reported that Sabonis could be heading home to his native Lithuania for this year's European basketball season.

Shifting gears to the east coast, the Knicks did some late summer cleaning with the ex-communication of Glenn Rice. Rice, who caused playing time issues in a city that has more stars than the Andromina galaxy, is focused on building around 'the big three' of Allan Houston, Latrell Sprewell and Marcus Camby. The Knicks feel last years early departure in the playoff was just a fluke and that this year will prove that.

Down the coast in sunny Miami, Alonzo Mourning is set to endure his first pre-season since a fight with incurable kidney disease that required a one year leave of absence from the league.

"He looks as good as he has ever looked physically," Coach Pat Riley said. "Last year he lost a lot of weight, lost a lot of strength and lost what 'Zo looks like. Now he has stabilized mentally and physically, and he looks great. He's as cut as I've ever seen him. He's strong."

But does this mean he might be strong enough to carry a rebuilding team? Quiz time: What three 2000-2001 starters are now gone from the Heat's lineup this year? That's right—Anthony Mason, Dan Majerle and Tim Hardaway. See what studying can do! We'll find out if 'Zo can carry the team... Speaking of Mr. Crossover himself, where did Tim Haradway land? To answer this question we pack our bags once more and journey to Big D.

The Dallas Mavericks took a great leap forward last season, scrambling up the Western Conference pecking order and retiching the playoffs for the first time in 11 years, then knocking off the Jazz in the first round.

Taking the next step will be a more laborious process, however. Dallas will open camp as the consensus second choice in the Midwest Division behind San Antonio. In the Western Conference, the Mavericks should be considered behind only the Lakers, Spurs, Kings and perhaps the Trail Blazers.

The Mavs fortified their backcourt over the summer, adding Hardaway, Adrian Griffin, Darrick Martin and Khalid El-Amin behind starters Michael Finley and Steve Nash and top sub Greg Buckner.

This will solve its mediocre backcourt problem, but what about up front? Owner Mark Cuban and his plethora of yahoo.com stocks kept with his "no player costs too much motto" adding some scoring punch to his bench in the name of free agent forward Danny Manning to compliment starters Shawn Bradley and Juwan Howard.

Additions? Yes, but they still fall short of the Tim Duncan/David Robinson twin towers or Shaq himself. It reminds me of the SNL skit with Charles Barkley playing one on one with Barney and how Barkley sent the purple love factory to the hospital—yes fun to watch, but no comparison in talent.

And with that story, we draw a close to our eight city, one article trip, but I have one last report. In a related story, Allen Iverson won't release his much anticipated rap album, which drew criticism from civil rights groups and earned him a reprimand from NBA commissioner David Stern, citing he has matured from his rookie season in the NBA. If Iverson has changed into a 'choir-boy,' losing those 10 pounds you've always wanted just doesn't seem that elusive after all ...

Schmicker's best of the rest

Turn the pages of any national newspaper and you will get the impression that Barry Bonds and Roger Clemens are the only two people who play the game of baseball. Look a little more and it will seem as if the New York Yankees are the most feared team in baseball, even though Seattle has won 111 games this year. Now maybe I'm just bitter over the recent happenings regarding my New York Mets, but it just seems as if the baseball media in this country only has room to talk about a few players. So I am going to take the time to give recognition to the unknown stars of Major League Baseball. Allow me to present my 2001 Under-Appreciated All Star Team, where each of the following players are on teams with losing records.

Javier Vasquez, P, Montreal Expos—After two solid years, Vasquez has emerged as the dominate ace of the staff. Before having his season prematurely ended due to an eye injury, Vasquez went 16-11, with a 3.42 ERA and 208 strikeouts for the lowly Expos.

Charles Johnson, C, Florida Marlins—While Johnson's offensive numbers have suffered a bit since rejoining the Marlins in the offseason, he is still one of the games premier defensive catchers. Still only 29 years old, he has become the veteran of the young team.

Mike Sweeney, 1b, Kansas City Royals—Talk about no exposure- Sweeney has never had any while playing in Kansas City. He is batting .308 with 46 doubles, 28 home runs and 96 RBI's, while having no protection behind him in the batting order.

Jose Vidro, 2b, Montreal Expos—The catalyst of the young Expos lineup has a .371 on base percentage and a .319 batting average this year. While he is not flashy, he is a solid fielder and will get on base.

Aramis Ramirez, 3b, Pittsburgh Pirates—Troy Glaus and Phil Nevin may have more gaudy numbers, but Ramirez is a little less known. He may not be a household name yet, but will be in a few years. He is 23 years old and has scary potential as seen by his .301 average, 24 homers and 107 RBI's. Most importantly, he has helped take pressure off of Brian Giles in the middle of the lineup.

Orlando Cabrera, SS, Montreal Expos—A big year by Cabrera has really helped stabilize the Expos lineup as he gives Vidro and Vladimir Guerrero some much needed protection. He currently has 92 RBI's and a .273 average.

Vladimir Guerrero, OF, Montreal Expos—"Vladimir the Impaler" is simply the brightest young star in the game today. This year he is hitting .310, with 42 doubles, 34 home runs, and 103 RBI's. But that's not all- he has a cannon for an arm and has stolen 34 bases on the year. Playing in Montreal has not given him a chance to shine, but his time will come.

Brian S. Giles, OF, Pittsburgh Pirates—You would not know that the Pirates were 40 games under .500 by watching Giles play. He has fun and hustles on every play. Oh, and he is the only player in franchise history to hit .300 with 30 home runs and 100 RBI's in consecutive seasons. Guess what- he is five RBIs short of making it three years in a row.

Carlos Beltran, OF, Kansas City Royals—Beltran may be one of the most exciting players in baseball. He has 31 doubles, 11 triples and 21 home runs, while stealing 29 bases on the year.

Shannon Stewart, DH, Toronto Blue Jays—Stewart was a wanted commodity before the trading deadline for one reason- he is an all around player. Batting leadoff for the Blue Jays, Stewart has a .313 average with 40 doubles and 193 hits in 627 at bats while being a stud in the outfield.

Frank Catalanotto, Utility, Texas Rangers—Amongst all the A-Rod talk in Texas, Catalanotto has put together a season worthy of team MVP. He is second only to Ichiro with a .340 average and can play four positions on any given occasion. Like Vidro, he is not flashy, but is the type of player every manager would like to have on his team because of the little things he does.

Cincinnati (2-1) at Pittsburgh (1-1)
The Steelers still have a great defense, in fact they have not allowed a rushing TD or a 100 yard rusher yet. Offensively, their running game is solid behind Bettis. However, Stewart and his young receivers are not reliable. The Bengals on the other hand depend on the legs of Corey Dillon to carry them. Cincinnati has averaged over 110 yards rushing a game, and two-thirds of their TD's have come on the run. The Steelers defense will be enough to halt the Bengals.

Tennessee (0-2) at Baltimore (2-1)
This matchup has showcased two of the top defenses in the league the past few seasons. Tennessee will be hurt by the loss of McNair if he is unable to play again this week; however, the Titans are coming off a bye week and McNair has had two weeks to rest his shoulder. Baltimore's offense is still horrible, more so after losing Jamal Lewis. Without an effective rushing attack, the Ravens won't fly high like they did last season. Baltimore wins in a sloppy defensive battle.

San Diego (3-0) at Cleveland (2-1)
The Chargers are the only undefeated team in the AFC. They have the top rusher in the AFC, LaDainian Tomlinson, and a vastly improved passing game behind Doug Flutie. San Diego's defense is finally getting some support. The Browns are finally putting the pieces together and may be able to drop the expansion team tag this season. However, the Chargers will win this one.

Washington (0-3) at New York Giants (2-1)
The Redskins have been outscored 112 to 16 in their first three games, and offensively have gained only half the total yardage that their defense is allowing. The Giants are beginning to show their NFC Championship composure, and will continue to roll if Collins is consistent and he plays behind Dayne and Barber, the "Thunder" and "Lightning" duo. They are the catalyst of the G-men's offense, and if they stay healthy and dominant, don't be surprised by a repeat run to the Super Bowl. Giants.

Green Bay (3-0) at Tampa Bay (1-1)
Green Bay is dominating teams this season. They have scored the second most points in the NFL behind Indiana and have allowed only 13 points in three games played, although they have yet to face a defense half as good as the Buccaneer's. However, the Bucs themselves haven't played against a defense as good as the Packers', and their offense is no where near as good as the attack led by Favre. The Packers win this "Battle of the Bays".

Cincinnati (2-1) at Pittsburgh (1-1)
Hmm ... who to choose, who to choose. If I choose the Bengals, I'm supporting a boring team of wannabes from Cincinnati. If I choose the Steelers, I'm supporting a boring team of wannabes from Pittsburgh. It's like the 2000 presidential elections all over again—Bush versus Gore, Cincinnati versus Pittsburgh. Where's Ralph Nader when you need him. The choices are endless, I can't decide. Oh, right. Yes I can. Cincinnati.

Tennessee (0-2) at Baltimore (2-1)
The Tennessee Titans, formerly the Houston Oilers, and the Baltimore Ravens, formerly the Cleveland Browns, play a game, formerly good. McNair is injured again ... anyone else surprised? This guy is softer than a down pillow in sunshine. Luckily, the Ravens have their number one murderer, Ray Lewis, starting again. Rumor has it that the Ravens are dangling an offer for OJ Simpson to come out of retirement to complete the "crime-committing duo." Reports say that OJ is uninterested, but may be convinced to sign if Timothy McVeigh is resurrected and starts at wide receiver. Baltimore.

San Diego (3-0) at Cleveland (2-1)
Every time I hear about Cleveland playing, automatically the Charlie Brown theme starts playing through my head. Maybe they should have Lucy start at quarterback.

Washington (0-3) at New York Giants (2-1)
Barber is as frail as Calista Flockhart and Dayne is as big-boned as Cartman. Put them together, and what do you get? One fat slow guy and one fast skinny guy. It's like "Of Mice and Men," only they're both idiots. Still, Amani Toomer's name reminds me of Schwarzenegger saying "It's not a tumor" in "Kindergarten Cop," a delightful action/comedy that reminded us all about the eccentricities of life, and warned us all that "It's a jungle gym out there." I say Giants.

Green Bay (3-0) at Tampa Bay (1-1)
Let's do this mathematically. Green Bay x Tampa Bay = Green Bay Sucks. So, GreenTampa(Bay^2) = Green Bay Sucks. The Green's cancel, as does one "Bay" and you are left with Tampa Bay = Sucks. So Green Bay is the smart money.

Bison battle to 3-2 victory

Women's soccer rallies to defeat St. Joseph's with Simon's first two goals

By Andrew Bevan
Staff Writer

At first glance, the women's soccer team's game against no. 7 Penn State last Tuesday seemed like a throwaway—a simple David versus Goliath. However, despite losing 9-2, the Bison played with pride and joined a select group of teams in the country with their performance.

With goals from Tri-Captain Ali Chandler'02 and Lauren Schwarz '03, the Orange and Blue became only the third team, along with North Carolina and Notre Dame, to score two goals on the Nittany Lions this season. The Bison actually scored three but had one called back.

"We played well against Penn State," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said. "Our heads didn't drop and we kept battling.

"It was a positive learning experience, despite the score. We now know that we can play that well with one of the best teams in the country, and with anyone else on our schedule," she said.

Bucknell returned home to face St. Joseph's this past Sunday in a non-conference matchup. They found themselves in a similar situation when they gave up the game's first goal at 26:09 of the half. Despite outshooting their opponents 6-4, the Bison were unable to find the back of the net.

"We were very flat in the beginning of the game," Findlay said. "We found ourselves down a goal, and that has to stop. We are heading into mid-season, and if that does not change we are going to find the same frustrations we found against American."

The Orange and Blue exploded out of the gates in the second half, scoring two goals in a span of three and a half minutes. Forward Kristie Simon '04 put the Bison on the board with a 20-foot shot into the upper left corner of the net for her first goal of the season. Chandler finished a header right in front of the net soon after off an assist from Sarah Klang-

Glienna '02 to give Bucknell the lead.

The Hawks battled back to tie the contest with just over ten minutes in the game. Simon found the net again three minutes later with the game winner, this time using her head off a cross from defender Karla Killian '03.

Goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 had five saves between the pipes for the Orange and Blue to get the victory.

"My biggest concern is that our mentality is not changing," Findlay said. "We are able to score goals, and we need to find out what it is going to take to find this mentality. We can't rely on certain players to put the game away for us."

Purse was encouraged by the team's efforts in the contest. "The St. Joe's game was a very important game to win to give us momentum for difficult upcoming games against Colgate and Holy Cross," she said. "The game was a battle. It seemed as though we were a step behind in the first half, and we knew all we needed to do was get one goal and that would get us going."

Findlay noted the impressive contributions of individual players. "Kristie has been playing well," she said. "She stepped up her intensity and fought through some frustration she has been experiencing lately.

"Karla had a great game from start to finish and I know we can count on her to make the big plays and be consistently strong on defense. Tara Utchel ['03] was composed in the midfield and she is beginning to get comfortable with her knee brace and is on her way back to being a field general," Findlay said.

Bucknell returns to Patriot League play this Saturday at noon when they host Colgate. "They are one of the powerhouses in the Patriot League," Utchel said. "We have to stay mentally focused this week at practice. We'll win the game if we can slow down their transition of play, which we are very capable of doing."

Athlete of the Week:

Brandi Trapasso '04

By Pat Evans
Senior Writer

In what we thought would be his final season, Michael Jordan won an NBA Championship and the MVP award. Last year, Brandi Trapasso won the Patriot League Championship and the Defensive Player of the Year award. The difference between Trapasso and Jordan: Trapasso didn't need a couple years of gambling and golf to get her to come back and work hard again.

Trapasso has improved her game even more, to the point where she has moved to fifth in the League in service aces, a weapon that she didn't have last year.

"The reason she's improving," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said, "is because she has taken time to work on her weaknesses."

Her 27 service aces this season have moved the Bison to 20th in the nation in the statistic. Also, her improvement in serving has not detracted from her defensive and offensive capabilities.

In the recent Lehigh match the versatile sophomore led the Bison with a team-high 14 kills, while posting match-highs 20 digs and four service aces.

"She's one of our most consistent players," Melanie Gray '02 said. "She's very aggressive, and goes after every ball, which helps our team a lot."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Brandi Trapasso '04 gets it done all over the court.

Bucknell's only League loss this year occurred against newcomer American University. Trapasso led the Bison in the losing effort with six kills and only one error on 15 attempts.

"We're trying to step it up for League play, and repeat as Patriot League champions," Trapasso said.

She looks forward to her team having another shot at the Eagles later in the season in Davis Gym, a place where the Bison have played considerably better.

"The most exciting time to play is when everyone comes to the game screaming," Trapasso said.

Trapasso's well roundedness on the court is one of the main reasons for the Bison's success this year. Strong teams in the League have balanced attacks that force the Bison to counteract in all areas of play.

Trapasso's determined defensive play, combined with her aggressive offensive weapons, makes Bucknell a difficult team to beat.

It is the intangibles that have led to Trapasso's improvement as a player. Her work ethic is what she's used to make her the best defensive player in the League, and now one of the best servers too.

"Her most outstanding attributes," Opalski said, "are that she's got a great attitude, she's a fierce competitor, she works hard and she sincerely cares about her team."

Water polo notches one win at Inivtational

By Barb Morgan
Staff Writer

After breaking into the top 20 in National Collegiate Water Polo polls last week, the Bison were ready to face other top teams at the North/South Invitational this past weekend at Princeton University. The competition would prove to be fierce as the Bison went 1-3 for the weekend, bringing their overall record to 4-7.

In the Blue and Orange's first game of the tournament, Bucknell fell 7-2 to no. 17 in the nation, Harvard University. Not having played in a 30-meter pool since Labor Day appeared to hurt the Bison as they struggled to find rhythm in the game.

The first half was very dry offensively, as the Bison did not get on the scoreboard until the third quarter with a goal from Jamie Saettele '04, assisted by Ryan McCarty '02. McCarty would then put up the second goal for the team in the fourth quarter, assisted by Adam Yerkes '03.

Also impacting the game was that the previous weekend's leading scorer. Elliot Benoist '05, was hurt in the first quarter and out for the rest of the game and weekend.

In the second game of the day the Bison came out strong against no. 13 UMass, ending the first quarter with a 3-3 tie. The Minutemen would then outscore the Bison 10-2 in the final three quarters to end the game in a 13-5 loss for the Orange and Blue.

Despite four man-up opportunities for the Bison, they were not able to translate these into goals, while UMass took full advantage of their 11 man-up opportunities.

"We struggled to generate offensive movement and scoring, as well as defensive movement in order to shut down UMass's solid two-meter players," Head Coach John Zeigler said. "Our inability to run a productive six-man offense led to many counterattack opportunities for U. Mass."

Bison scoring was lead by McCarty and Dan Lonnderdal '03 with two goals each, and Saettele with one.

In their third game of the day Saturday, a quality fourth quarter gave Bucknell a 9-8 win over rival Iona. Lonnerdal had a big offensive game for the Orange and Blue with four goals, as did James Danforth '05, with two key outside goals, an assist, and three steals. Continuing their solid play were McCarty and Saettele, who had two and one goals, respectively.

Defense also proved to be a key factor in this game as the Bison were able to shut out the Gales in the second and third quarters, led by Aaron Platshon's five steals from the two-meter defense position. Perhaps the most critical defensive play of the game came from goalie Dave Kennedy '02, when he blocked a four-meter penalty shot with 1:30 left that would have tied the game. Kennedy finished the game with 14 saves.

"The weekend started out very poorly," McCarty said. "We had a very difficult time adjusting to the big pool again. However, after the first two games, the team decided it was time to play hard and not think about the pool size."

In their final game Sunday morning, the Bison fell 9-8 to no. 19 St. Francis. The game was the fifth one-point decision on the season for the Orange and Blue. The Bison led 4-2 at the end of the fourth quarter but St. Francis countered with seven more goals in the next two quarters. McCarty had a huge offensive first half, scoring four of his five goals, two from the two-meter and two from outside. Yerkes stepped up his offensive play to net two goals off of drive plays as well as two assists.

Despite preventing St. Francis from scoring in the final quarter, the Bison were not able to put enough goals in the cage to make up the deficit from the St. Francis scoring spurt. Kennedy once again led the defensive effort with 17 saves and three steals.

"I was pleased with how we finished the weekend after a rocky start," Zeigler said. "The adjustment back to 30-meter play took longer than I thought it would, but we responded to adversity well as seen in our third game on Saturday. We are improving every time we play and I'm looking forward to continued improvement in the upcoming weeks."

Senior Co-Captains Kennedy and McCarty both walked away from the weekend very positively. "After Sunday morning's performance, I think we can play with any team in the East," McCarty said. "Our offense improved tremendously both on and individual and team basis. After spending almost a week in a 30-meter tank in California [on the Fall Break training trip] we should be ready for our next round of league games."

"I cannot imagine having a better one-and-three weekend," Kennedy said. "The record wasn't good, but we played tough teams, and improved drastically over the weekend. Plus, the really good sign is that the guys and I had fun. It really made a difference."

The Bison travel to California for the Claremont Convergence Tournament Oct. 12-13.

Back to the future

No phrase is known better in Chicago's United Center and the old Chicago Stadium as the voice of the loudspeaker crying out " ... at shooting guard, 6'6", from North Carolina, Michael Jordan!" That face was a fixture in Chicago; a man who defined a city. That was the introduction for the greatest basketball player of all time, Michael Jeffrey Jordan.

And now he's back. Again.

This time though, the greatest in the history of the game won't suit up in red and white like the spectacular pictures we remember him in, rather in a blue and gold Washington Wizard's uniform, playing for the nation's capital. But it is also sure to be an accepted sight for millions of basketball fans around the world.

After three years in hibernation, Jordan has once again decided to lace up the sneakers and hit the hardwood floor. Giving up his part-ownership in the team, Jordan finally announced last Tuesday that he was once again coming out of retirement.

Commentary

Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

Jordan retired with three championships after the 1992-1993 season due to personal reasons, including the murder of his father, and stated that he no longer had anything to prove in the game of basketball.

Suuuurrre.

Jordan came back, as a 32-year-old, for the remaining 17 games of the 1994-1995 regular season. Who could forget the number 45 on his jersey? Who could forget his first game in Indiana? Scoring 19 points in that contest was far from what Jordan stood for before his first retirement but everyone still loved him. Everyone accepted him and knew that he would once again soon return to his usual self. That meant that he could score 19 points in one half in any given game. Maybe even one quarter. It happened before so why not again right?

Mike proved to the world, in '94-'95 and until the '97-'98 season, that he was and is truly the best, in history. He led the Bulls to three more championships, defeating and every team that got in the way. He never accepted losing. He hated it when people slacked off. He hated it when people messed up. Jordan was the ultimate motivator.

So here came 1997-1998 NBA season. Jordan, as a-35 year-old, started showing signs that maybe the age thing might finally catch up to him. Well not really.

He still averaged 28.7 points per game and led the league in that category. Again. Tongues wagging all over the place. Gold trophies being held up all over the place as well.

To briefly recap his career before last Tuesday, Jordan had accumulated ten scoring titles, six championships, and five MVP trophies. Add to that many All-NBA First team awards, several NBA All-Defensive First Team selections, many All-Star Games, three All-Star Game MVP awards, a couple of Slam-Dunk titles, numerous NBA records and two Olympic Gold Medals.

Out of breath yet?

Add to that the highest points-per-game average in a career, 31.5. And hitting the game winning shot in the NBA Finals against the Utah Jazz for title number six. And...

Anyway let's talk about now. The 2001 NBA season. It's about to get underway in several weeks and obviously the biggest attraction is that bald headed guy. Again.

How will his return affect his legacy? The league?

He's not coming back for the glory. He even said success does not always mean championships. He is coming back for the passion obviously still burning in his heart.

"I am returning as a player to the game I love," Jordan stated. "I am especially excited about the Washington Wizards, and I'm convinced we have the foundation on which to build a play-off contention team. The opportunity to teach our young players and help them elevate their game to a higher level, and to thank the fans in Washington for their loyalty and support, strongly influenced my decision."

There is no doubt that his Wizards won't win as many games as his Bulls team of the 90s. How will Jordan handle that? He is surrounded by a young core of players. He basically assembled the team the way he wanted it to be. He even replaced the coach. Having guys like SG Richard Hamilton, SG Courtney Alexander, PF and high school sensation Kwame Brown to run with is very different from his days in Chicago, when he took the court with SF and future Hall of Famer Scottie Pippen, PF Horace Grant, and PF Dennis Rodman. Now he is surrounded by guys that were young kids when he entered the league.

Will he still be able to play 35-40 minutes a night? Don't count on it. Play in all 82 games? Don't count on that either. These are realistic settings. He isn't going to be the same Jordan who can come up with random 50 point games whenever he felt like it. He is 38, an age where most athletes don't even reach, much less reach and succeed. Over the summer, he showed signs of being an old man. Tendinitis in his knees progressively got worse.

Mike versus Allen Iverson? Mike versus Kobe Bryant? Latrell Sprewell, Ray Allen, Vince Carter, Michael Finley, Tracy McGrady ... the list goes on and on. These are the guys that Jordan will have to face every night. This new wave of younger NBA All-Star guards are hungry to get a piece of the best. After all, he embarrassed a few of them when he last played in '97-'98. He beat Iverson already. He beat Kobe already. Iverson is now the MVP. Kobe is now the champion. They are displaying the type of game that Jordan exhibited in his rookie year of 1984. They are the ones flying in the air for senile and acrobatic dunks. They are jumping over people, literally (remember Carter jumping over the head of and dunking on 7'2" Frederic Weis of France in the Sydney Olympics?).

Members of the basketball world have chipped in with their opinion as well.

"He won't be the same player as he was before, but he's smart and competitive," said Earvin "Magic" Johnson, "and he still has the talent to control a game."

Undoubtedly he'll improve the Wizards squad as a whole, who last year finished with an abysmal 19-63 record. He'll get his minutes, he'll get his points, and he'll get his highlights. He won't dominate as he did before but he should vastly improve the team. They're still hopeful for a shot at the play-offs. Not a bad goal for a team that failed to win a quarter of their games last season.

Everyone is a little worried about him tarnishing his legacy. Everyone is a little worried that he might fall flat on his face. At the same token, most of the people are welcoming his return. People love the fact that they will be able to see Michael compete once again.

Roll out the red carpet. Or should it be blue and gold? Either way, the world will enjoy the show.

Everyone open their books to chapter three...

"Shot" heard 'round the world turns 50

The New York Giants' Bobby Thompson hit the "Shot Heard 'Round the World" in 1951.

Legend has it that hours after being on the wrong end of the greatest home run in the history of baseball, a dejected Ralph Branca sat down with a priest, Father Pat Rowley. "Pat, why me, tell me why me. I don't smoke, I don't drink, I don't run around. Baseball is my whole life. Why me?" the Dodgers hurler asked desperately. Rowley looked back at Branca mercifully and told him, "God chose you because He knew you had the faith and strength to bear this cross."

Branca didn't make a liar out of him. October 3 will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the day his world fell apart, and over that half-century, not once was he bitter; not once did he whine, cite injustice or publicly wallow in self-pity.

While Ralph Branca has carried the burden, Bobby Thomson has lived the other extreme. While Branca was sitting silently on the clubhouse steps, elbows on his knees, hunched over with his head sagging below his shoulders, Thomson was grinning ear-to-ear, hugging teammates and bouncing around the Giants' clubhouse in sheer jubilation.

Thomson got to be the hero, while Branca was left to be the goat. Thomson would become the gracious winner; Branca, the perennial good sport. Yet their names have been ingrained side by side in baseball history for the past 50 years, and assumedly always will be.

In 1951, the dawn of the last decade that the Brooklyn Dodgers and New York Giants would spend as cross-town rivals, the Dodgers had a commanding lead in the pennant race—a whopping 13 games—over the Giants in mid-August.

With six weeks left in the season, Leo Durocher's Giants needed a minor miracle. Some say it was the taunting from their rivals, some say it was an elaborate sign-stealing operation, some say it was just plain old fate—whatever the cause, something lit a fire beneath the New York Giants.

By the last day of the season, they had pulled even with the Dodgers, forcing a three-game playoff to determine the NL Champion.

In a subtle foreshadowing of things to come, Thomson was the hero of Game One, hitting a game-winning home run off of none other than Ralph Branca, and leading the Giants to an early advantage in the series. But the Dodgers put a damper on the Whiz Kids' Cinderella run when they pounded their way to a 10-0 win in the second game.

It would all be left to a third game, held at the Giants' Polo Grounds. And, to employ a classic cliché, the rest is history.

Starting pitchers Sal Maglie and Don Newcombe duked it out over the first seven innings, holding the score to one run apiece going into the eighth. But the Dodgers blew it open in their next stint at bat.

Leading 4-1 in the ninth, Brooklyn felt pretty confident that it had had the last laugh—even when the Giants scraped out a run in the bottom of the ninth to pull within two.

The Dodgers, the press, and hoards of Brooklyn fans were now looking ahead to the World Series. Meanwhile, Newcombe was tiring, and Charley Dressen looked to his bullpen to finish things off.

Of the two pitchers warming up, Branca was the one that was ready. Or at least it seemed that way at the time. There are some things a pitcher is never ready for.

It didn't matter that he'd inherited runners on second and third with only one out. It didn't matter that the man at the plate was Bobby Thomson, who had already socked out two doubles and a homer in the series. It didn't matter that the right-hander had already given up six home runs to Thomson in the regular season. Branca didn't know what he was getting into.

Thomson, dubbed "The Staten Island Scot", had enjoyed a bang-up season after being converted from outfielder to third basemen in mid-July, and wasn't about to let it stop here. Branca still managed to blow a fastball right by him to get ahead in the count.

That was as good as it would ever get for the pitcher, a three time all-star who was brave enough to don the number 13 on his uniform. The next pitch he threw, a sloppy fastball high and inside, ended up in the left field stands. The Dodgers went home; the Giants went to the World Series.

The ensuing five decades eventually filtered the details and subplots out, leaving two men—the hero and the goat—as the legacy of the home run, which is commonly known as "The Shot Heard Round The World." They would pose for the same photos and sign the same baseballs; they made the same talk-show appearances, and they sat side-by-side in interviews.

Sometimes it's easy to forget that they were rivals. They seem more like partners in crime—together, masterful architects of history.

Years later, baseball is a different game than it was in 1951. As the years rolled by, the sport saw expansions, realignments, the designated hitter and free agency, among other things. The Dodgers are now in Los Angeles; the Giants in San Francisco. The Polo Grounds are gone; the left field stands where The Shot landed have long since been obliterated.

There have been other heroes—Mazeroski, Fisk, Carter. Still, Bobby Thomson is the epitome of the gracious winner. And there have been other goats—Niedenfuer, Moore, Buckner. Ralph Branca is still the epitome of the admirably noble loser.

While their teams are far removed from New York and their athletic prowess has long since been diminished by old age, Branca and Thomson still take all the heat together. They still answer all the questions. They still sign all the autographs.

Fifty years after that October third, the day that broke one man's heart and lifted another's, the two are still the embodiment of true sportsmanship.

Fortunately, some things never change.

Bison split games, stand 5-4

Field Hockey blanks Ursinus 1-0 but suffers same fate in 2-0 loss to Lehigh

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

The field hockey team is a little more than halfway through its season, with only three more Patriot League games remaining. The Bison have been busy this past week with back-to-back League games against rivals Ursinus and Lehigh, bringing their current team record to 5-4.

The Bison tallied their first League win against the Bears of Ursinus last Wednesday. This was the first of the last five games for the Bison that didn't end with a sudden death overtime period.

BU wanted to come out fighting hard from the beginning, but was out-shot in the first half 5-3. Determined and fired up after their half-time pep talk, the Bison increased their offensive pressure in the second half. After a few valiant attempts by both teams, senior tri-captain Dena Ebert was able to capitalize on a loose save by the Ursinus goalie to score her fourth goal of the season and the 32nd of her career.

Junior goalie Sonja Wettergreen made 11 saves to record her third shutout of the season. By the end of the game, the Bison had out-shot the Bears 14-11 and had their first Patriot League win.

"I thought we fought hard in our midweek game against Ursinus," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "I thought the team played with a real sense of determination and a certain focus in their eyes. They kept the pressure on Ursinus pretty much the entire game and the result was indicative."

Unfortunately, the team's second league game of the week did not turn out as well as the first. The Mountain Hawks of Lehigh capitalized off of two penalty corners to bring the final score of the game to 2-0. Goalie Sonja Wettergreen made two saves during the contest.

"Lehigh played well, and it was a tough loss for us," Senior Tri-captain Lauren Campbell said. "That is behind us now and we have to look to our next big game against Holy Cross. As a team, we need to reestablish our belief that we are one of the best in the league."

Lewis agreed. "Against Lehigh, we didn't come out as mentally and emotionally sharp as I would have liked," she said. "We certainly had our opportunities but they didn't go our way on Saturday. It was a difficult loss but one we must put behind us and look forward to our next game."

The Bison are already looking to their next game against national power Penn State on Tuesday, October 2. The Bison will be hosting the defending Patriot League Champions and current first place team, Holy Cross, on Saturday, October 6 at the mod fields.

"It is always a good game between us and Holy Cross," Lewis said. "I honestly believe this game will go a long way in determining the next Patriot League Champion."

Vaccinations available as flu season approaches

By Erin Grim
Staff Writer

Winter is on its way and so is the annually dreaded flu season, which runs from November to April. To reduce the number of cases on campus, immunizations will be offered on Wednesday, Oct. 10 in the Langone Center.

The flu shot costs $20 and the meningitis vaccine, which lasts three to five years, is offered for $85. Nancy Shuck, assistant director of Student Health Services, warns that many students contract the flu each year causing a large number to miss classes during exams.

If the flu is not bad enough, Meningococcal meningitis, fatal in 10 percent of cases, is known to be highly contagious on college campuses.

The Meningitis Foundation of America (MFA) states that dormitory life is a primary reason why the disease's most susceptible age group is 16 to 25-year-olds.

Meningitis is a bacterial infection that can cause brain damage, hearing loss, organ failure, loss of limbs or death. VACCESSHealth, the organization sponsoring the immunizations at the University, describes the symptoms as experiencing fever, stiff neck, rash, nausea, vomiting and lethargy. Meningitis attacks quickly. From the first signs of symptoms, victims can die within 48 hours.

Between 100 to 125 cases occur on U.S. college campuses annually. First-year students are at the highest risk. The number of outbreaks have been on the rise in recent years, which is all the more reason to consider the vaccination. Meningitis vaccines will be available at the same time as the flu shot.

Other precautions can be taken as well. According to the Center for Disease Control (CDC), Meningitis is a bacterial infection spread through kissing, sharing cigarettes or drinks, and even through the air via sneezes and coughs.

College lifestyle behaviors, such as excessive alcohol consumption, smoking and second-hand smoke and bar patronage, increase the risk of contraction. To avoid infection, the CDC advises avoiding risky behavior and to eat a balanced diet and get adequate sleep and exercise.

Meningococcal meningitis proved its deadliness last year, as a student at Penn State University died suddenly on campus upon contracting the disease.

To be protected from both meningitis and the flu this season, stop by the Langone Center's second floor Center Room on Oct. 10, from 1 p.m. to 7 p.m. for vaccination.

Professor helps in finding a more efficient method of producing AIDS medications

By Nate Ivanick
Staff Writer

In the race to find a cure for HIV, no one field of science is sufficient.

Chemists, molecular biologists, evolutionary biologists and biomedical engineers all tackle different aspects of the problem. These jobs range from synthesis of drugs, to testing, to predicting future changes in the virus.

Michellamines, a new brand of HIV drug, works by stopping viral replication, and viral induced cell death. In addition, these new drugs work for a variety of HIV strains. Although these compounds can be isolated from tropical plants, a synthetic pathway is desirable.

Tropical plants are often difficult to obtain, and therefore costly. Consequently, several research groups tackled the job of devising an efficient method for manufacture of these pharmaceuticals. As a result the efforts of these groups, the total synthesis of Michellamines was recently published.

A key step in these reactions is the use of transition metal catalyst in a process referred to as a "Suzuki coupling" where small molecules are joined together through a series of discrete linkages.

Professor of Chemisty, Robert Stockland tries to aid in this search as well. One of the many aspects of Stockland's research concentrates on improving the conditions for the Suzuki coupling.

Unfortunately, Suzuki couplings tend to employ rather harsh conditions (high temperatures) or materials that burst into flame when exposed to moisture or air.

Stockland's goal was to create a reaction that would carry out the Suzuki coupling reaction in an easier, quicker, and more effective way. Whenever less time and energy can be put into the creation of a drug, the drug can be sold for much cheaper costs, thus making the drugs more available to people around the world.

Stockland was able to accomplish this using a metal containing catalyst comprised of a palladium (metal source) and a novel supporting compound that was made by University undergraduates doing research in his lab. Using this system, Suzuki couplings are successfully carried out at room temperature under extremely mild conditions using materials that are stable to moisture and oxygen.

It is hoped that this research will continue to develop new transition metal catalyzed processes. With these new processes, HIV drugs can become simpler, cheaper, and more available to people worldwide.

Biological warfare may be very unlikely

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

Lately biological warfare has been on everyone's mind. Recent investigation has added to this hysteria by allegedly finding evidence of the suspected jet hijackers researching crop-dusters, which could be used in the spread of deadly germs or chemicals. Researchers remain skeptical as to how immediate the threat of biological warfare is.

According to The New York Times, Attorney General John Ashcroft said that because of American counterstrike there is a higher risk of terrorist attack, but not necessarily through biological or chemical warfare. Experts say that there is a greater risk of firearms, car bombs or hijacking of hazardous waste trucks.

> "There is an ocean of difference between learning how to steer a jetliner into a building and overcoming technical hurdles in dispersing a biological agent. —Dr. Amy E. Smithson Chemical and biological weapons expert

Focus has now shifted onto threat assessment and prevention. This includes considering all possibilities and making inferences based on the resources available to terrorists.

A central concern with threat assessment, according to The New York Times, lays in uncertainty and disagreement between experts, as well as the difficulty of distinguishing between vulnerability and potential danger. Most threat assessments are top secret. Information is only released after the General Accounting Office reviews and reassesses all the reports.

According to The New York Times, David M. Walker, head of the General Accounting Office (G.A.O.), told Congress that there is an "urgent imperative" for a comprehensive assessment to be made.

Experts who doubt the high risk of mass destruction say that it is very difficult to acquire the complex equipment needed to spread deadly pathogens, chemicals or radioactivity. They argue that terrorists are not the technological geniuses Americans assume them to be.

"There is an ocean of difference between learning how to steer a jetliner into a building and overcoming technical hurdles in dispersing a biological agent," said Dr. Amy E. Smithson, an expert on chemical and biological weapons at the Henry L. Stimson Center.

Most researchers agree that the risk of attack will rise gradually over the years, when science and technological expertise spreads around the world.

Not all nations, however, have the ability to acquire nuclear or biological weapons. According to The New York Times, nuclear weapons require mines, reactors and huge factories to manufacture. As for chemical and biological arms, specific raw materials need to be available.

Germ warfare remains the biggest imposing threat. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention particularly fear smallpox. Even though the virus was erased from mankind decades ago, smallpox, when obtained, spreads extremely fast.

A 1999 G.A.O. report ranked chlorine and other commonly used substances as high risks.

Biological agents can be grown, but the process of making them lethal is very difficult. As for nuclear weapons, the radiological types are feared. The "dirty nuke" is easy to acquire, using highly explosive elements to scatter highly radioactive materials.

Recently, Americans are stocking up on water, fearing terrorist poisoning of reservoirs. Experts argue that water supplies are very difficult to contaminate enough to cause widespread casualties, due to dilution and diffusion factors.

Right now, Americans are very susceptible to fear. Dr. David R. Franz, former official in the Army's germ-defense program, said, "People don't understand how difficult it is to pull off a biological attack."

Fran McDaniel: Office of LGBT Awareness

Catherine Coolidge—The Bucknellian

McDaniel has been the LGBT advisor for four years.

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

The current academic year has been very busy for Fran McDaniel, the University's advisor for the Office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender Awareness.

McDaniel has been the advisor of the office for LGBT awareness for four years. She grew up in Northern California, where she received her undergraduate degree from Humble State University. Her master's degree is in social work from the University of Houston. Until becoming a member of the University community, she spent most of career working with children and youth in residential treatment centers.

"I really enjoy social work because I enjoy watching people grow and change. Social work is looking at people in the context of their whole environment and seeing the kinds of things that impact people as they grow and develop and live their lives," McDaniel said.

It is this background in social work that led McDaniel to her present position at the University. When she moved to the area with her partner of 13 years, she had not intended to get a job. Upon seeing the advertisement for the University's LGBT advisor position, she didn't think she could pass up the chance to continue to use her experience as a social worker and continue to help people in a different setting.

McDaniel has not found her job to be easy, but it has been very rewarding. "Being in this office is a delicate thing because being different at the University is pretty hard. And being out as a lesbian or gay person is not very easy. But I also feel that I am the luckiest person on staff because I get to be who I am every day. I get to do work that I believe in, which is to enable to people to see beyond the obvious and to educate and open eyes and build bridges. I am very lucky," McDaniel said.

McDaniel's position is officially defined as the permanent part-time advisor for the office of LGBT awareness. At the start of her four years here, she felt that the position was initially pretty narrowly defined as just dealing with the students who came into the office. Since then, she feels that she has been able to broaden the scope, purpose and mission of the office to change it to awareness.

"I see the mission of the office to be redefined to increasing LGBT awareness for the entire campus. It is primarily focused on the student, but there is a tremendous amount of support from faculty and administrators for LGBT awareness," McDaniel said.

She feels this is very important because it provides resources for people on campus who are wondering about their sexual orientation. These faculty and staff are there to support these students with whatever decision they make.

"My job is to up the awareness, to have people not live so narrowly. So much of what we see are people just like ourselves, and people don't even realize that there are small differences between us, sexual orientation being one of those. A lot of people get very focused on sexual orientation, but that is just a part, one part of who we are," said McDaniel.

As advisor to LGBT she also advises FLAG/BT which consists mainly of friends of lesbians, gays, bisexuals and transgenders. It is a support group for people who are working on peace and justice issues, who really believe that there are issues related to the rights of gay and lesbian people and believe that they should have their own freedoms.

McDaniel's goal is not only to increase awareness but also to work on building alliances with other offices and groups of people on campus. "One of the things I have done is to build bridges with different offices that you would not necessarily think about. The office of LGBT has worked closely with the Greek system and the department of athletics and recreation. These alliances have resulted in several co-sponsored activities and speakers," McDaniel said.

McDaniel is very excited about their next speakers, Danny and Melissa, from "The Real World." They will speak on Oct. 20 at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center concerning their experiences on the show, concentrating on issues that affect all students, such as sexual orientation, diversity, multiculturalism, and volunteerism. Tickets are free with University ID starting on Oct. 9 at the Weis Center box office, and will be available to the public beginning Oct. 11.

The number of sponsors for the event is a clear example of the different groups that the office of LGBT awareness works with. Among these co-sponsoring groups are BSG, FLAG/BT, the women's resource center, NSBE, the residential colleges, the office of multicultural affairs and the dean of students office.

One of McDaniel's other major goals is a project called Alliance at Bucknell; creating safe space. This is a new initiative that is a student created and facilitated program to create LGBT awareness and resources. It will be a training programs that she hopes to take to educate many student groups and leaders, including resident assistants, junior fellows, resident fellows Greeks and athletes, on LGBT issues. She hopes to implement the Alliance at Bucknell: creating safe space this spring. McDaniel is also working with public safety to educate the campus that gay bashing is a crime and is punishable by law.

October, LGBT history month, is naturally one of McDaniel's busiest months, especially since National Coming Out Day is Oct. 11.

"National Coming Out Day is important to me because I think that it is important for people to be congruent. Oftentimes what happens to LGBT persons is that they have to live two lives because society is not quite accepting, and that they are nervous or scared to be out. It is very important because until more people are out, we are not serving as role models to young people who are not sure. The more people there are who are out, the more other people are going to say 'gee that may be ok,'" McDaniel said.

McDaniel finds that there is a tremendous amount of support from the University, and people are willing to join hands and work together. She thinks that there are people supporting the office of LGBT awareness throughout campus. "I find the University unique in that I have a contribution to make here. I am making a contribution. I feel that the longer I'm here the greater that contribution will be," McDaniel said.

The LGBT awareness office has made great strides and shows no signs of stopping under McDaniel's leadership.

"There is a lot of work to be done here, and while there is a tremendous amount of support here for LGBT issues on campus, there is also a lot of educating that needs to be done. Our work is not done. As long as people continue to say that homophobia and name-calling are okay, our work is not done. By the time my work is done I would hope that name-calling would be gone from this campus. My goal is to eradicate that," McDaniel said.

She feels that this is a very reachable goal because the University has made a real commitment to LGBT issues, and that is one of the most important steps to creating a safe place for all students, faculty and staff.

Campus and community support anti-violence vigil

By Katy Zachary
Senior Writer

On Monday, Oct. 8, every student, faculty and community member will have the opportunity to participate in Lewisburg's third annual Stop the Hate protest.

"Stop the Hate" is a nationwide effort that began three years ago under the sponsorship of The Fellowship of Reconciliation (a committee devoted to nonviolence) and The Interfaith Alliance (a group of progressive Jewish, Christian, and Muslim individuals).

According to the movement's official website, hate violence refers to "acts of violence that are motivated by hatred of persons in a targeted group." These violent and hateful acts are typically committed in response to an individual's ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, race, gender or disability.

This movement began partly in response to the brutal attacks on James Byrd, an African American in Texas who was dragged to death by a pick-up truck, and on Matthew Shepard, a homosexual man in Montana, who was beaten to death and then hung on a fence.

Doug Sturm, a former University professor at the time, was one of the individuals who coordinated the community's first Stop the Hate march in 1999. Sturm sees these tragic events and others as "instances of hate crimes and hate acts that have been occurring across the nation, ranging from harassment to beatings to death."

There were many people, both on and off campus, who realized the need for the University community to adopt this cause. Sturm, along with Saundra Morris, professor of English, Ian Oliver, University chaplain, and John Dromazos, town liaison, worked tirelessly to solicit university and town groups that would take part in the movement.

The number of interested groups led to Lewisburg becoming one of the 350 nationwide locations to sponsor an annual Stop the Hate protest. "The turnout in Lewisburg gets bigger every year," said Oliver.

"At the instigation of the Community Alliance for Respect & Equality (CARE) and the Office of the Chaplain at the University, with others, the first event was held. We have continued the tradition given its persistent value," Sturm said.

This movement's persistent value is even more apparent today, especially in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorism attacks. Professor of Religion, Eric Mazur, one of the newest leaders of the Stop the Hate committee and a Senior Fellow for the Social Justice Residential College, anticipates an even bigger turnout this year than in years past.

"I think involvement will increase because of what happened on Sept. 11th and overall concern about the attacks and things that have gone on since the attacks. It provides an opportunity for people to denounce hate and hate violence. It allows them to do it in unison," Mazur said.

Unity is one of the core aspects behind these demonstrations. The past two years have each brought at least 300 participants to take part in the anti-violence march, but next week's protest will be conducted somewhat differently. Instead of a Stop the Violence march, there will a vigil.

"Following a number of statements and stories, testimonials and readings, songs and poems, the group will form a candlelight stand on Market Street," Sturm said.

This year boasts the biggest number of campus groups that has ever agreed to participate in the protest. With close to 40 university and town organizations scheduled to take part, this year's vigil is bound to evoke a powerful response.

Taking place in Hufnagle Park at 7 p.m., the vigil will incorporate various presentations into its agenda. While the event is open to the public, the University encourages its participants to congregate downhill Langone Center at 6:30 p.m. to walk as a group to the park. The students and faculty will then join the community members to commence the vigil.

"This event is especially significant in the broad base of its town/university and multicultural participation. We make a strong statement when such a variety of groups and people can unite to promote socio-structural and individual kindness, compassion and love," said Morris, also a Senior Fellow for the Social Justice Residential college.

Lewisburg's overwhelming response to this national campaign demonstrates the community's refusal to tolerate violent acts of hate and aggression.

Sturm agreed, saying, "We are all members of the global community. We need to demonstrate our opposition to forces that divide us from each other and our commitment to work together to do what has never yet been accomplished in this country or elsewhere: create a genuinely democratic community."

An abroad perspective: studying in Rome

By Brett Alcarese
Contributing Writer

I arrived at Fiumicino airport in the outskirts of Rome, Italy on Jan. 16, and, after a death-defying cab ride to my apartment in the heart of Vatican City (think New York City drivers but about 40 miles per hour faster), I began my initiation as a quasi-Roman, a title I would try my hardest to live up to for the next four months.

As any American traveler will tell you, regardless of the lengths you go to in order to "blend in," all of us born and raised in the good ole' U.S. seem to have "I am an American—and I am probably ignorant" tattooed on our foreheads for all Europeans to see, guffaw over, and assume to be true.

And, after watching some of the American tourists, with whom I was truly proud to be associated, I saw that the stereotype is hardly an illusion. Despite this, I constantly tried to prove the stigma wrong and embrace Italian culture.

My first few weeks in the "eternal city" were filled with a combination of trying to adjust to my new surroundings and falling in love with everything that surrounded me … This is an excerpt from the first mass e-mail (my specialty) that I wrote home:

It's been a full two weeks in Rome now, and things are going well overall. So far, we've spent most of our time exploring. The Italians' favorite thing to do is definitely eating, and there are no jokes when it comes to meal-time. We found a little restaurant near our school called "Grazioli," owned by the cutest little old man, named Carlo and his wife, where my friends and I eat on Monday nights when we all have late classes. We found a great deli where Fabio (no, really, that's his real name) makes our sandwiches for lunch. Mostly, though, we cook for ourselves. Buying food at the outdoor market is like going to an auction — everything happens so fast and you better fight for your place in line or else the little old lady next to you is going to beat you out!

Two nights ago we went to Testevare, an area of Rome where a lot of the of the locals go, and walked into what turned out to be karaoke bar. So of course we had to sing "Like a Prayer" and "With or Without You" by request (don't ask—Italians love U2) before the locals physically took the microphone away from us because we were so bad—evidently they take their karaoke very seriously here.

The rest of my semester was all that and more. Temple University's program occupied my weeks with studying Italian culture, government, Roman antiquity, Italian films, and Renaissance art with on-site fieldtrips every week. I got a job as a waitress in a local bar called "Kenny's." That ended fast when I realized I couldn't quite understand as much Italian as I thought when a woman asked me for the check and I brought her another coke.

Most weekends we traveled in small groups. Alongside my friends, backpacks packed to the brim, I took the train to places all throughout Italy: Florence, Venice, Sicily, Cinqueterra, Milan and a U.S. military base in Naples. One weekend we flew to Paris, and for Spring Break we went to Tenerife in the Canary Islands. The best weekends though were when we stayed in Rome and experienced the nightlife there.

My favorite story comes from the night that we decided to go clubbing for the first time. We checked our "Let's Go Italy" guidebook (a.k.a. the Bible) and chose a club with three rooms that each had different types of music playing. We got there, got in line, and soon noticed that people were staring at us and giggling. Then again, we figured it was just our proverbial tattoos.

We saw men wearing very tight, shiny clothes and women in fishnets but we didn't know what clubs were like in Italy so we decided to go with the flow. We paid the cover and started toward one room but the guys we were with weren't allowed in. The room was women only. Hmmm. We started toward another room but this time we weren't allowed in because it was men only. STILL puzzled, we finally noticed the postcard advertisements on the tables: Be Beautiful-Go Gay! We saw the light. The club had gay night once a month, and we had hit it. However, though we felt slightly out of place, Madonna was playing in the main room, and, not about to leave the Queen of Pop, we danced it up with fabulous dancers surrounding us well into the night, met some locals, and had a fantastic time.

Although I have dozens of other stories to tell, these few pieces of advi ce must suffice: a) never underestimate the negotiating powers of three older Spanish ladies with sharp umbrellas and no self-reservation during an unexpected train strike. b) Just because the ticket guy at the train station says a ticket will take you where you want to go even though the name of the town is completely different than it is on the map, trust your map. And c) the police do not like it when you 'borrow' street signs at 3 a.m. regardless of the fact that they are lying on the ground clearly unused.

My love for Rome grew with every passing day. The afternoon I left to begin my two-week backpacking trip around Europe and watched Rome get smaller and smaller from the airplane window, tears streamed down my face—a rarity for me. My Roman experience was fading into clouds, and I knew that my life would never be the same. The places I saw, the friends I made, and the memories we created had changed me forever.

This is an excerpt from my final mass email:

The time has come to say goodbye to Roma, leaving her to fend for herself with the gazillion tourists that have now invaded the city. My plane for Dublin leaves in four hours, and I can't believe this is all over. There's so much I'll miss (like being able to talk about people in front of their faces and them not understanding a word). For the rest of my life, Rome will be like home in many ways.

I know this experience has changed me and made me a better person but I'm not sure how exactly. I know that I have confidence in myself to do things I never would have imagined doing before I began this journey. I respect people more now because I know what it is like to be the outsider. And I have no doubt that I have also changed in ways I cannot possibly know yet and only by returning home will I realize them. But of all the things I've learned here, I think what I will take away with me above all else is this: take advantage of opportunities when they arise and don't put them off until later because you may never get the same chance again.

So that is my message to you all too, for what it's worth. You never know when you're making a memory.

The 147th Bloomsburg Fair comes to a close after week of fun

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

Originally only a small-scale agricultural fair, the annual eight-day Bloomsburg Fair has grown into one of central Pennsylvania's most loved events since 1855. Even the rainy weather could not discourage the crowds, as approximately 646,000 residents from across Pennsylvania came to enjoy the week of festivities.

Boasting hundreds of crafts and food stands, agricultural exhibits, daily animal shows, horse racing and late night performers; the fair was an event not to be missed.

After fighting others for scarce parking spots, visitors were finally rewarded upon pushing through the crowded entrance gates of the fair.

Instantly visitors were teased by the sweet smell of freshly spun cotton candy, country grown apples dipped in caramel and freshly baked funnel cake. Undoubtedly, anyone could easily have gotten lost amongst the hundreds of vender stands where children were excitedly running about, holding fluorescent colored stuffed animals that hung as prizes all over the fair.

While some came to play a game of darts and win a prize, most visitors were crowded around the many craft stands located through out the fair. Just about anything and everything was sold at these small stands where local atrisans displayed their handcrafted baskets, knit sweaters, and furniture.

Some visitors took a rest and sat down to watch a cooking demonstration on baking zucchini and eggplant. Many gathered and waited in line to have a tour of "America's peanut factory."

Fair food, of course, was another attraction. Homemade fudge, soft pretzels, curly fries and fried dough, were among the most popular food items. By dinnertime families crowded the booths and picnic benches, enjoying home style cooking.

Amidst the chaos of food and games, prized farm animals contentedly sat in their stalls as hundreds of visitors passed by to gawk at the animals. For instance, Bubba, an enormous 2600 lb ox, sat on the floor of his stall in freshly laid hay, slowly chewing his cud. Children screamed and even adults gasped at the enormity of the animal.

Horses, goats, pigs, cows and sheep were amongst the other thousands of animals brought to the show to be sold, traded or placed in competition. Patient visitors could also wait in line to pet some of the more loveable animals.

In addition to these activities, the fair offered many other forms of entertainment. At the far end of the fair, for example, the Reithoffer's Carnival was underway. Dozen of rides were crowded with teenagers. The 150-foot-high Ferris wheel was a favorite.

Throughout the day and into the night, regional and local bands performed along with other entertainers. The arena hosted daily shows and races, such as "The Oldest Dog show in the USA," and an auto demolition derby. On two nights of the week, visitors gathered to watch a breathtaking fire works spectacle.

Even those visitors who were less interested in all the games, food and crafts, found a way to enjoy themselves. Many came simply to enjoy the fantastic weekend weather or to watch the crowds and see the excited smiles on all the children's faces.

Although the fair has come to a close for this year, it is something to look forward to next year when fair week officially begins the third Monday after Labor Day. Undoubtedly, there will be a plethora of attractions to interest everyone, and the fair offers a glimpse into the lifesiyle and people of central Pennsylvania and a tradition that is over a century old.

Crowds enjoyed the many activities and events available at the fair. The food was the main event in the minds of most. Also there were numerous livestock exhibitions, Styx, The Doobie Brothers, a demolition derby and other live shows.

Christy's packs Rooke Chapel

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Christy's sold out last weekend when relatives and friends filled Rooke Chapel for the concert that has become a University tradition.

Two Past Midnight, The Silhouettes, and The Bison Chips, the University's three a cappella groups, confirmed their reputations of being solid and talented performers. For these groups, Christy's is the big opening event of the season.

"Christy's is one of the biggest shows that we perform," said Jordan Rice '02, a member of the Bison Chips.

The crowd of fans that arrived to support the singers has also become common. Ever since the annual concert moved to Rooke Chapel, the show has sold out both nights. "What makes the show is the fans," said Adam Hargus '03, a member of Two Past Midnight. "We love entertaining."

What does the crowd find so captivating? Perhaps it's the humor that the groups incorporate, or maybe the older songs that stir up memories or even the sound of the newer, edgier songs. The first and foremost attraction for the crowd is the voices of the members. The incredible harmonies and gorgeous tones are pleasant to the ear.

"This is our fourth year coming and we enjoy it every time," said Hoyte Decker, father of Catherine Decker '02.

Classic pieces such as the Bison Chips' "Ave Maria," country songs like the Silhouettes' "Cowboy Take Me Away" and Two Past's pop hit "Magic Carpet Ride" add variety and fun to the show.

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian
The Bison Chips are joined by alumni during Friday's Christy's performance Rooke Chapel.

Other amusing elements of the concert included a spoof on SNL's Spartan cheerleaders and the "dressed up" Bison Chips.

"I loved wearing the cow costume," said Brian Bialas '05, a new member of the Bison Chips. Members from the groups agree that being involved in a cappella is a great way to spend free time.

"We get to spend lots of time together," Rice said. "It's like being with your best friends all of the time."

Allison Davies '04, a new member of the Silhouettes, also expressed the closeness of the girls in her group.

"I was welcomed with open arms," she said. "I love all the girls."

A contributing factor to this group closeness was the bonding that occurred during the recording of their new albums, which all three groups released last spring. The Bison Chips recorded Party in Your Pants, the Silhouettes cut Fashionably Late and Two Past Midnight released Gender Gap. Each CD has a good mixture of old and new, and includes favorite performers from the previous class.

The next a capella event will be during Homecoming weekend, when the Bison Chips, along with their alumni, celebrate their 25th Anniversary in the Weis Center.

Concerto concert showcases student musicians

Three solo performances impress crowd

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

The Weis Center began the year with a Concerto Concert featuring the Bucknell University Orchestra last Friday. The evening started with three solo performances by members of the senior class, who were accompanied by the University orchestra.

Matthew Hoy '02 performed the first piece, The Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra by Edouard Lalo.

"This piece was written in 1874 while Lalo was in Paris, France," Hoy said. "It was first performed by the famous violinist Pablo de Sarasate, and is Lalo's most famous work."

Hoy values this piece for its challenge and because it allows personal expression.

"I enjoy this piece because it is both musically and technically demanding," he said. "There are moments in the piece where I get to show the virtuostic side of violin playing, and there are also times when I get to ease back and play a nice lyrical, romantic theme."

The enchanting Spanish flavor of the piece was a definite winner as the audience gave a standing ovation at the conclusion of his performance.

"I wanted to make sure that the Spanish flavor of the piece really came through to the audience, especially through the recurring triplet rhythms and the beautiful lyrical melodies," Hoy said.

The second work was also a piece for violin and orchestra. Andrew Clugston '02 performed Romance No. 2 in F Major for Violin and Orchestra, composed by Ludwig van Beethoven. Clugston selected the Romance No. 2 in F Major for its pathetic nature and its ability to represent the Romantic era.

"Beethoven's Romance No. 2 in F Major, Op. 50 is, to me, one of the most moving works in the violinist's repertoire," Clugston said. "In my view, this Romance is very beautiful, and is a stirring testimony to the profound and mysterious nature of love."

The third soloist, Curtis Olson '02, performed The Concerto in E-flat Major for Trumpet and Orchestra by Franz Joseph Haydn. Written during the end of the composer's career, Olson treasures the energy and beauty in this piece.

"I chose the piece because it is absolutely standard in the repertoire and should be performed by all students of the instrument," Olson said. "I also love the beauty of the music. It is exciting and energetic while maintaining grace and subtlety."

Conductor Christopher Para led the entire orchestra in the performance of the grand finale, Four Cornish Dances for Orchestra by Malcolm Arnold.

In general, the entire University enjoyed the concert. Jason Do Yung Kim '04 loved seeing his fellow students perform.

"I really enjoyed listening to our orchestra," Kim said. "It was great just to see the talent level of my peers, and to see some of my friends on stage for the first time."

Richard Ellis, professor of biology, especially enjoyed the Beethoven Romance.

"The Beethoven is wonderfully emotionally evocative and was, I thought, very well played by the soloist," Ellis said. "I thought the whole orchestra did a good job, particularly given that they have rehearsed together for less than a month."

Members of the orchestra shared the audience's enthusiasm for the evening's performance. Principal cellist Andrew Frey '05 praised the performance.

"My personal favorite piece from the concert was Matt Hoy's Symphonie Espagnole," Frey said. "I really thought that he did a terrific job with it, and the piece in general is full of passion and energy, which makes it that much more fun to play."

The evening truly was a showcase of the musical talent that thrives at the University.

Ben Folds solo CD lives up to its name

By Chad Flood
Staff Writer

Last year, when a friend said Ben Folds Five had broken up, I didn't give it a second thought and dismissed it as a rumor. Right, I thought—and I suppose the stories about Dave Matthews having cancer and Marilyn Manson being the same guy who played Paul on "The Wonder Years" are also true?

Later that day, as I read the official release about the band's breakup, I didn't know what to say. I personally ranked Ben Folds Five among the most talented musicians on the scene in years.

Unique enough to develop a cult-like following with songs such as "Brick" and "Army," Ben Folds Five performed live shows that could only be described as magical. To call them versatile was an understatement—these guys defined music.

When Ben Folds released a solo album, skepticism followed. Would the musical prowess evident in his previous work resound as clearly? Was he going to do the entire album solo? My questions were favorably answered with the release of Rockin' the Suburbs.

Much of the album reflects the familiar and popular sounds of Ben Folds Five. In "Fired," heavy piano chords and a jazz drumbeat complete a song reminiscent of Ben Fold Five's first two albums. The song "Gone" could easily be another radio hit, with a pop-like hook and a short duet with a female singer.

The closing track, "The Luckiest," compares to any of Folds' ballads. The fact that this song mainly consists of a solo performance allows one to hear what Folds can do on the piano without accompaniment.

Much of the album's roots come from the previous work of Ben Folds Five, yet several tracks represent uncharted territory. The album's title track mocks those who feel that musicians who aren't "starving artists" can't create worthwhile music. This song features a heavier rock beat with synthesizers and very little of Folds' trademark piano solos. "Not the Same" contains a slow beat reminiscent of the '80s, the source of much of Folds' influence.

One should consider the difficulty involved in the recording process on this album with Folds performing on all instruments. While similar to David Grohl's method when recording the first Foo Fighters album, one thing about Folds' effort stands out—Grohl's release could not compare to the musical genius of Nirvana; Folds takes his work with Ben Folds Five, and like Spinal Tap, turns it up to 11.

West Branch readings to feature top writers

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

The West Branch Readings, formally a larger event known as the Bucknell Poetry Festival, occurs Sunday, Oct. 7 at 8 p.m. in the Bucknell Hall Auditorium. This is the Second Annual West Branch Reading, an event that showcases the works of two authors recently published in West Branch.

West Branch is the University's national journal of literature, in existence since 1977. Professor of English Paula Closson Buck is the editor of West Branch. This biannual literary magazine, produced at the Stadler Center for Poetry, receives funding from the University and the Pennsylvania Council for the Arts.

Andrew Ciotola, managing editor of West Branch, explains the University's intention of hosting the readings.

"The purpose is to bring up and coming writers to campus and to have [the campus] experience what is going on in the literary world," Ciotola said.

Readings by writers Elizabeth Kirschner and Paul Maliszewski are expected to specifically connect with the University community.

Ciotola describes Kirschner's work as being about "the coming of age in America" and "maturation." She has published Twenty Colors and Postal Routes, both books of poetry. She will be reading selections from her new book, Slow Risen Among the Smoke Trees, to be released in 2002.

"This series of narrative poems trace the evolution of Lily, the main character, from the harsh realities of childhood, through sexual awakening, and into marriage and motherhood," Kirschner said.

She also said the feel of the work likens to a lyric novel. After writing for 25 years, she has "never felt the desire not to do so."

"I am newly compelled, every morning when I sit down to write, by the inherent difficulties and profound pleasures of writing poetry," Kirschner said. "The passion, so to speak, feels inherent, as deeply a part of myself as the capacity to breathe, to be."

Kirschner enjoys reading to audiences.

"It is a very important way of completing the act of writing," she said. "When the poem is received by others, a kind of contract is complete. Ultimately, one writes to be heard."

Maliszewski is an editor for McSweeney's with a style very different from that of Kirschner, writing mainly works of fiction.

"His fiction is humorous in many respects, focusing on irony in a post-modern America," Ciotola said.

The works Maliszewski will be reading were inspired by an interesting experience he had while working at a newspaper, and take the form of letters to the editor. Maliszewski looks forward to coming to the University.

"It's good to meet people, especially since the only living thing that's ever around while I'm writing is my cat," he said.

Maliszewski doesn't remember why he began writing fiction.

"I'm sure it has something to do with reading a lot as a kid," he said. "I just really like imagining characters and telling stories in different voices."

Though not meant as a performance, the readings will certainly hold some entertainment value. It is a free event and refreshments will be served. In addition, all audience members will be entered in a raffle to receive a free two-year subscription to West Branch.

Senior Matt Hoy brings many talents to BU

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

Senior Matthew Hoy is often seen playing his violin in various music scenes on campus. From his talent, one can assume that he has experienced years of training. However, the extent of Hoy's experience may come as a shock to anyone, especially those who have never played an instrument.

"I've been playing the violin since I was three years old," Hoy said. "So it's been a long time."

How did he start at such an early age?

"My parents took me to an open house at a music school," he said. "I saw the other kids playing, so I wanted to play. I never stopped."

Hoy said that part of this dedication was due to the support of his parents.

"My parents kept me going," Hoy said. "There were times when I wanted to stop, but they encouraged me to stick with it. I'm glad they did."

As if years of playing the violin weren't enough, Hoy takes piano lessons at the University and also sings. A Music Education major, Hoy has been a member of the Rooke Chapel Choir and the all-male a capella group, the Bison Chips, since freshman year.

"I'm in charge of the Bison Chips this year, and that's a really good experience," Hoy said. "I get the chance to run the practices and be the dependable one."

This is a big responsibility for any student, and Hoy realizes that his leadership needs to provide a balance for the group.

"I have to find the balance between having fun and getting things done," Hoy said. "We have no advisor, so a lot of this depends on me."

Hoy didn't even know the Bison Chips existed when he chose to attend the University. Other factors influenced his college decision.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Matt Hoy is a multi-talented musician.

"I thought the Weis Center was really nice," Hoy said, laughing. "I also heard the orchestra and the music program were good here, especially since Bucknell is not a music school."

Hoy feels much of the success of the music program results from the music professors at the University, who are supportive and work hard to help the students to improve.

"Dr. Payn is the conductor of the Chapel Choir and he gives me conducting lessons," he said. "He's a cool guy. Everyone joins the choir to sing with him. He gets the best out of everyone."

Hoy also respects the orchestra conductor, Dr. Christopher Para.

"We play some really hard material," Hoy said. "To make it sound good in a short period of time is amazing."

Hoy's professors also have a lot of faith in him and in his abilities.

"Matt is an exceptional talent," said William Payn, professor of music. "His musical sense is inborn. He doesn't have to work at it—he works within it, applying an innate sense of phrase, line and rhythmic complexity to his violin and conducting performance. I have watched him blossom in the University environment and anticipate that he will go on to do the same after leaving University."

Payn also believes that Hoy has the necessary spirit musicians must possess.

"Matt is sincere and honest in his music-making," Payn said. "In performance he focuses, and is not absorbed by self-enhancement, but rather by creating sounds and a particular mood that will touch the listener's heart and soul."

Para, associate professor of music, respects Hoy's determination as he strives to reach his goals.

"Matt is a fine musician and a wonderful person," Para said. "Throughout his four years at the University he has distinguished himself by his consistent hard work and dedication. I'm impressed by his willingness to learn as much as he can in preparation for his career as a music educator. I have no doubt that he will be an excellent teacher and role model."

Hoy has some plans for the future as he contemplates graduate school and a career in conducting.

"I'd like to go to grad school eventually, although I would like to do some traveling first," he said. "Ideally, I would like to conduct an orchestra someday."

For the moment, Hoy continues preparing for the rest of his senior year. He will continue performing in orchestra concerts and singing with the Bison Chips and the Rooke Chapel Choir. He also has a senior recital in the spring. Although busy, he plans on enjoying the rest of his senior year.

"I just want to get as much as I can out of the school and the people before I leave," he said. "I want to have a good time. You never get to have this experience again, so I want to try to make the most of it."

Janet Reno addresses national issues

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

Tackling a broad range of issues that ran from crime and punishment to old-fashioned family values, Janet Reno spoke to the campus community on Tuesday night. University President Steffen Rogers and Chairwoman of the Lectureship Committee Sarah Endyke '02 gave a brief introduction of Janet Reno that included a clip of Reno's cameo appearance on "Saturday Night Live."

After the laughter died down in the crowded Weis Center, the former attorney general of the United States took a moment to share her thoughts on the University.

"I have been so impressed with Bucknell today ... It is a very special place," Reno said.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, Reno used the first part of her speech to address fear and the nation's reaction to the trying circumstances it now faces. She spoke of the many times that America has faced a seemingly perilous situation, only to respond with courage, unity and resolution.

"You don't back down, you move ahead, and America will be stronger for it."

As former attorney general, Reno was able to offer a unique perspective on terrorism and the quest to bring the perpetrators to justice.

"We should constantly be justice according to our laws," Reno said.

In a press conference earlier in the day, Reno commented that she still considers terrorism to be a criminal matter, although there are times when military force is required. Reno was also quick to point out that Americans should closely guard their personal freedoms and not allow them to be sacrificed for the purpose of increased safety.

Reno then transitioned into a discussion on the domestic challenges currently facing America. Like many, she feels that the nation and government should use the current level of unity to address some problems that were present even before the terrorist attacks.

First on her list: education.

Reno lectured about the importance of the first three years of life, and how the country needs to develop a system that allows every child to develop a conscience, as well as a love of learning during those years. However, none of this will serve any purpose if the child arrives at kindergarten to find an unqualified, underpaid teacher.

"A teacher is the most remarkable person there is when they do it right," Reno said.

According to Reno, the importance of having qualified, enthusiastic teachers is immeasurable, and one of the ways to attract these people is to make teaching financially feasible.

University selects Homecoming Hosts

By Peter Van Emburgh
Editor-in-Chief

Pete Van Emburgh—The Bucknellian
The Homecoming Hosts/Hostesses are: Top Row (L-R): Chris Dinkelmeyer, Bryan Bailey, Nik Sneshkoff; Middle Row: Sarah Rives, Adam Ackley, Brandi Herman; Bottom Row: Katy Zachry, Sofia Abraham.

This year's group of Homecoming Hosts/Hostesses reflects a diversity of cultures, commitment to social service and academic and athletic excellence. Faculty, staff and registered campus organizations nominated talented seniors earlier this fall to represent the University during Homecoming celebrations. The group carries on a 30-year tradition at the University.

The hosts are seniors Sofia Abraham, Adam Ackley, Bryan Bailey, Chris Dinkelmeyer, Brandi Herman, Sarah Rives, Nikolaus T. Sneshkoff and Katy Zachry.

"This year's hosts and hostesses are very well-rounded," said Kristin Stetler, assistant director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers. "Their activities and interests have taken them places and exposed them to things some students can only imagine—and they do it all while balancing their workload and leadership on campus."

After the students are nominated, a screening committee studies nominations and narrows the field to 12 men and 12 women to be on the final voting ballot. Finally, the entire student body votes to select the four hosts and four hostesses.

"Many of the students who were nominated seemed excited that their peers or the faculty and staff thought enough of them to send their name in. Some of the finalists have said what an honor it is to be chosen-they're thrilled to carry out this role," Stetler said.

The Hosts and Hostesses will represent the Class of 2002 during Homecoming Weekend and beyond. On Friday, Oct. 19, they will be honored by the Alumni Association Board of Directors.

On Saturday, Oct. 20, they will attend the Bucknell Children's Festival in Downtown Lewisburg and then will be honored during halftime of the football game versus Georgetown University.

After graduation, these eight seniors will remain strong representatives of their class for reunion planning.

Merit-based aid debate resurfaces

The administration considers the benefits of merit-based aid at the University, writes News Editor Natalie Casp

After a lengthy deliberation over the future of merit-based aid last year, the University has begun taking numerous steps to reexamine its policy and assess how merit-based aid might factor into Vision 2010. According to several administrators, the University must reconsider the policy for a variety of reasons, including a recent gift by Robert Rooke for an academic scholarship, the Patriot League's decision to allow merit-based scholarships and competition with other elite universities that presently offer merit-based scholarships.

Currently, the University offers two forms of need-based aid to help students and enroll prospective students: traditional and preferential aid. According to Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, the University typically offers financial aid packages with grant (scholarship), loan and work components, based on standard calculations of need developed by the College Scholarship Service. Preferential aid, Pollock says, rewards exceptionally talented students who also demonstrate financial need by replacing some of their loan assistance with additional grant funding.

Proponents of merit-based aid, a system rewarding particular achievements or abilities whether or not a student has formally determined financial need, suggest that a merit-based program will bring increasingly talented

The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) completed its voter registration drive on Tuesday, gathering approximately 400 new Borough of Lewisburg student voters.

The majority of the 400 students who registered are residents of Ward Three, the ward most heavily populated by students living downtown, but some downhill fraternity residents registered in Ward Two.

According to BSG President Nate Sorber '02, students are already talking about the election.

"We just sent the registration forms on Tuesday. There is already a buzz on campus and a lot of people are excited," Sorber said.

According to BSG Vice President of Operations Jen Collier '03, BSG's next step is educating student voters and making sure students are aware of the issues before the Nov. 6 election.

Sorber agrees with Collier.

"BSG has kind of a tricky role in the next month. We have to concentrate in making sure that everyone is informed about voter registration, who the candidates are and where and when the voting is taking place," Sorber said.

Because the students who are running are not on the ballot, BSG will hand out labels with the candidates' names on Election Day. The voters will then have to put the label in a slot in the machine to cast their vote.

According to Sorber, the two most important things in making this election a success are voter turnout and making sure that voters understand the write-in process.

"BSG will make sure that every student who registered is very educated on how to cast the ballot for a write-in candidate," Sorber said.

Candidates for the positions have not been officially announced, but according to Sorber, there are two positions open in Ward Three. One is a two-year position that has not yet expired and the other is a four-year position.

"BSG will not endorse a candidate," Sorber said. "The campaigning is on the shoulders of the candidates."

Because of the large percentage of the student population living in Ward Three, Sorber does not see a problem with a student winning the election.

"As far as Ward Three goes, I think we are politically in control of the Ward. We may have doubled the number of registered voters in the Ward," Sorber said. "I'm very confident that qualified student-candidates who wish to run won't have any major problems winning."

Graduate Student Matt Laszewski '00 M'02 believes that if a student is elected, he/she will be able to influence the town's decisions.

"Certainly it will force the rest of the town council to regard the students as residents rather than problems. Hopefully this will result in the town dealing with students in a more rational manner," Laszewski said. "Along those lines, I'd hope that a student on the council would be able to moderate the rules and regulations coming out of the council by not only making them a little more fair, but making sure that they are written in such a way as to be enforced fairly, and across the board."

Not all students believe that a student will help downtown problems.

"I currently live in a dorm under Bucknell rules. Right now, downtown politics don't matter that much to me. The people have lived here for a long time and they know all of our complaints. I don't know how much influence a student would have," Khanh Le '03 said. "I don't think it could hurt to have a student elected, but some kind of downtown conflict is inevitable."

The voting will take place on Nov. 6. Students who are registered in Ward Two will vote at the Courthouse and students who are registered to vote in Ward Three will vote at Lewisburg High School.

Fraternities adjust to late meal plan conversion

By Jason Rubinstein

After several weeks of delays, University Dining Service will be converting new fraternity members' meal plans to their respective houses on Oct. 22. The setback resulted in confusion in many houses and in some cases created frustration with financial difficulties.

Students who decide to rush in the fall semester have traditionally been able to eat at their new fraternity houses worry-free after accepting a bid. This time period is essential for fraternity brothers to get to know their new members.

"We encourage them to come, as meals are a great way for new members to become more familiar with the older brothers and various aspects of the house," said Beau Standish '02, president of Delta Upsilon (DU).

The complications of meal plan conversions began early in the 2001 spring semester. Parents of new members would often call Dining Services and complain about meal plan bills, which had originated from the fraternities. Dining Service found it difficult to deal with this situation since it was a Greek matter and unrelated to them. Tim Tenon, general manager of University Dining Service and a major player in the decision-making process, was not expecting a conversion for the 2001 fall semester.

"It is not my decision to do or not to do a conversion. It was my understanding all throughout rush, however, that this fall there would be no conversion," Tenon said.

Because Dining Service had no intention to convert meal plans, their budget was set up accordingly. Similarly, fraternities planned budgets based on meal conversions in past years. The result was problems for both Dining Services and fraternities.

The administration explained the delays to the fraternities as a lack of communication.

"We were told that there was a breakdown in communication where both Dining Services and fraternities thought they were going to get the money," said Garrik Sturges '02, president of Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE).

Seniors help fund Memorial Grove

The Class of 2002 will launch its gift drive on Oct. 21

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The Annual Senior Gift Drive, the yearly fund-raiser of each senior class which commences with a dinner on Oct. 21, will help fund a Memorial Grove to be constructed behind Rooke Chapel in memory of victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The landscaped grove will serve as the University's memorial to Bucknellians lost in the tragic events of Sept. 11, 2001. The grove will be comprised of a memorial honoring those lost in the recent terrorist attacks as well as a specific engraved monument within the grove from the Class of 2002. Plans also include memorials from families or friends of deceased alumni who were not involved in the Sept. 11 events.

"As the Executive Committee, we realized that donating money to the University seemed almost trivial in the face of the trauma our country is facing," Executive Committee member Sarah Antoncich '02 said. "We wanted to provide an opportunity for people to participate in the Senior Gift Drive but still feel as if they were doing something worthwhile with their money." said

The decision came from the Gift Drive's Executive Committee when deciding on the Class of 2002's gift.

"In so many ways, the events of that day are defining our senior year. There is so much uncertainty among the seniors as to how each of our futures will be affected. We are so pleased to offer this permanent, physical demonstration of support for all those affected by the attacks," said Executive Committee Member Lindsay MacDonald '02.

The physical idea of the grove may give seniors more incentive to give.

"The grove will be a permanent and visible gift to the University that people can enjoy forever. The goal of the drive is to ensure that each senior has a chance to leave something special behind as a token of their appreciation to the University," Executive Committee Member Dan Kaufman '02 said.

The Executive Committee is already reporting positive feedback from students and alumni alike. As of Tuesday, without the Drive having officially begun, 72 members of the Class of 2002 made contributions totaling $2,526.

Originally the goal was 500 gifts, but since Sept. 11, the Executive Committee redefined its goal to 90 percent participation.

"Since the name of the Class of 2002 will be displayed in the grove, we would like the gift to be from a substantial majority of the class," said MaryAnn Sigler '89, manager of young alumni programs for the University.

The Memorial, according to the Executive Committee, is more than just a grove at Bucknell; another purpose is to improve the relations with the extended campus community.

"[The horrific events of Sept. 11] will be forever branded in the collective memory of the Class of 2002. But more than that, the grove will serve as a place of peace, recognition, and reflection for not only students, but staff, faculty, alumni and members of the Lewisburg community," Sigler said

The Committee also considered the ideas of a scholarship as well as donating the senior gift to another organization.

"Transferring money from the University to another non-profit organization (such as the Red Cross) was logistically impossible, so we decided to create something on campus that will serve as a place of remembrance for Bucknellians in the years to come," Antoncich said.

According to the office of Annual and Special Gifts, the idea of a memorial is not new to the University, however because of the anticipated success of the Senior Gift Drive, the project will finally achieve funding.

"In the past there have been families and others who have wanted to donate some physical memorial in honor of a Bucknell relative or friend," Sigler said. "Instead of planting a tree and placing a plaque in a random area of campus, the idea of an area dedicated to memorializing Bucknellians past was introduced."

This year's Gift Drive is different than in previous years, where the focus has been on the Annual Fund.

"In its earliest incarnation, the Senior Gift Drive was a rather unorganized effort that usually resulted in a physical gift to the University. Seniors make gifts to any areas of the university that they wish, which is quite different than many other schools. Although seniors may still give to any annual fund, this year's senior class is making the memorial grove a priority," Sigler said.

Each year the Senior Gift Drive raises money as a way of thanking the University for his or her education and time spent over the past four years. This 35 year tradition kicks-off with a dinner on Sunday, Oct. 21 to mark the campaign's official beginning. The dinner will be held in the Terrace Room to celebrate both the drive as well as those seniors who have volunteered to help with the effort. "I could not be more impressed with the students on the Senior Gift Drive Executive Committee. They have taken complete ownership of the drive and the memorial effort," said Sigler.

Members of the Class of 2002 can make gifts by check, cash, credit card or on-line at bucknell.edu/gifts.

University remembers alumni and family

Our campus has been touched in so many ways by the tragic events of Sept.11, 2001. So many of us had friends, neighbors or family touched by the tragedy. Our faculty, students, staff, alumni and parents have all been affected. We will never forget that day, nor those we lost.

In honor of all those lost, I would like to share thoughts on immediate family members and alumni who will no longer grace our campus, but will always be part of the Bucknell family.

Joseph John Berry P'96 , P'03

Joe Berry, a native New Yorker, received his B.A. degree math and economics from Queens College in 1969 and an MBA from St. John's in 1972. Joe and his wife Evelyn, have three children, including Todd, Joseph '96 and Kimberly '03.

He taught high school in Queens, N.Y. before joining the sales group of Keefe, Bruyette & Woods in 1972. Joe worked his way up through the ranks to become chairman and co-CEO of Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, Inc., where he was considered a pillar of the firm. He was recently honored by Irish America magazine as one of the Top 50 Irishman on Wall Street.

A memorial service was held September 21st in Saddle River, N.J.

Keith Eugene Coleman '90 (His family still considers him missing.)

Keith graduated from Lawrenceville Academy and came to Lewisburg from New Jersey. At Bucknell, he was a Vice President of Sigma Chi, Secretary of the Interfraternity Council, and an active member the Bucknell Student Government, where he served on the University Committee on Planning and Budget.

He graduated from Bucknell in 1990 with a degree in economics and in 1993 married, Elodie Ferrante Coleman, a fellow member of the Class of 1990 and a member of Pi Beta Phi sorority. They lived in London until 2000, during which time they traveled widely throughout Europe. They have two children, a son Vaughn, age 2 and a daughter Neva, born in May of this year.

His parents are Neil and Jean Coleman. Keith worked for Cantor Fitzgerald as did his brother Scott, Colgate Class of 1994, also still missing in the tragedy of Sept. 11.

Bradley James Fetchet '99

Brad came to Bucknell from New Canaan, Conn., and is the brother of Wesley Fetchet, Class of 2004. At Bucknell, Brad played lacrosse and was a member of Kappa Delta Rho fraternity.

He graduated from Bucknell in 1999 with a degree in economics and computer science and took a job with the investment banking firm of Keefe, Bruyette & Woods

Brad recently returned from 10-day trip to Italy with his girlfriend Brooke Stengle '98. Besides his brother, Wes, Brad is survived by his parents Mary and Frank Fetchet and his brother, Christopher, at home.

A memorial service was held last Friday at St. Aloysius Catholic Church in New Canaan.

Mark Ryan McGinly '97

Mark came to Bucknell from Vienna, Va. At Bucknell, he was active in Kappa Delta Rho and served as captain of the golf team, as he had in high school.

After graduating from Bucknell with a degree in business administration, Mark joined Carr Futures, and worked at the World Trade Center.

A memorial service was held for Mark on Saturday, Sept. 22, at St. Mark's Catholic Church in Vienna, Va. His parents, William and Patricia McGinley of Vienna, Va., his brother Sean of Los Angeles and brother Drew on active duty in the U.S. Navy, survive Mark.

Bonnie Jean Shihadeh Smithwick '68

Bonnie came to Bucknell from Villanova, Pa. She sang in the Chapel Choir, was a varsity cheerleader, homecoming court member and was active in Delta Delta Delta sorority. She is remembered by her classmates for her brilliant, dazzling smile and her constantly positive, upbeat approach to life.

Bonnie graduated from Bucknell in 1968 with a bachelor's degree in mathematics, and embarked on a career with IBM that carried her through many parts of the company. While at IBM, she earned her MBA in finance from New York University in 1978. She held a number of finance positions in the city before joining the Fred Alger Management Company as vice president and general manager for their small cap fund in June 2000. She worked in the World Trade Center.

Her husband, T. James Smithwick and two children at home, James, 20 and Katherine, 15 survive Bonnie. A memorial service were held on Saturday, Oct. 6, at the Westhampton Presbyterian Church in Westhampton Beach, N.Y.

University begins VPEM search

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

Any college student can tell that admissions have become much more complicated in recent years. In selecting a new class, schools now take into account far more than applications and transcripts, the traditional domain of the Admissions Office. Instead, factors such as location, economic class and ethnic and religious diversity have come into play—the administrators of a school often have an idea of the makeup of a class before they select the actual students who will be part of it.

In recent years, the University's Admissions Office has been handling most of this part of the enrollment process.

Last year, however, the position of Vice President for Enrollment Management was created to manage admissions, financial aid programs, the Registrar's Office and the University's summer programs.

"The role of enrollment management has become more than just overseeing admissions," said Vice President of Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema, who chairs the committee responsible for filling the new position. "The position involves not only the admissions process but also involves financial aid and retention concerns. It truly deserves its own division."

Currently, Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 fills the position in an interim capacity.

According to Lema, although "everyone in the committee is familiar with the responsibilities that will now be part of the Enrollment Management position," none of them will report directly to the new vice president, preventing the inherent conflict of a group of people choosing their own superior.

According to Lema, the committee hopes to have conducted telephone interviews with "eight or so" applicants within the next two weeks, of whom four to six will be brought to the University for on-campus interviews.

The committee hopes to refer a candidate to University President Steffen Rogers within a month after the second round of interviews.

The committee is made up of Lema, Interim Dean of Engineering James Orbison, Senior Associate Director of Admissions Gayle Pollock, Professor of English Harold Schweizer, Financial Aid Secretary Lucy Huffman and Director of Academic Information Systems at the Registrar's Office Dennis Hopple.

Thanks, Chief Voltron!
Congrats on ONE YEAR as Editor-in-Chief and 24 memorable issues.
We couldn't do it without you.

Taliban leaders believed killed in raids

ATLANTA—U.S. jets continued their bombing runs over Afghanistan early Thursday, one day after a U.S. official told CNN several Taliban leaders were believed to have been killed during the first round of attacks Sunday night.

The Taliban stronghold of Kandahar was subjected to its most intense attack yet Wednesday night, triggering panic among civilians, a CNN source in the city reported.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the United States had received "highly credible" reports that the raids killed some Taliban leaders, including two adult male relatives of Taliban leader Mullah Mohammad Omar.

Bush announces 'most wanted' terrorist list

WASHINGTON—The White House released Wednesday a "most wanted" list of 22 suspected terrorists that includes not only Osama bin Laden and some of his top allies, but those thought responsible for a range of other deadly strikes.

The names include bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri of the Egyptian Islamic Jihad. Al-Zawahiri is thought to be a top adviser to bin Laden and living in Afghanistan. The list also includes several suspects in the U.S. embassy bombings in Africa already named in U.S. court filings.

Bush announced the list formally Wednesday morning at FBI headquarters, accompanied by FBI Director Robert Mueller, Attorney General John Ashcroft and Secretary of State Colin Powell.

"We list their names, we publicize their pictures, we rob them of their secrecy," the president said at the FBI headquarters that has been at the epicenter of the massive investigation into the September 11 suicide hijackings that killed thousands in New York and Washington.

On the list are bin Laden, his two top deputies and several members of his al Qaeda network implicated in earlier bombings overseas against U.S. interests.

Third person shows exposure to anthrax

BOCA RATON, Fla.—A third employee in a tabloid publishing building in Boca Raton, Florida, has tested positive for exposure to the anthrax bacteria, federal and state officials announced Wednesday.

The unidentified 35-year-old woman is being treated and is not expected to develop the potentially deadly disease, Florida Health Secretary John Agwunobi said. One man has died of the disease, and a second tested positive for exposure to it.

The FBI said the investigation is now a criminal probe, but authorities said there is no evidence linking the outbreak to the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Democrats elect Pelosi to be No. 2 House leader

WASHINGTON (AP)—House Democrats elected Rep. Nancy Pelosi on Wednesday to be their No. 2 leader, elevating her to the highest post ever held by a woman in Congress.

Pelosi, a Californian, prevailed over her only rival, Steny Hoyer (R-Md.), in a closed-door, secret-ballot 118-95 vote by the chamber's Democrats. She will officially step into the job of Democratic whip on Jan. 15, when Rep. David Bonior (D-Mich.) relinquishes the post to run for governor.

"This is difficult turf to win on, for anyone, but for a woman breaking ground here it was a tough battle and ... we made history," Pelosi said after the vote. "Now we have to make progress."

Pelosi's victory makes her the House Democrats' chief vote counter and lieutenant to Minority Leader Dick Gephardt (D-Miss.). And it gives her an enormous opportunity to win national prominence, particularly should Gephardt step down to run for the presidency or for some other reason.

Commuter plane crashes in Alaska; 9 reported killed

DILLINGHAM, Alaska (AP)—A commuter plane with 10 people aboard crashed shortly after takeoff Wednesday, killing nine people and injuring one, state police said.

The plane, operated by PenAir, Alaska's biggest commuter airline, went down in calm, clear weather en route to King Salmon, a community about 75 miles away, Alaska State Troopers spokesman Greg Wilkinson said.

The cause of the crash was not immediately known. The National Transportation Safety Board planned to send investigators.

The injured passenger was hospitalized. Her condition was not immediately released.

Dillingham is on Bristol Bay, 330 miles southwest of Anchorage.

119-year-old woman dies in Arkansas

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP)—Mary Thompson, a woman who might have been recognized as the world's oldest person if her birth certificate hadn't been lost in a house fire, has died. She was 119.

Thompson, who had a taste for Crown Royal whiskey and Juicy Fruit gum, became ill Friday and died Monday at a hospital.

She had lived since age 112 at Crestpark Nursing Home in DeWitt.

Social Security records show that she was born on Aug. 2, 1882, in Shelby, Mississippi. Her parents were former slaves.

Thompson lost her birth certificate in a fire about 50 years ago. The Guinness Book of Records says the document would have been necessary to certify her as the world's oldest living person.

Downtown Partnership looks to strengthen town-gown relations

By Michelle Dombeck
Staff Writer

Despite tensions between the Borough of Lewisburg and students, the relationship between the downtown district and the University seems to be improving. Created two years ago after a group effort between the Borough government, downtown businesses and the University, The Lewisburg Downtown Partnership has been the major factor in improving the working relationship between downtown and the University.

As Executive Director of the Lewisburg Downtown Partnership, Linda Sterling works to help both the University and the downtown district understand and work better with each other. Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 also works to help this relationship. In addition to his work on campus, Pollock serves as the President of the Partnership's Board of Directors. Both Pollock and Sterling understand the need for a strong relationship between the University and the downtown district, but have identified some sources of tension.

"Students tell me that when they go downtown, they are not always made to feel welcome," Pollock said.

Not all problems are due to the downtown business owners though.

"Some business owners have criticized Bucknell for keeping people on campus during big weekends," Sterling said.

In an attempt to make students feel more welcome, businesses are trying to accommodate student need and lifestyle. Stores are now open later on Fridays, until 8 p. m. The University is also doing its part to encourage students and visitors to go off-campus.

"When the businesses first raised the issue [of people being kept on campus] in a community meeting in 1999, as the Partnership was being formed, Charlie Pollock, who was then secretary to the University, was on our steering committee as the Bucknell representative," Sterling said. "He heard the criticism, took it back to the University and linked me to David Flinchbaugh at the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers."

Sterling and Director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers David Flinchbaugh '82 worked together on "Lewisburg Loves Bucknell Alumni" and "Lewisburg Loves Bucknell Parents" promotions. This year, it became the Lewisburg Welcomes Parents campaign. There have been some direct results due to their actions.

"The Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers also kept two hours open on Saturday over lunch for each weekend's itinerary and suggested that alumni and parents visit downtown, as opposed to feeding them on campus," Sterling said.

Pollock sees the need to make the University and the Borough part of each other's activities as well.

"Efforts are being made to make Lewisburg a part of the University's big weekends, like Parents' Weekend, Homecoming and Reunion," Pollock said. "Efforts are also being made to make Bucknell a part of the town's big weekends like the Wooly Worm and Spring Arts festivals."

Sterling identified time as another inherent problem between the University and the Borough.

"Time is a natural barrier," Sterling said. "As soon as the students and downtown start to get to know each other, the students are graduating."

With the limited four-year time span, a large effort is being made to involve students early on with the downtown district. The Lewisburg Welcomes Bucknell campaign is the major effort to introduce the first-year students to the downtown community.

"The Borough had never welcomed the first-year students in such an organized way before, and the first-year students enjoyed it," Sterling said.

In addition to introducing students early on to the town, the Lewisburg Downtown Partnership is focusing on any way to increase interaction between the Borough and the University.

"The point of the partnership was to create new relationships," said Sterling. "We're looking for any project that increases interaction."

Some of this interaction comes in the form of student internships.

Over the summer, Louis Palma '03 worked with the Lewisburg Downtown Partnership and explored the relations between the University and the town. During his time working with the Partnership, Palma saw the importance of the University to the downtown district.

"On several occasions we were told by owners that the summer was their hardest time because the students are what really help to keep downtown businesses alive," Palma said. "Local business owners, regardless of the image they have about college kids, seem not to mind them because when school is in session, there are 3500 more customers out there."

A large amount of the tension between Lewisburg and the University is actually completely unrelated to the downtown business district.

"Certainly the biggest source of tension between the Borough and the University is noise and other manifestations of a student presence in the community," Pollock said.

Sterling also feels that the Partnership cannot solve all the issues between the University and the Borough.

"A lot of tension between the Borough and the University is over housing issues," Sterling said. "But this kind of struggle exists in all college towns."

Despite these problems, more positive interaction between Lewisburg and the University seems to be the key.

"We need to find ways to get students downtown and the community up here," Pollock said.

Fraternity meal plan conversations finalized after confusion

rority affairs, was involved in the conversion process, yet was unable to attend the meeting that resulted in the final decision. Baker chose not to comment.

"There was definitely a miscommunication and misunderstanding about how the conversions were going to happen for this fall," Tenon said. "People should have not assumed information was going to be the same as last year without checking first."

The administration feels that they have dealt with the situation in a positive manner, and the only difference from previous years is the slight delay in the switchover date.

"We are doing everything we can to make the conversions a positive experience" Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema said.

Lema, however, was not aware of problems that this delay had caused some of the fraternities.

"It has always been clear that new members should continue to use their meal plan until the conversion is done," Lema said. "I feel empathy for any organization with financial difficulties, and if this is the case with the fraternities, I am sorry."

Tenon echoed Lema's opinion.

"If a student chose to eat at the house during and after rush, it was the house's expense," Tenon said.

Each fraternity house varied greatly in the effects of the conversions.

SAE originally planned to fight the issue, but later realized only the date was different from previous years. The fraternity was upset that declining balance still remained non-transferable as it has never been converted.

"In the future they should make it clear to freshmen not to purchase a declining balance meal plan if they would like to rush sophomore year," Sturges said.

Still, some houses did not feel a great financial impact from the late switchover. Sigma Chi normally waits until after the conversion before new members eat at the house.

"Because we do not let them eat up here until the meal conversion takes place, we haven't experienced as great a loss as some of the other houses on our campus," said Brian Bruzek '02, president of Sigma Chi.

Many houses, however, had to compensate for the extra weeks of meals eaten at the house. As was the case with DU, many fraternities encouraged new members to eat at the house immediately after rush to acquaint themselves with their future brothers.

Sigma Phi Epsilon (Sig Ep) is not yet aware of any complications they may encounter, as the switchover has not yet occurred.

"Dining Service is permitting us to charge new members the difference between our meal plan and what we collect from them, as long as we send a letter to each parent explaining to them the situation," said Kevin Ellis '02, president of Sig Ep.

Kappa Sigma claims that for at least 15 years new members have always eaten at the house after rush because meal times provide an ideal forum for brothers and pledges to get to know each other.

> "There was definitely a miscommunication and misunderstanding about how the conversions were going to happen for this fall.
> —Tim Tenon, GM of Dining Service.

"We will be losing in the neighborhood of as much as five to six thousand dollars because meal conversions will not occur until six weeks after bid day. We are still unsure of what to do," said Craig Laskowski '02, president of Kappa Sigma.

Lema feels that some of the fraternities need to re-examine their books to determine the true source of any financial difficulty or loss. Financial difficulties, according to Lema, are rarely the result of one single event.

"We are a non-profit institution and not going to nickel and dime anyone; the fact that some might imply that we are doing so in this instance is upsetting and would be against our mission," Lema said.

Tenon admits that last year the formulas used for converting block plans were erroneous. They did not account for fixed costs, such as labor, heating and power. The formulas this year are similar to those used in previous years.

"Last year we lived with the error and took the responsibility," Tenon said.

Both Dining Services and each fraternity house have their own plans to make up for lost funds.

Tenon states that Dining Services will be shopping around, but promises the campus that there will be no decrease in quality.

"We will not buy inferior quality products, cut wages or lay off workers," Tenon said.

The fraternities may also need to take cutbacks. Sig Ep, for example, will meet their kitchen budget by charging new members the difference and Kappa Sigma is already experiencing some of the effects of the late conversions.

Tenon assures that these problems can be avoided in the future.

"This has been an unfortunate situation. In the future we want to focus on doing a better job communicating where everyone is on the same page."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Empty fraternity dining rooms became a result of houses attempting to compensate for financial difficulties from late meal plan conversions.

"Something is wrong with a nation that pays football players a six-digit figure and pays teachers what we do."

Reno commented several times during her Tuesday night speech that children must start on a level playing field. This includes giving underprivileged youths and their families access to healthcare, specifically, preventative medicine. No child, Reno said, should have to try and succeed while battling illness for which there is a cure. Reno specifically cited the use of technology and automation to attempt to solve the problems of the current healthcare system. If we can put a man on the moon she said, then we should be able to find solutions to these problems.

As Reno pointed out, none of that will matter if the child is shot dead in the street. Reno explained that America is one of the most violent nations in the world and said that it needs to end. However, she stopped short of offering specific solutions such as gun control, choosing instead to focus on the balance between punishment and rehabilitation. Rather than mandatory sentencing for marginal criminals, Reno said the justice system should focus on rehabilitation to prevent repeat offenders and offer former criminals a fresh start away from the circumstances that caused them trouble in the first place.

During the close of her speech, Reno spelled out the many rewards of entering public service as opposed to the private sector. Although the monetary sacrifices may be great, she conveyed that there was no greater feeling in the world than watching a wrongly convicted man walk out of a court room free, or to be thanked by a mother for whom you secured child support.

When asked if she would do it all again given the chance, Reno stated "It is the greatest opportunity a lawyer could ever have, to use the law the right way."

Much of Reno's speech was dedicated to the problems and challenges facing American society today, yet she manages to remain an optimist. She derives her optimism from her ultimate belief in the American people and from the lessons taught to her by her mother.

"My mom built the house herself. You can do anything you really want to if it's the right thing to do and you put your mind to it ... Let us rebuild America the right way."

The former attorney general seemed most comfortable when discussing her family, especially her mother, even peppering her speech with jokes and comical anecdotes. These tales as well as the touching story of Reno taking her mother on a trip to see the world in her last months exposed to the students a side of Reno many thought not to exist. The conclusion of her speech did not come with some grand statement of policy initiatives or political rhetoric, but rather a simple message to spend time with and appreciate your loved ones.

Students elect diverse group of Homecoming Hosts

Sofia Abraham
Major: Biology
Minor: Biochemistry

Originally from Tanzania, Sofia Abraham has flourished at Bucknell by getting involved in many campus organizations and has held many leadership roles. She has served as secretary and co-president of South Asian Student Association and has also been an international student orientation assistant and resident assistant on campus. Abraham has demonstrated strong dedication to community service activities with the Rockwell Center, Lewisburg Child Care Center and also Evangelical Hospital. Abraham has also served as secretary and then vice-president of Voices of Praise Gospel Choir on campus.

Her taxing commitments have earned her recognition for her contributions to the Bucknell Community. She was awarded RA of the Year last spring and has received certificates of recognition by LEAD and at the 12th and 13th Annual Diversity Celebrations.

"Bucknell has provided me with the college experience that I have always wished to have," Abraham said. "From the leadership experiences to the lifelong friendships and the academic knowledge that I have attained, I am happy to say that Bucknell was the right university for me."

With her well-accomplished Bucknell career coming to a close, Abraham plans to attend Medical School to become a pediatrician.

"I am trying to avoid thinking about leaving Bucknell in seven months. It's going to be very hard to say goodbye to a lot of people on campus," she said.

Adam Ackley
Major: History
Minor: Education

Hailing from just down Route 15, this Selinsgrove Area High School graduate has been actively involved in the Greek system, community service and residential life. Ackley is currently serving as president of Phi Kappa Psi fraternity. Prior to being elected president, Ackley showed dedication to his chapter, serving as both recruitment chair and as sergeant-at-arms in 2000.

Ackley was also a resident assistant for first-year students two straight years in Swartz Hall.

"I am most proud of my two years as a resident assistant," Ackley said. "It was an important and rewarding position that I will always be proud of."

Despite his commitments, Ackley still found time to participate in intramural sports and volunteer for Habitat for Humanity, Big Brothers/Big Sisters, the Lion's Club and T&D's Menagerie.

His summer work experiences have provided a solid foundation for his post-graduate plans to attend law school. The last two summers he interned with the Legal Services Department at the Federal Correctional Complex in Allenwood, Pa.

"I am greatly honored to be one of the eight members to represent my class," he said. "I look forward to representing the seniors and showing people what a great group of seniors that we have at Bucknell. I will always be proud to say that I attended Bucknell and that I am a Bucknellian."

Bryan Bailey
Major: Business Management

"I was honored to be selected as a Homecoming Host. It's a great privilege to be one of eight selected to represent the Class of 2002," Bryan Bailey said.

Leading the Bucknell Men's Basketball squad in scoring average last season and tabbed as a First Team All Patriot League selection, Bailey has succeeded on the hardwood court. This fall, he was picked to serve as the captain for the 2001-2002 season.

Impressively, Bailey first started to turn heads his first year at the University by earning a spot of the Basketball team as a walk-on point guard.

A model student-athlete, Bailey was selected to 2001 Patriot League Winter/Spring Sports Academic Honor Roll. He was also awarded, at the conclusion of the basketball season, the Benton A. Kribb Memorial Award for Outstanding Contribution.

Bailey is also involved with several campus organizations. He currently holds the position of Treasurer of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity, a member of NAACP and Brothers and Sisters Empowered (BASE). He also found time to devote his efforts to the Lewisburg Community Center and in the Greek-organized Downtown Cleanup.

"My four years here at Bucknell has been a great learning experience; not only in the classroom, but personally as well," Bailey said. "It feels as if I just stepped onto the campus, but I'm eager to move on to bigger and better things."

Although offered a job at Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center in the computer-networking department, Bailey plans to continue his successful basketball career after graduation.

Chris Dinkelmeyer
Major: Accounting

A solid six-semester Dean's List member, Chris Dinkelmeyer has truly been able to balance course workload with plenty of extracurricular, volunteer and academic-related activities. While Dinkelmeyer said it is difficult to pinpoint a single experience that he is most proud of, it is of no surprise that he will certainly cherish the activities that he has been a part of.

He has been a teaching assistant for two courses, a member of Mortar Board, Bucknell Student Government Congressman, Parliamentarian, and Internal Affairs Chairman. He's served as both a resident assistant and orientation assistant. Pursuing his hobbies, Chris became captain of the intramural hockey team last year and has participated in the Outing and Climbing Clubs. During the summer after his sophomore year, Dinkelmeyer was a member of the Institute for Leadership in Management and Technology. Chris was also named to Phi Eta Sigma and Alpha Lambda Delta honor fraternities.

"It is hard to find one experience that I am most proud of, or will cherish for years to come," Dinkelmeyer said. "I think that I will most remember the times I spent with friends, whether it was at the library or at the bar."

This past summer, Dinkelmeyer interned with KPMG accounting firm, where he has already signed to work with the company full-time after May.

Dinkelmeyer said, "In short, the years flew by and I just hope that I don't look back and regret not taking an opportunity that was available to me while at Bucknell."

Brandi Herman
Major: Mathematics
Minor: International Relations

"As one of the eight members representing my class, I particularly feel honored ... the Bucknell student body is comprised of some of the most talented, intelligent and amazing people so to be elected by this student body is a great honor," Brandi Herman said.

From Littleton, Co., Herman spent last semester with Semester at Sea, traveling to 10 countries around the world by ship with 650 other students from around the country and world.

A dedicated member of the Greek system, Brandi has been an active member of Delta Gamma sorority. In 1999-2000 Herman was both a delegate to the Panhellenic Council and Community Service Chair of her chapter. She was then elected onto the Panhellenic Executive Council as Recruitment Chair and the Million Penny Project Co-Chair. Herman also oversaw a budget of more than $130,000 as the Vice-President of Finance for Activities and Campus Events and also coordinated Trips for the organization.

In her freshman year, Brandi participated on the Crew team, winning 2nd place at the Bucknell Invitational Erg Sprints. This fall, Herman was selected to become a teaching assistant for Management 101.

"My experience has been a very fulfilling one," Herman said. "Through my four years I have met some of the most amazing people which I am honored to call my friends, peers, professors, advisors and administrators. These people make this school the wonderful place that it is."

Herman plans to pursue a career in Finance, preferably on the East Coast after graduating in May.

Sarah Rives
Major: Biology
Minor: Art

An accomplished senior from Monkton, Md., Sarah Rives considers the Bucknell Brigade to Nicaragua the most rewarding opportunity. As a student leader last March and this upcoming March brigade trip, Sarah's career at Bucknell has reflected her future interests to work in the field of public health and participate in the Peace Corps.

Also a participant with Habitat for Humanity, Rives spent her spring breaks of freshman and sophomore years working with the service organization. She will serve as co-coordinator this year for the trip. Rives is also an active member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, Rooke Chapel Committee and has been an assistant of the Bucknell/Samek Art Gallery for the past year.

Sarah is looking forward to being a representative of her class as a Homecoming Hostess.

"I have always loved getting to know adults on campus and meeting new people who are closely involved with Bucknell, but who students don't usually see. I look forward to walking around campus during Homecoming Weekend and feeling like we've made a huge mark here," Rives said.

Rives was extremely honored to be selected to be a Homecoming Hostess this year and hopes to represent all constituencies of her class.

"There are a lot of people on campus doing amazing things who don't get recognition-I just hope that I represent them enough."

Rives would like to earn her master's in public health through the master's international program, then participate in the Peace Corps before returning to receive her degree.

Nikolaus T. Sneshkoff
Major: Physics
Minor: Biochemistry

"If you ask what is the good of education in general, the answer is easy; that education makes good men, and that good men act nobly." Plato's statement is fundamental to the life of Nik Sneshkoff.

The pre-med senior is the recipient of the Presidential Award for Distinguished Academic Achievement, for 1999 and 2000, given to those who possess a 3.90 GPA or higher. Sneshkoff is a proud member of Two Past Midnight, Phi Kappa Psi fraternity as the Community Service and Philanthropy Committee Chair. He also serves as the secretary of the Concert Chorale and is a resident assistant.

"Ever since freshmen year, I've known that I've wanted to [be selected as a] Homecoming Host and when it finally came true, I had an overwhelming sense of joy and pride in Bucknell," Sneshkoff said.

Despite his many campus involvements, Sneshkoff has much pride in being an Admissions intern.

He said, "I am really proud to be an intern at the admissions office. Having a say as to who gets into Bucknell is really cool and invigorating."

Nik has credited his Bucknell academic experiences to fostering his personal growth.

"I think the best part of Bucknell is not the academic education that it has provided me; rather, the social maturation and strong communication skills it has provided," Sneshkoff said. The foundation of his Bucknell education will surely suit him well in Medical school.

Katy Zachry
Major: Geography
Minor: Religion

A senior with a wide-range of activities throughout campus life, Katy Zachry hopes to utilize these skills and experiences to propel her into the broadcast journalism field. Hailing from Washington Crossing, Pa., Zachry adjusted quickly to the University. As a member of Best Buddies, Activities and Campus Events and Community Judicial Board, student calling, bison abroad and the Student Lectureship Committee, Zachry got plenty of experience working closely with University officials. Zachry is also a proud member of Alpha Chi Omega sorority, where she served as Philanthropy Co-Chair last year.

Katy was fortunate to have the opportunity to intern at Key News, a London news station, while she was studying-abroad in England. Here she learned how to coordinate live interviews, locate guests for news segments as well as work on her interviewing technique. Also helping provide a foundation for her future career path is her work with The Bucknellian, where she is an active writer for the Features Section.

Despite her talent and experience, Zachry was surprised to learn she was selected as one of the four hostesses.

"I was shocked when I found out-I am excited to work with the other hosts and hostesses, and I am grateful for this honor," Zachry said.

After graduation, Zachry will pursue her passion in being a broadcast journalist. She hopes to get an on-air job for a station in a small market and eventually be ready to take on a larger market.

Merit-based financial aid reexamined

students to the University.

Now, as Vision 2010 begins to take shape, the University is considering implementing a long-term merit-based aid program in addition to the traditional and preferential need-based programs for its outstanding academic and athletic students.

Academic Elements

Citing statistics from the Office of Admissions, Pollock contends that the presence of merit-based aid will help the University retain highly qualified prospective students.

"This year, we had 143 admitted students who would have qualified for one of our academic preferential scholarships had they demonstrated financial need. But, they had no financial need and we couldn't offer them scholarships; only 10 enrolled," Pollock said. "Obviously, we're losing many top students. And we're losing some of them to other institutions who offer merit-aid"

Dean of Admissions Mark Davies '74 says the University's current lack of merit aid offerings places it in shrinking small group of schools.

"To be able to present packages that some students currently do not qualify for would hopefully draw certain types of candidates to us that might otherwise elect to go somewhere else," Davies said. "The University of Richmond, Lehigh University, Lafayette College, Villanova, Vanderbilt, Wake Forest University and Duke University are in our direct competition and use merit aid extensively. In the Patriot League, Colgate and Bucknell are the only schools that do not and we know that similar discussions are occurring on the campus of Colgate."

University President ,Steffen Rogers attributes the increase in competition, and thus the necessity of merit-based aid, to a change within the market of higher education.

"Merit-aid is becoming more essential because the world has changed; the competitive environment five years ago, let alone 10, was completely different," Rogers said. "We as a university have moved up nationally into a much, much more competitive field. The students are defining the competition. We have to be able to compete on the financial aid level, just as we're trying to compete on other fronts-faculty, facilities, etc.

Athletic Aspects

The greatest urgency in implementing a merit-based aid program, according to Pollock, is probably present in athletics. Other Patriot League schools have awarded merit-based aid for several years now in basketball, though athletes of all sports are now eligible.

"By implementing merit aid, we'd like to target students with special talents, like the performing arts, as well as top scholars and students who will add to our diversity. And athletics, which falls under the special talents category."

Rogers contends that athletics will not overshadow academic merit in this debate.

"Athletics is a part of the package, but it's not the driving force," Rogers said. "We need to look at merit aid across the board, not just in athletics."

Supporting Diversity

Professor of Biology Gary Sojka feels that implementing merit-based aid will increase both the University's competitiveness and diversity.

"Almost everyone else has gone to merit aid and that means that we are at a great disadvantage in recruiting and supporting middle class students with characteristics that make them appealing to us," Sojka said. "Minorities, musicians, writers, academic stars, athletes, actors, artists, etc. are getting merit awards at most other places. If the students have great financial need we can match those offers with our need program. If the students are from truly megarich families financial issues probably are not that important, but for the vast majority of potential students, our present program may put us at a disadvantage."

Davies agrees, saying one of the purposes of implementing merit-based aid is to help enhance diversity on campus.

"I think merit aid can help increase diversity in many ways including ethnic, geographic, religious and special talent backgrounds," Davies said. "If we had some monies to target specific groups, we could enhance representation of those groups on campus."

Money Matters

Skeptics of the possible merit-based aid program fundamentally disagree with such a program and fear that the two current forms of aid-need-based and preferential-will suffer financially as a result of introducing merit-based aid.

"In principle, I think it's a bad idea to be spending University financial aid funds on people who don't need it," Professor of Political Science John Peeler said. "Such aid must be in addition to present need-based aid. It should not come at the expense of aiding students with real need."

Pollock recognizes Peeler's hesitancy but reassures agnostics that current need-based monies will not be adversely affected.

"People's greatest fear is that somehow this will diminish our commitment to need-based aid," Pollock said. "If Bucknell were to implement a program of merit aid, it would be integrated with need-based aid in a complimentary, strategic fashion. But we would keep them separate financially and not take money from the need-based aid program in order to fund merit aid. Strategically, we need them to be integrated, but financially, we need them to be absolutely separated."

Pollock recognized other possible concerns as well.

"I think another fear is that merit aid will use up new gift money that could be spent on something else of value," Pollock said. "But we think there are donors out there who might be interested in merit aid who might not be interested in our other needs."

Rogers understands these concerns, but says that the University will carefully examine every angle of merit aid, from seeking donors to awarding funds.

"We need to look at areas where we might use merit aid as a management tool. We also have to work with the Board of Trustees to get their good counsel on how and if we want to use merit aid," Rogers said. "The University Council will be the steering committee for shepherding merit aid through the planning process and we will soon begin assigning sub-committees to do just that."

Specific gifts

Understanding the complexities of the issue, Ben Marsh, professor of geography and chair of the committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, questions the logistics of awarding merit-based aid.

"Enormous planning would be needed before we get into merit aid," Marsh said. "How do we allocate the aid between our different goals — how much for athletics, how much for performing arts, etc? What's the right size grant that will encourage someone to come, without spending more of the limited funds than we need? How do we find to most qualified candidates in academic fields, and how do we evaluate what contribution they are making?

Pollock acknowledges that the Rooke donation-an academic scholarship for students studying securities-will place merit aid on the Board's agenda in November, but he believes that the Rooke scholarship can be authorized even while a full merit aid program is under study and discussion.

"Mr. Rooke has simply asked the Board to enable the awarding of his scholarship because he has made the gift and the money is just sitting in the bank, so to speak," Pollock said. "So the Board will discuss permitting that scholarship at least."

Vision 2010

Vision 2010 will outline how merit-based aid might be used, including recruiting skilled academic students and exceptional athletes.

"The President and I will support merit aid in the Vision 2010 planning process for all of those reasons. And in part because of developments in the Patriot League, but also because of developments of other kinds in the competitive marketplace, we would like to make it an early part of the Vision 2010 planning process," Pollock said. "We'd like to get a decision on it within the next year if possible. Merit aid is used widely enough now in higher education to really warrant serious consideration at Bucknell. We're really at a point of needing to ask the question, "why not?" where, for years, the question was, "why?"

The Merits of Merit Aid

Under the guidance of the University Council, faculty and the committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, Davies, along with Pollock and Rogers, is confident the University will design an appropriate merit-based aid program to continue competing with leading colleges and universities.

"If someone has need, they are given the aid dollars that they are eligible to receive. If they do not have need, presently Bucknell does not have the resources to present aid above need," Davies said. "And we certainly hear that students go to other schools because they received merit scholarships from those institutions and did not receive money from us."

Stop the Hate March and Vigil

After gathering in front of the Langone Center, students, campus organization and University officials marched through downtown Lewisburg towards Hufnagle Park for an evening vigil on Monday.

University suspends Tri-Delta after hazing incident

Delta Delta Delta was suspended for hazing allegations which will now be investigated.

To the Campus Community:

With regret, I write to inform that Delta Delta Delta sorority has been suspended pending completion of the campus investigation and judicial proceedings before the Community Judicial Board.

The suspension has been imposed because of an alleged inappropriate drinking activity and possible hazing, involving a number of sisters and pledges, which took place on the evening/early morning of Sept.17-18.

Pending completion of the campus investigation and judicial proceedings, the following restrictions apply to Delta Delta Delta Sorority:

1) It may not hold chapter meetings without prior permission, host or schedule social events, schedule ritual ceremonies, or participate in social events as a chapter.
2) The chapter's new member education program and class are suspended.
3) The chapter may not be represented on the Panhellenic Association Executive Board or vote at Panhellenic Association meetings.

Faculty and staff show their support of National Day of Support of Coming Out

By Kristen Erickson
Contributing Writer

October 11th is the National Day of Support of Coming Out.

"This national project promotes honesty and openness about being gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender on campus, in the workplace and in the community. It was founded by activists who believed that LGBT people needed to be visible and that equality could not be achieved from the closet," according to the Human Rights Campaign.

LGBT it is an acronym for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexuals and Transgendered. Bucknell's LGBT Awareness Office agrees with and supports this national project in all respects. The office works hard to increase awareness in the Bucknell community that there are people who may be afraid of the reaction of this community towards them coming out.

More importantly, LGBT strives to make Bucknell a safe place for lesbian, gay, bisexuals and transgendered by supporting student groups/efforts and educating fellow students in terms of policy, practice and campus-wide awareness programs. The office tries to create an environment more conducive to people coming out openly and honestly.

More importantly, you may be asking yourself, "What does coming out mean?"

The official definition of "coming out" as defined by the human rights campaign is "identifying one's self of as gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender. The first person you have to reveal this to is yourself. After that, you can deal with friends and family. For many people, the coming out process is difficult. But most people come out because, sooner or later, they can't stand hiding who they are any more. Once they've come out, most people acknowledge that it feels much better to be open and honest than to conceal such an integral part of themselves"

For many of these people, the hardest struggle is within themselves to discover who they truly. This struggle takes place without the exterior struggle of their school, work, or community.

In an effort to help students on Bucknell Campus discover who they are and be who they are in a supportive community, the Office of LGBT Awareness has asked all of the faculty, staff, and administration to help us compile the following list.

This list tells those students who are unable to come out to know there are many people on the Bucknell campus who support them and accept them, and often understand their struggle and the issues they face during this exploration.

The following support all students at Bucknell in who they are:

Merit-aid will increase diversity and talent

The University prides itself in its long history of only offering need-based scholarships, not merit-aid financial assistance. The Patriot League is often proud of the various scholarships that it gives to students. As it stands now, Bucknll and Colgate are the only two League schools that do not offer merit-aid. However, the administration and the Board of Trustees are now considering implementing this form of aid. The Bucknellian agrees that by offering merit-aid, the University will become more diverse, maintain competitiveness and seek exceptionally talented students.

Over the past few years, the academic standards of the University have greatly increased, making it competitive with schools such as Duke and Princeton. However, because those schools offer merit-aid, the University often loses students to them. In order to keep that competition between the University and other high-caliber schools, the University should offer merit-aid.

According to Dean of Admissions Mark Davies '74, students who would be eligible for merit-aid are already being accepted to the University, but are choosing to attend other schools. Last year, the University lost 133 talented students because they accepted a merit-based packages from another institution.

By offering merit-aid, the University population will become more talented and more diverse. For example, if students receive merit-aid and as a result can afford to come here, the economic diversity of the student population will increase.

Although merit-aid has the potential to create diversity, some worry that it will create a school that is less well-rounded. For example, if the University accepts and gives aid to a lot of theater majors, the theater department will excel, but other areas may lose strength.

Another argument against merit-aid in general, not necessarily at the University, is that the donors have the potential of choosing where the aid is going. A donor may give money to a student who is an excellent pianist, but there might not be an applicant who fits that specific scholarship.

While some argue that if we can raise money for scholarships, we should also be able to raise money for other University needs. However, the administrations's answer, which The Bucknellian supports, is that some merit-aid donors may more inclined to give money toward academic purposes.

The Bucknellian endorses the University's decision to explore merit-aid and we believe that Vision 2010 will assess the issue appropriately. We support the University's efforts to increase the presence of diverse and talented students and it efforts to maintain competitiveness with elite schools.

We applaud the University's careful examination of this controversial matter. However, we believe that the sooner the University puts a merit-aid program into effect, the sooner we can begin to offer enticing aid packages to talented students who demonstrate the need.

7th Street House deserves attention

By Kellen A. Smith
Staff Writer

There are many misconceptions about the house that sits on the corner of 7th Street and Moore Avenue right by the cafe. One of the most popular ones is that all of the African American students on campus live in this house. The residents hear this misconception as tours of prospective students walk in front of it. I find this to be hard to believe being that there are more than 125 students of the African diaspora here at Bucknell. I also find it equally hard to believe that someone would say that since, according to Chanell Hanns the Resident Assistant, there are 18 students living in the house this semester. The racial breakdown of these 18 students is: two Hispanic residents, two Asian/ Pacific Islander residents, four black residents and 10 white residents. This makes this house one of the most diverse places on campus, and not all black as some would love you to believe. Despite all of this, people still call 7th Street House the "black house" and state that they would never live in a place like it. The white residents are asked constantly why they want to live in the house, even though it is in a prime location on campus and it has some of the biggest rooms on campus.

Some of the misconceptions of the house can be blamed on the University. They have not addressed these false statements made about the house or even tried to change people's views concerning the African American Studies House. I would even say that the University is happy to see these misconceptions thrive because not only does it deter white students from living in the House, but they also deter some black students. The number of black students living in the house has decreased considerably over the years even though the number of black students enrolled at Bucknell has not.

Many of the students qualified to live in 7th Street—qualification is either enrolling in or completing an African American studies class—opt not to stay in the house because of the subpar conditions the University has allowed the house to fall into. Seventh Street's residents complain of multiple things: from constant power outages, extreme heat when the heat is turned on, banging pipes, hot pipes out in the open, broken screens, screens with multiple holes in them (if there are screens at all), no smoke detectors in the rooms and scalding hot water in the shower. How could a University that makes $13,000 plus per student on tuition allow such living conditions to exist?

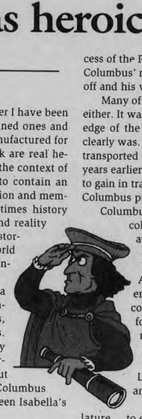
The University's answer to this question is to take the house away from African American studies and thus the organizations that use the house. The University is proposing to take the house, fix it up and make it into a multicultural center. I find nothing wrong with that as long as the University still has an African American Studies House. If they are going to have a Jewish studies house and an International Studies House then they can at least keep some sort of African American studies house on campus. Many of the African American students find some comfort when stepping onto this predominately white campus in knowing that there is a place where they can go and find someone of the same background.

In this writer's eyes, the University has been trying to eradicate any type of "black house" at Bucknell. At one point there were two houses, but the University stepped in and took one of them away. Now it seems that it will do the same to the one house that is left. They claim it is because of the lack of students to live in the house, but instead of stepping in and trying to help the house survive, they have resorted to getting rid of it. Is this institutional racism rearing its ugly head at Bucknell? Or will President Rogers and the Administration stick to their pledge of diversity and make one of the other special interest houses that has no theme into the African American Studies House? Will ever they fix up 7th Street for students to be able to live in it comfortably? Only time will tell.

Columbus not as heroic as once thought

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

In recent weeks since the New York/Washington disaster I have been thinking of heroes. The real ones and the fancifully imagined ones and how real ones are so obvious and how some need to be manufactured for public consumption. The police and firemen of New York are real heroes. Historical heroes must always be envisioned within the context of their times and who is telling the story. Myths are said to contain an element of truth in them at the beginning, before oral tradition and memory lapses restructure them forward through time. Sometimes history lends a hand and sometimes actual history is forgotten and reality changes. A pleasant fiction has been woven out of one historical fact: that Columbus discovered islands in the New World for Spain. That might be the end of the truth and the beginning of myth making.



Columbus Day is celebrated in the United States as a great Italian-American patriotic holiday. Parades are assembled in honor of Christopher Columbus, but in recent years, the great navigator has been getting some bothersome press. What we have been told in high school has been generally little more than a manufactured version of the actual historical events, wrapped in myth and swathed in untruths about the man. The story is well known by most 10 year olds. Columbus sailed the ocean blue from Genoa and was financed by Queen Isabella's necklace.

Well the truth is different. The Spanish crown had just spent the last 10 years conquering the last stronghold of the Muslims in southern Spain and was flush with the loot of Granada. The infamous Spanish inquisition in the same year of Columbus' voyage expelled or forcibly converted the Jewish population of Spain by freeing up their property and belongings to the crown. Large and risk-filled undertakings, like the one for which Columbus lobbied for the previous seven years, had to be funded by governments. These were the riches that financed Columbus and his dreams of exploration. Spain was looking for a solution to its economic problems since they heard of the success of the Portuguese explorers in Africa. The Portugese had turned down Columbus' repeated requests for funding since they knew his numbers were off and his voyage had little chance of success.

Many of the fears about sea voyages told to us were not entirely accurate either. It was known that the world was round and the fears of falling of the edge of the earth were not prevalent among the educated, as Columbus clearly was. The Muslims provided much of the navigation technology and transported the knowledge of gunpowder to Europeans from the Chinese years earlier. The Spanish were in this enterprise for the riches they hoped to gain in trade with the Japanese or Chinese civilizations of the Orient that Columbus promised were at the end of his voyage.

Columbus' four voyages were financial disasters for the Spanish. All the colonies he established in the West Indies succeeded only in alienating the indigenous tribes and unintentionally spreading diseases among those Indians with whom they came in direct contact. Untold numbers died, and the great extermination of the Native American population was started. Within a century great indigenous empires in the New World would fall; thus slavery and colonization would end many lives and cultures that had existed for centuries. The historian, Howard Zinn, conservatively estimates that over the years, 50 to 80 million Native Americans died due to Columbus' expeditions. The plunder of those that followed Columbus was so thorough that many countries in Latin America continue to struggle from the lost mineral wealth and environmental degradation of colonization.

In Colorado last week, a bill was introduced in the state legislature to stop the celebration of Columbus Day. There is little hope that it will pass, but it is a symbol to those that still feel the need to honor Columbus that they should find another hero. Italian history can surely find another to honor. The honoring of men like Marconi, Garabaldi or Fermi can serve to honor those of Italian heritage. Historic investigation can be a sobering challenge at times. Perhaps it is time to find another member of the gene pool to honor with a fine fall holiday. We need heroes, but not ones that require so much imaginary embroidery to maintain a kernel of truth. As time goes forward, Christopher Columbus seems to be a sadly flawed choice for a hero.

U.S. civil liberties encourage discussion

To the Editor:

Having read Tom Elliott's article, "Pacifist Professors Endanger America" in The Bucknellian of Oct. 5, I thought that I would proffer a few comments of my own. I am not persuaded that America is endangered by pacifist professors or even a pacifist outlook, generally speaking. Indeed, as long as the numerous civil liberties that many people associate with America's modus vivendi remain intact, we should all be on pretty solid footing as a civil society. Such liberties allow, for example, for Elliott to state his opinion and for me to state mine.

I don't think that numerous professors throughout the United States offering different perspectives on the Sept. 11 tragedy and its geo-political repercussions pose any danger to America or its civil liberties. On the contrary, these differing opinions speak of a relatively healthy social climate in which considered opinions and different perspectives engage each other vigorously in order to ensure that we don't move toward precipitous action of one kind or another. Rather, the dangerous social climate tends to be promoted by attitudes which suggest that at a time such as this, a time of great threat, sorrow, anger and fear, we should all abide by the credo that Elliot seems to endorse as he states, "He that is not with me is against me." Such a simplistic, binarist position does little to articulate the complex historical and political conflicts which play some part (in addition, of course, to those persons who are directly responsible for the terrible destruction of life on Sept., 11) in explaining where we are now and where we might go from here.

A crucially important benefit of a liberal education is that it promotes and enhances the imaginative capacity to empathize, to place oneself in the situation of another, to try to move out of the safety and comfort of "self" in order to imaginatively embrace the strangeness and disease of the "other." But this exercise of the liberal imagination is not primarily about promoting empathy in the sense of a compassion born of the happenstance of one's position of privilege or power. The exercise of the liberal imagination promotes the discovery of the "other" in ourselves, the traitor or the savage or even the "terrorist" who lives within rather than he who is to be discovered without. In addition, it is at the time of personal or even national crisis and trauma when the liberal imagination is our greatest asset. It is easy to empathize when we are comfortable and content. Indeed, at such times, our empathy can often be more about our own self-assured smugness than about imaginatively connecting with otherness. The real challenge is to try to empathize when we are enduring difficult or even perilous times.

It is not that, as Elliott suggests by way of George Orwell, that "pacifism is objectively pro-Facist." Certainly not. Facism, as Aime Cesaire, for example, has argued in Discourse on Colonialism was not produced in Europe as a consequence of pacifism, but had its rudimentary beginnings in the abominable treatment meted out to the brown and black peoples of the world by Europeans. As Cesaire, W.E.B. DuBois and others have argued, it was when Europeans started to visit the same inhumane treatment upon whites in Europe and started to annex, not far-flung overseas territories, but their European neighbors, that Facism became a global problem. The professors who have been offering alternative perspectives on this very thorny and complex issue which has been going on for decades, indeed centuries, but which became much more poignant for us on Sept. 11. have been doing their students, colleagues and arguably the nation a service. They have been safeguarding the right of freedom of expression by putting it into practice, and they have been, to greater or lesser degrees, promoting the health and exercise of the liberal imagination. I would argue that now as much as ever before, we need to champion the importance and value of a truly liberal education. To promote anything less at this juncture is to bequeath our progeny a future in which they tragically seek the "heart of darkness" that exists without, before they tackle the "heart of darkness" that is always waiting to be discovered within.

Pacifism isn't pro-terrorist or anti-American

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to Tom Elliott's article, "Pacifist Professors Endanger America." Mr. Elliott discussed the various teach-ins being held around the country at various campus locations in response to the recent terrorist attacks (specifically the teach-in at Bucknell), and also his opinions on pacifism and what it means to be an American in general.

As a concerned college student, I take issue with several of this article's main points. Being an American is not blindly accepting the status quo and being patriotic when it is popular. It is enjoying the freedoms which are supposed to be the basis of our entire ideological system. These freedoms include saying you don't support war or assembling in a peaceful protest or writing a letter that will hopefully get printed in a newspaper. This nation was created on the idea that we can have the right to dissent without being falsely labeled. It is libelous to write that being a pacifist is the equivalent of being pro-terrorist and anti-American. Perhaps I'm just crazy for not thinking that exercising my constitutional rights makes me a threat to the U.S., but I don't think it does. Rather, I think it is the essence of what makes me proud to be an American, of what makes anyone feel this pride-to realize the ideals of freedom and democracy that we claim to uphold above all.

Furthermore, we must not polarize the issue at hand into a simplistic battle of good vs. evil; to do so would be to neglect several important facts. The attacks against the United States were not attacks on freedom, democracy or our way of life. They were attacks based on our foreign policy in the Middle East. Who can find fault with wanting to promote freedom, democracy and human rights in this age of globalization? Unfortunately our actions have spoken louder than our words. The terrorists do not hate us for who we are; they hate us for what we have done. And if all we have done is promote "democracy and freedom," we would not be in this situation. We have blindly served our own interests for years with little regard to the consequences for our actions. In no way do I condone the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Yet, I do not condone state-supported terrorism, either. We cannot cure the world of terrorism without looking within to see why something of this magnitude could have happened.

The previous paragraph is likely a classic example of the type of "anti-American garbage" Mr. Elliott spoke of in his article. He is entitled to his opinion. However, the truth of U.S. foreign policy is as difficult to dispute as is the pro-American security blanket to which we cling to discard. As a teaching assistant for the Global Residential College in Professor Hilbourne Watson's class and a former pupil of Professor Tom Travis, I have witnessed students learn the sometimes shocking truth about our not-so-perfect country. Why? Because they were fed pro-American and pro-European half-truths and connotations. The truth is not garbage and if it seems to be anti-American, so be it. It is not the goal of these professors to unabashedly criticize the United States, but to provide a diverse and legitimate education. Yet it seems their statements are immediately discredited as biases, left wing and typical of "washed-up revolutionaries" like Professor Travis and Professor Watson. Perhaps if Mr. Elliott had actually attended the teach-ins, he would have experienced something more than some secondhand account. Show some respect for the goals of education. We are in college, after all.

All human life should be valued and protected

To the Editor:

I'm saddened by people tonight. The events of Sept. 11 will live on forever as a true tragedy, the ripple effects are still showing up in the lives of people everywhere. The little trivial things that used to plague our lives have faded into the background, as they rightly should, and America becomes less and less interested in what Britney Spears wore in her latest video. Honestly, I was going to try to write an article that would answer those of the Oct. 5 Forum by Tom Elliott and Michael Boland in a carefully planned and documented way to counteract the poorly documented style that has been typical of writers like Elliott. But I find myself in the mood to just speak my mind, with less and less interest in attacking in that particular, academic brand of pretentious. I personally am unsure of exactly where to stand. And I think that's where the majority of people should be, not relying on blind patriotism and reactionary ideals, nor strictly "anti-conservative" politics.

To make the statement that "Not only is this peace-speak illogical, it's dangerous," ("Pacifist professors endanger America," Oct. 5 The Bucknellian) is ludicrous. I respect the conservative viewpoint, but I do think that to make the blanket statement that pacifists are akin to terrorists shows very little thought about what the terms "pacifism" and "terrorism" really mean. Pacifism is defined by the Oxford English Dictionary to mean: "the policy or doctrine of rejecting war and every form of violent action as means of solving disputes, especially in international affairs; the belief in and advocacy of peaceful methods as feasible and desirable alternatives to war." Terrorism is defined by the Oxford English Dictionary to mean: "2. gen. A policy intended to strike with terror those against whom it is adopted; the employment of methods of intimidation; the fact of terrorizing or condition of being terrorized."

Now, the definitions of these terms seem to be at odds. Would someone desiring the use of "peaceful methods as feasible and desirable alternatives to war" truly support anyone being terrorized?

Bombing started in Afghanistan on Sunday, Oct. 7, and the possibility of plans for attacks on other countries in the nature of self-defense have been planned. We as a nation are entering into a war against a ghost, and it's a war that cannot be won. It is not possible to stamp out terrorism; the Oklahoma City bombings are proof that it exists on our own soil as well. Should we stand back with hands tied and passively accept the violence that has occurred against us? No, but there are other ways, such as bringing those responsible to trial, finding what drives them to act the way they do and try to counteract that without starting a war that may or may not last a long time and end up costing countless human lives. There has to be a point when humanity says that violence is not the answer to violence or we will all be blind and toothless.

And as far as the comments made in defense of Reverand Jerry Falwell, I do defend his right to freedom of speech, though I disagree with him on all points of his statement after the bombings of Sept. 11. But if Falwell is indicative of fundamental Christian views, I have to ask myself why there has been such a booming business in the sales of the WWJD (What Would Jesus Do) bracelets, key chains, etc. in the last decade or so. What would the man who supposedly said that "love thy neighbor" is all that is necessary for a person to do in order to live his or her life as a good person (and Christian) and not break any of the commandments do in our place? I don't seem to recall there being any attachments, conditions or catches to the love that this man was talking about. There was no mention of "love thy neighbor only if they are straight, Christian, patriarchal and anti-choice," at least not that I remember reading. Nor do I remember reading that it was justified to strike back at those who have wronged us by attacking a country that was not directly responsible. So along the lines of religion, would the man who professed that love was the answer and that forgiveness was paramount truly support the actions we are undertaking? Personally I do not think that would be the case.

I am not in support of "America Strikes Back". I am not in support of terrorism, I do not feel that the United States deserved anything that was thrown at us, and I am truly saddened by the lack of concern for human life shown in the last month. But I do think that is the point. It's human life either way, both "ours" and "theirs."

Red Cross thanks campus for efforts and donations

To the Editor:

The Union County Chapter of the American Red Cross would like to express appreciation to the entire Bucknell community for your flexibility and understanding during these uncertain times. In the weeks following the Sep. 11 attack, blood donations doubled, and many people waited hours to donate at drives throughout the area. Currently there is an adequate supply of blood on hand for all who are in need.

However, the need for blood never ends, both locally and beyond. In the weeks and months to come, we trust that we can count on the Bucknell community to support blood drives regularly.

We'll be back on campus on Feb. 27, 2002, and we know we will have a great response from this caring community. For information on other area drives, call 524-0400.

We would like to acknowledge the following organizations and individuals for their support and assistance in planning and executing a smooth and successful drive on Oct. 3: Alpha Phi Omega, Dining Services, Judy Mikanis, Roy Baker, Domino's Pizza, McDonald's of Lewisburg, United Methodist Women and the entire Bucknell community. Bucknell has always supported our local area, our region and our country in supplying a safe and reliable supply of life-saving blood.

Sincerely,
Nancy Libbey
Blood Services Coordinator

New approach needed

By Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

With the proud arousal of a fevered patriotic spirit as a backlash to the Sept. 11 attacks, citizens nationwide have responded predictably and overwhelmingly; with typical egocentric, divine-American-right sentimentality. It seems these uneducated war hawks still haven't learned.

Awash in a sea of shoot-first-ask-questions-later rhetoric that has laden the media and its listeners for the past three weeks, it is difficult to voice opposition to an ideology that has become so entrenched in society. I am proud that our professors, the educated elite in America, have the courage to stand up and suggest we look at the situation from a different perspective; one that does not add more bodies to the death toll.

To those members of the community, the war hawks and rabble-rousers who feel the only solution to a problem is a smoking gun and six empty casings, I emphatically declare that those who point the crooked finger of judgment upon others merely reaches out for their own condemnation and annihilation.

You wave your gun in the air like some prophetic voice in the desert, a Judge Dredd shouting "I AM THE LAW!," clamoring for revenge and bin Laden's blood since the attack; even before evidence linked him to these atrocities. Where was your justice then? Where is your courage now? Your feeble cry of rage is pitiful and juvenile. Your use of words to lash out against those who speak in defense of human life is just as vile and despicable as those who would commit these acts.

Blood? We have plenty of blood. Blood on the floor, blood on our hands, blood at my father's office two blocks from the towers. Now you're demanding to take the blood from our hearts? Are we to replace it with the blood we spill in Afghanistan after we "finally have the courage to do what must be done?"

Tell me how that will ease my pain, or the pain of my friend whose uncle's picture was among those on the newspaper clipping listing firefighters who lost their lives which was posted to the bulletin board in the Langone Center.

Call for war. Call for retribution. Demand that they suffer as much as you have. Believe unwaveringly that America and its citizens are above all others and that America is justified in everything they have ever done and will ever do. You say pacifists hold themselves on a pedestal? I wonder how you could tell that from the Sears Tower of a pedestal that you, yourself stand on.

You say pacifism is endorsed by the 10 percent of the population that doesn't support war. To that I say "Enter through the narrow gate. For wide is the gate and broad is the road that leads to destruction, and many enter through it. But small is the gate and narrow the road that leads to life, and only a few find it." Now look at the statistic: 90 percent of Americans in favor of war. Question their judgment. Question your own judgment.

America has finally been given a rude awakening. It has just been reminded, in the most painful fashion imaginable, that it is as much a part of the global community as anyone else. Now is not the time for America-first propaganda. It is not the time for rattling cages. It is time for remembrance.

"If there is to be a memorial," Roger Ebert writes, "Fly no flag above it, for it is not the possession of a nation but a sorrow shared with the world. Do not build again on this place. No building can stand there. No building, no statue, no column, no arch, no symbol, no name, no date, no statement. Just the comfort of the earth we share, to remind us that we share it."

Pacifists don't suggest that no punishment be given, just that additional deaths are not necessary. Perhaps the reason that these abhorrent events occur is because our society perpetuates war with war. If we take a stand for peace, then it stands to reason peace will beget peace.

History has proven this to be true. After the First World War, the world chose to impoverish the Germans, and a generation grew out of it that resented the world and yearned for its destruction. But after the Second World War, the world chose to rebuild Germany, and their acceptance back into the global society has made them an irreplaceable cog in the global wheel.

On Monday, The New York Times ran this headline after the bombings began: "Routine Start In Novel War." This strikes at the core of the issue. This is something wholly new for Americans, so why are we still trying to respond with arcane tactics. You wouldn't send the cavalry into Vietnam, would you?

Our technology has advanced, but has our sensibility? This is a war, but not one of military conquest. This is an ideological war, and if the side of "good" is to win, it cannot do so with a "do as I say, not as I do" strategy. America cannot tell nations to denounce terrorism when America itself uses terrorist tactics. This war cannot be fought on battle fields and in bunkers because you cannot end terrorism by killing terrorists. We need to take a new approach.

The gauntlet has been thrown, but we need not accept a duel. America has the opportunity to propose that something radically different be done. As of Sunday, Oct. 7, we have begun the duel. I pray that it goes no further.

Title IX has merits

To the Editor:

It is understandable that those closest to the wrestling program would be upset by its upcoming demise ("Wrestlers' petition could spark legal battle," Bucknellian, page 1, Oct. 5), and it must look unfair to them. But other people who value both the University's core principles and its financial health should commend the administration for the courage it took to make that decision.

The action is important to control costs within the athletics department as the University seeks gender equity in athletics-Bucknell chose to drop a sport (one that does not have a female equivalent), rather than to seek balance by expanding female sports all the way to present male levels.

The action explicitly furthered the principles behind Title IX—the federal law mandating equal access to valuable university programs. "Fair and equitable treatment of men and women in intercollegiate athlètics is the right thing to do," President Steffen Rogers said at the time.

Too few are speaking in support of Title IX through this discussion. The controversy now has elements of the dangerous backlash to affirmative action that we've seen at the national level, in that it is encouraging an attack on important underlying values: "Reaching fairness cannot involve any loss for anyone (even those who have benefited from unfairness for generations);" "Girls don't do sports as well as guys."

Title IX is a blunt policy instrument and it has been enforced in strange ways across the nation, but almost any application of this law would be preferable to the pervasive, long-term, explicit institutional sexism that it resists.

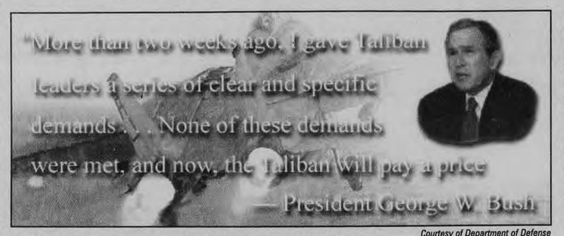
U.S. and Great Britain Strike Afghanistan

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

Since 12:30 p.m. EST, the United States along with Britain have been launching aerial attacks on the Taliban government of Afghanistan in retaliation for the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11. The target initially was Osama bin Laden and his group al-Queda, whom the United States hold responsible for the attacks. The attacks' goals were upgraded to include the removal of the al-Queda friendly Taliban government. On Sunday, the United States concentrated its fire on radar stations, surface-to-air missile sites and airfields, in order to gain air superiority before possibly sending in ground troops to oust the Taliban and capture bin Laden. Also hit have been a variety of terrorist training camps. The attacks have consisted of British and American cruise missiles, B-52's operating out of the island of Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean, B-1 bombers, B-2 stealth bombers operating from the continental United States and strike aircraft operating off of aircraft carriers in the Indian Ocean. Now that the United States has established "air supremacy" for high-altitude aircraft, the strikes can now proceed around the clock.

The bombings have not been without civilian casualties. Four UN personnel working to remove land mines in Afghanistan were killed Monday when a bomb hit a radio transmission target near the UN office. However, the United States has yet to receive independent confirmation that it was their munitions that caused the deaths of the aid workers.



"More than two weeks ago, I gave Taliban leaders a series of clear and specific demands . . . None of these demands were met, and now, the Taliban will pay a price."
— President George W. Bush

President Bush ordered strikes against Afghanistan to begin on Oct. 7.

Afghan forces have been unable to hit any American planes with either anti-aircraft artillery or missiles since the aircraft are able to fly above the range of the defenses. These attacks are the beginning of a campaign aimed at ridding the world of groups considered in the West to be sponsoring or engaging in terrorism. A variety of tactics is being used, the attacks against the Taliban being merely the most visible at this time. Also being targeted are the groups' funding by countries freezing their assets, and electronic surveillance of conversations, emails and other communications by these groups.

While the United States is currently conducting air strikes against the Taliban regime, they are simultaneously carrying out humanitarian missions. These include using C-17 transports to drop food and medicine to the Afghan people. Not only are these supposed to help the citizens, but it is hoped that they will result in the destabilization of the Taliban.

According to CNN, the Northern Alliance is poised to launch a major assault on Taliban positions in Afghanistan. However, they are being restrained, likely by the United States. The reason for restraint is to ensure that a strong replacement government is ready to take over as soon as the Taliban falls so that confusion can be kept to a minimum.

Also, in the wake of the air strikes against the Taliban and al-Qaeda, domestic security has been raised to the highest level of readiness. The fear is that terrorists already in the country will seek to retaliate against domestic targets for the military campaign against their terrorist network and the government that harbors them.

A new generation learns of war

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Just when I thought President Bush had finally gotten the whole speech-giving thing down, he had to go and say something totally bogus.

This particular gaffe happened on Sunday, when he was announcing the attacks on the Taliban in Afghanistan. And it has particular relevance to our little Bucknell Bubble. He stated, "Since September 11, an entire generation of young Americans has gained new understanding of the value of freedom and its cost and duty and its sacrifice."

Yeah, I wish.

What does our generation know about war? Well, some of us might remember the Persian Gulf War ... if you can call that a war. It was more like a televised beatdown of Saddam Hussein and his army, with very few American casualties.

And then there was "casualty-proof" Kosovo. You know, when Bill Clinton ordered our pilots to fly above Yugoslavian air defenses, surgically bombing what turned out to be dummy tanks and other useless garbage put there to befuddle our faraway pilots? But that discovery, of course, came millions of taxpayer dollars later.

No, we of the Bubble have never seen a real war. Unfortunately, the most recent example in our history books is the disaster known as Vietnam.

And, apologies to President Bush, it's not looking like all the young Americans around this campus have even a clue, let alone an understanding, about freedom's cost, about duty or personal sacrifice. If they did, they would know that America cannot sit idly by, knowing that evil itself has taken the lives of 6,000 innocents and continues to lurk in the shadows of the world.

The cost of freedom is this: If we want to keep it, we have a duty to come together and make some sacrifices in order to defend it.

Freedom is a lot of things: freedom to practice your religion, freedom to say what you believe, even freedom to have a peace rally despite the fact that there will be no peace until Osama bin Laden and his cohorts are all someplace where they can never, ever, hurt our great nation again.

But as the President has so aptly said, "Freedom itself was attacked ... and freedom will be defended." Indeed, it must be.

Our generation is about to learn what real war is. We did not start it, but we will finish it—along with those who did start it. This war will not be pretty, but it is just, and it is necessary.

We won't kill any of their innocent civilians—if we can humanly avoid it. In fact, we will feed those innocent civilians, while their oppressive government eats our bombs. That may seem paradoxical, but only on the surface. We have no bone to pick with the Afghan people—only with their evil, extremist, terrorist-harboring government.

War is a pretty lousy way to have to do it, but we will once again prove to all those, both at home and abroad, who don't get it that this is the greatest nation on the face of the earth.

Great Britain is America's primary ally in the war against terrorism

By Meredith Atkinson
Staff Writer

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, all of America's official allies have offered the United States support in its war against terrorism. Britain, led by Prime Minister Tony Blair has emerged as our most effective, outspoken and loyal ally. Last week, Blair became the first Western leader to travel to Pakistan and personally deliver the message that has been emphasized by President Bush and other leaders. According to CNN, Blair said, "Any action we take is not against the Afghan people ... the vast majority of Muslims throughout the world, including in Pakistan and in Britain, were appalled at the Sept. 11 atrocity. Such an act, which spilt the blood of hundreds of innocent Muslims, is wholly contrary to the proper teaching of the Koran." Blair continued that the attacks were "an outrage against the civilized values of all people of every faith, race and culture."

Tony Blair traveled to the Middle East to gain support for the military campaign.

The purpose for Blair's visit to Pakistan, according to MSNBC, was to establish a diplomatic relationship with a country that has often been alienated by the United States and Great Britain due to its testing of nuclear weapons and abandonment of civilian rule.

CNN sources said that Blair wanted to strengthen the very cooperative Pakistani government and immunize it against pressure from militant Islamic groups toward General Musharraf and his commitment to support military action in Afghanistan. Blair's timing was perfectly orchestrated, because when General Musharraf previously announced his decision to back America, he seemed defensive and apologetic.

On Wednesday, Oct. 5, Blair publicized documents that unequivocally proved that Osama bin Laden was behind the attacks of Sept. 11. The Bush administration supported Blair's conclusion that there was "absolutely no doubt" bin Laden and his terrorist network are responsible. However, they chose not to publish a similar version of the evidence, explaining to CNN that it would not be in the best interest of national security.

On Sunday, Oct. 7, major news sources like MSNBC, CNN and FOX News began reporting that America and Britain had launched a series of air strikes in Afghanistan. Blair's immediate willingness to commit British forces to the American led military operation reinforced his nation's loyalty and commitment to the international cause. According to CNN, Jack Straw, Foreign Secretary in London, confirmed that the initiative would likely take weeks, commenting, "We are certainly not talking days, unless something dramatic happens."

In a parliamentary debate on the evening of the first air strikes, Prime Minister Blair announced that "initial indications are that the coalition operations were successful in achieving their objective of destroying and degrading elements of the al Qaeda terrorist facilities and the Taliban military apparatus that protects them." Although British forces were not involved in the second round of attacks, Blair pledged, "British forces will be there again." Blair has been working hard to form an international anti-terror coalition and commented that since Sept. 11, Britain has "stood shoulder to shoulder" with the United States.

According to CNN, one of Blair's recent diplomatic efforts was to neutralize bin Laden's propaganda message by conducting an interview with al-Jazeera television, which is widely viewed throughout the Arab world. Blair's spokesperson said that the reason the Prime Minister was conducting the interview was because he wanted to "underline very clearly to the Middle East and the region that this is not a war against Islam." His interview was said to be a rebuttal to bin Laden's video broadcast on the station that aired on Sunday. In that interview, bin Laden challenged every Muslim to "... rise and defend his religion" adding that "America will never again dream of security."

According to MSNBC, Blair does not view Britain's role as simply joining a coalition against bin Laden and his network; he views England's involvement in the attacks as an act that is in Britain's national interest. He described the massacre on Sept. 11 as the "worst terrorist outrage against British citizens in our history" since 200 Britons were killed in the attack. Blair continued, "But even if no British citizen had died, it would be right to act. This atrocity was an attack on us all, on people of all faiths and people of none. We know the Al Qaeda network threatens Europe, including Britain, and, indeed, any nation throughout the world that does not share their fanatical views." He added that Britain has "a direct interest in acting in our self defense to protect British lives."

While support for Blair's military effort has been favorable and bipartisan, some critics have accused him of taking Britain into war without consulting his cabinet or legislature. According to the BBC, the Prime Minister responded that while there were dangers associated with military action, the dangers of inaction were "far, far worse." He continued, "Britain has learned that lesson many times before in our history. We only do it if the cause is just. But this cause is just," the prime minister said. "We will not let up or rest until our objectives are met in full." These objectives, as Blair described them, were "to eradicate bin Laden's network of terrorism and to take action against the Taliban regime that is sponsoring him." He said that Afghanistan's rulers "were given the choice of siding with justice or siding with terror, and they chose to side with terror." Blair's words came upon his return from Russia, Pakistan and India, as part of his initiative to shore up allies, and four days after he released the evidence of the case against bin Laden and the Taliban.

The prominence of Britain's support for the United States has prompted fear in England that they will be the next target. CNN reported that Blair's response was one of solidarity to the cause and to the United States, commenting "But we know that sometimes to safeguard peace, we have to fight."

University student witnesses government in action

By Richard Karcher
Staff Writer

Being a congressional representative in University's student government for the freshman class, I had hoped to enrich my interests further in the political and governmental aspects of an institution. Representing the interests of the class and meeting people involved in our governmental body were goals of mine to accomplish this year. However, on Friday, Oct. 5, for five hours, I participated in something more factual, informational and historical than anything I have ever been in. That day, four other classmates of mine, Zach Calvert, Matt Collier, Sam Ostroff, Duff Weber and I left campus at 11:30 a.m. to visit our state capital in Harrisburg. We had hoped to meet some very important people in our state government.

With a full agenda of goals ahead of him, President Bush issued an executive order to form a new cabinet position to help aid in the security of our nation. Immediately mandating the cabinet of Homeland Security, the newest cabinet position, President Bush had to choose a well-qualified individual to be secretary of this new branch. Governor Tom Ridge of Pennsylvania, potential running mate under George W. Bush last year, was asked to lead the nation's intelligence agencies in the fight against terrorism in the United States.

Having earned the bronze star in Vietnam, represented his state in Congress for years and governed the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for two terms, Ridge was deemed well-suited for the job. Since he has recently taken the newly formed position of Secretary of Homeland Security, the lieutenant governor of Pennsylvania will now be governor of Pennsylvania. Being third in command of the Commonwealth, the pro-tempore will act as lieutenant governor. Arriving in Harrisburg at 12:30 p.m., we were able to see portions of the inaugurations.

Before Governor Ridge said goodbye to Pennsylvanians to travel to Washington, D.C., the five of us had the privilege to speak with him. With Ridge resigning as governor, Mark Schweiker, lieutenant governor took the oath of office 1:30 p.m. in Harrisburg on Friday, Oct. 5, 2001. Meeting and speaking with Governor Schweiker and Secretary Ridge, both men seemed to be pleased to see the presence of youth at this function. In return, being very personable and easily approachable, both talked to us briefly about life as college students and life at the University.

Senator Robert C. Jubelirer (R-PA), of the 30th district was sworn in as lieutenant governor at 3:30 p.m. Senator Jubelirer was the person responsible for making our day so special; he was able to get tickets for us so that we could witness the historical events in Harrisburg that day. Ending the day by leaving Harrisburg at 4:30 p.m., we were able to meet Secretary Ridge, Governor Schweiker and Lieutenant Governor Jubelirer. We realized that one may meet many important people in a lifetime, but may not get the chance to meet many influential leaders in only five hours.

Bison offense dominates Towson 51-10

Third straight win for Bison improves record to 3-1—offense, defense turn in stellar performances for second week in a row

When a defense holds the opposition to 16 points in two games and the offense scores 89 points in those same two games, that is the recipe for two blowouts. The Bison extended their winning streak to three games and improved their record to 3-1 with a very impressive 51-10 victory over Towson University on Saturday.

The Bison defense continued to show how physical they can be, holding the Tigers to 13 yards on the ground as well as intercepting the ball three times. Todd Wenrich '03 and Jabu Powell '02 led the offensive attack for the Bison with Wenrich receiving Player-of-the-Game honors, while Powell ran his way to second on the all-time Bucknell rushing list with 114 yards on the day.

After the Bison won the coin toss and defered to the second half, the defense held the Tigers to a three-and-out on their first drive. As soon as the Bison got the ball they began to move it relatively easily. They went 75 yards on seven plays on their first drive, and Wenrich capped it off with a 37 yard touchdown pass to Albert Marquardt '04 giving the Bison an early 7-0 lead that they would not relinquish.

While the Bison defense continued to stifle the Tiger offense, the offense kept moving the ball, making it look easy. Wenrich began the day 7-7 in pass attempts for 95 yards, and this helped stake the Bison to an insurmountable lead. Bucknell moved the ball 71 yards on eight plays, and Powell capped off the drive with a seven yard touchdown run to give the Bison a 14-0 lead with 4:55 remaining in the first quarter of play.

On the next Towson drive, the Bison defense forced a fumble and Tom Kuhn '02 recovered on the Tigers 25 yard line. The Bison were unable to move the ball successfully, and settled for a 24 yard field goal from Chris Lundberg '03 to make the score 17-0.

Just as the Tigers began to move that ball well for the first time in the game at the end of the first quarter, the Bison defense stepped up and made a big stop on a third-and-two play. This left the Tigers with a 52 yard field goal attempt, which missed.

The Bison continued to move the ball with ease throughout the second quarter. Powell ran in from 11 yards out to finish off a 65 yard scoring drive to make the score 24-0.

With 5:03 remaining in the half, Reed Tunison '02 picked off a Towson pass and returned it 37 yards for the Bucknell touchdown, giving the Bison a 30-0 lead at half time.

"We were able to take it to them early, and take it from there," Kuhn said.

The Bison were able to add another score on a 62 yard screen pass from Wenrich to Tim Johnson '04, which Johnson broke for the touchdown. This made the score 37-0 mid way through the third period.

On the ensuing drive Towson was able to move the ball effectively until they reached the Bison red zone. The defense held the Tigers on the ten yard line, and they settled for a field goal to make the score 37-3.

These were the first points that the Bison had given up since the second quarter of the St. Mary's game.

Early in the fourth quarter Jason Marrow '02 added on his first touchdown of the 2001 season with a three yard touchdown run, to give the Bison a 44-3 lead.

After the Tigers added a touchdown of their own, Raphael Darrington '05 rounded out the scoring on the afternoon with a two yard touchdown run to make the final score 51-10. It was Darrington's first collegiate touchdown, as well as his first collegiate carry.

"It was a great victory," Head Coach Tom Gadd said.

"We needed to win a league game, and that is why it was extra sweet," Powell added.

It was obvious that the Bison had everything working this weekend, and that can be attributed to how many great players they have.

"We have so many weapons; we are able to mix it up and cause teams some problems," Powell said.

"We've got talent across the board, and our young kids are good," Gadd added.

Towson was on its heals for the entire game, and the Bison thoroughly dominated in every facet of the game.

"We got some pressure on them, and took them out of their game plan," Kuhn said.

"I think the kids all stepped up and played well," Gadd added.

Volleyball defeats Colgate and Army but falls to Holy Cross

By Pat Evans
Staff Writer

The Bison undefeated home court winning streak was put to an end after League opponent Holy Cross came back from a 2-0 deficit to win 3-2 (22-30, 29-31, 30-24, 30-28, 15-13). The Bison were coming off commanding wins over two other League foes in Davis Gym, beating Colgate 3-0 (30-22, 31-29, 30-22) and Army 3-1 (25-30, 30-17, 30-21, 31-29).

The Herd attacked Holy Cross from the beginning, outplaying them in most aspects of the match. Even in the end, Bucknell led in most major statistical categories, but was still unable to put together the win.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Brandi Trapasso '04 set a new personal record for kills with 18.

Shannon Walker '02 had one of her best matches of the season, posting match-highs in kills (25) and blocks (nine).

"I felt like we all put in the effort needed to win," she said. "It just got away from us."

For Brandi Trapasso '04 it was another stellar performance. The outside hitter broke her career record for kills with 18, and her 31 digs were just one shy of breaking her own school record in the category.

"We all had great games," Trapasso said. "Holy Cross just stepped up and had an extra push that we didn't."

The Bison came out strong in the opening sets against the Crusaders, jumping to a 2-0 lead. But when Holy Cross battled back from a 14-10 deficit in the third set, the team never answered.

Head Coach Cindy Opalski was able to work in a lot of players who gained experience under pressure.

"My mother always said sometimes God gives you gifts, and sometimes He gives you lessons," Opalski said. "In this match God gave us both."

The win against Colgate earlier in the week was similar in terms of effort and performance, and this time Bucknell got the win. Walker once again led the way with match-highs in kills (15) and blocks (four). Trapasso added 10 more kills, and Angela Gano '02 led all players with nine digs.

"It's always an intense rivalry when we play Colgate," Opalski said. "There's a lot of emotion and competitiveness, and it's fun when we can get a win."

The match against Army proved to be just as successful. The Bison rebounded from a slow start in the first set, but jumped all over the Black Knights and never looked back, taking the final three sets.

The team was able to pull off the win despite not having any substitutes late in the match. The long match forced Opalski to put some shorter players up in front with her taller players left in the back. The players responded by picking each other up and getting the win.

"Momentum was a big factor," Opalski said. "When we can run our offense at our speed, it's difficult to beat us."

For the Bison, the Colgate and Army wins at home improved their Patriot League record to 5-1.

"The team really came together to get what we had to get done in those really important matches," Walker said.

Despite the loss to Holy Cross, the Bison are confident that they can get back on track. The team travels to California next to take on some new challenging teams.

"It'll be good to play different teams," Walker said. "Hopefully we can come back refreshed and ready for Patriot League play."

The team has always been able to take losses as valuable experiences for future competitions. The Holy Cross defeat was only the second in League play, and the Bison are still second in the League behind undefeated American.

"The match taught us that any given team can be win on any given day," Opalski said. "If they can beat us that means that we can beat American."

Victory over Colgate marks best women's soccer start ever

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

The women's soccer team accomplished several things with Saturday's 2-1 win over Patriot League rival Colgate. They moved to 6-2-0 on the year and 1-1-0 in the Patriot League and are off to the best start in school history. Also, the squad remained undefeated at home (4-0) and ended a six-game losing streak against the Raiders, who defeated them 6-1 last year.

"We had a great week of practice, focusing primarily on scoring early and quick transition on the field. That is exactly what we did today against Colgate and we found ourselves with a good win," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Abbey Seaboyer '04 practices before the 2-1 Bison win against Colgate

With 2:22 to play in the contest, forward Emily Keber '03 drew Colgate's goalie to the right and then slotted home her second goal of the season into the back left corner of the net for the game-winner. Frontrunner Savannah Rennels '04 got the Bison on the board first with her team-leading sixth goal of the year just over eight minutes into the first half. The Raiders battled back to tie eight minutes later, scoring on a header from a corner pass. Laurie Purse '04 had five saves in goal for the Orange and Blue.

"Savannah scored the first goal and found herself double-teamed the whole game because of her threatening ability to attack," Findlay said. "Laurie played also played strong and came up with some great saves."

All in all it was a great team effort with the Bison receiving contributions from every position on the field.

"Abbey Seaboyer '04 organized from the back and continues to emerge not only as a team leader, but a driving force on the field and Lauren Schwarz'03 played consistent and was dominating in the air. Senior Lindsay Slomer's aggressive play continues to provide the emotional strength for the team," Findlay said.

"We played as a team all over the field up until the final whistle, which is what allowed for our success," Keber said.

"I'm so proud of our team right now. Our camaraderie, pride and talent are the reasons we are where we are now. Last year Colgate beat us 6-1 because they came out strong and controlled the game. This year we were the ones controlling the game," Tri-Captain Tara Utchel '03 said.

The team continues tough Patriot League play this Saturday as they prepare to travel to Worcester, Mass. to face Holy Cross in a noon showdown.

"Holy Cross is just as huge as Colgate because they are the defending Patriot League champs. We need to come out like we did against Colgate and score early," Purse said.

"Saturday was a huge win for us! We plan to carry this excitement and intensity into our next game against Holy Cross and throughout the rest of our season," Slomer said.

Team of the Week

"Knowing that anyone is beatable in our League this year, we knew we would have to beat Colgate to prove to ourselves that we can do it. Proving to ourselves that we are good enough to fight for first is something we have mentally dealt with for a long time. The win over Colgate this season convinces us that we are capable of our number one goal, winning the Patriot League Championship," Findlay said.

"We are heading into a tough stretch of in league and out of league competition. Holy Cross, despite having an 0-3 record in the League right now, is a tough team to play because of their overall athleticism and work rate. It will be an exciting game as it always is," Findlay said.

And a goodnight to you, Cal

Commentary

Andrew Burr
Sports Editor

It is said stars die one of two ways: Either as a blazing supernova, exploding with enough force to incinerate whole galaxies, or like a light bulb - flickering, perhaps even for a while, then becoming cold and dark.

Late in the evening, Oct. 6, a star died. And man, was it beautiful.

Baltimore will never shine brighter than it did Saturday night. Because in the heart of the city, with a whole nation watching, 48,000 people made sure that Cal Ripken, Jr. did not flicker and depart with a whimper. They made sure his last day was his greatest.

Sure, he went hitless in three at-bats. No walk off home-run, no come-from-behind victory, no appearances by Shoeless Joe Jackson or Moonlight Graham. Cal didn't get to have a catch with his dad, either.

But if you think Saturday night wasn't magical, you're wrong.

Saturday night, fans of baseball, not just of Cal Ripken, got a chance to give something back to him. They did. Standing ovations every time he stepped in the batters box, the number eight both mowed into the outfield grass and lit by windows of the Legg Mason building downtown, fireworks, a personal thank-you from former president Bill Clinton, pre-game and post-game ceremonies, banners, posters, tears.

Cal was humbled. "It was totally overwhelming," he said. "When you just shake your head and think back over your career and all the good moments you've had just because you're a baseball player, and the overpowering love from the stands, it blows you away."

And think, all this for a player who never hit 50 home runs in a season, who never made pitchers' knees buckle, who hadn't helped bring his team to a World Series since the first term of the Reagan administration.

But Cal wasn't your stereotypical superstar. He knew it, you knew it, I knew it, the whole country knew it, and we loved him anyway.

He wasn't fast; movies moved from theater to videocassette in the time it took him to get to first. His swing was about as graceful and flowing as a car accident, and his home runs didn't travel particularly far either. He used 40 hundred-bazillion stances (ballpark estimate) in his career, providing hours of fun for little leaguers who idolized him and nightmares for the fathers trying to coach them.

But he always came dressed and ready to play. And he always drank his milk.

That's how it went with Cal Ripken. It was the little things that made him a big star, the little things that other players had long forgotten about. Like taking time to sign autographs for fans to show his appreciation for their support. Like running a clinic for youngsters in Aberdeen, Md., his hometown. Like calling Baltimore his home for almost 20 years and making the city a prouder place because of it.

There is no question about Cal's place in history, which was assured by his eclipse of Lou Gehrig's consecutive-games record on Sept. 6, 1995. And while that record may be his most visible accomplishment, it is by no means his only one.

Cal is one of seven players in history to collect 400 home runs and 3,000 hits in a career, two amazing feats in their own rights. Anyone criticizing Cal for only ever being good enough for "perfect attendance" better also remember that Cal was also an 18-time all-star selection. Only a handful of major-leaguers will ever play 18 seasons, much less play 18 all-star seasons.

"Sometimes," he said, "when you've been playing a long time, the time can drag between innings. But today, I wanted to run out there and know I had nine innings left, and I wanted to throw the ball around the diamond just like I'd always done. I did it. I enjoyed it. And I appreciated it, because that's what I did all those years."

So for Ripken, it was an unusually usual night —at least until the game ended, and he had to address the fans. Goodbyes are always hard, even for Cal Ripken. And so as he looked down at the speech he wrote, his retirement speech, maybe that's when it hit him. That some of the best days of his life, those fun days where you still feel like you accomplished something, those days were over.

Maybe he realized that when he walked off the field tonight, as the cheers faded behind him and the lights turned off, it would be the last time.

He couldn't speak. Not for almost five minutes. The microphone was a roaring silence, and the crowd understood.

When he did speak, he talked about his dreams as a kid—the desire to play for his home team and the fulfillment it has brought him. He talked about his children, he talked about his teammates, he talked about the fans. He talked about everything except baseball.

Because as much as Cal loves baseball and will always love baseball, Saturday was all about it and had nothing to do with it at the same time. Saturday was about Cal Ripken, and there is a lot of Cal Ripken that doesn't necessarily thrive on the game.

"One question I've been repeatedly asked these last few weeks is how do I want to be remembered," Ripken said as he addressed the crowd. "My answer is simple: To be remembered at all is pretty special. I might also add, that if I am remembered, I hope it's because by living my dream I was able to make a difference."

Maybe a star didn't die Saturday night. When it's cloudy out, you know, stars still shine, they shine just as bright as ever, it's just tough to find them.

Cal's still out there, probably back in Aberdeen, shining brighter than ever—you just have to look a little harder now.

Bison fall 5-1 to American

Men's soccer surrenders two goals in first 10 minutes in second League defeat

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Brian Johnson '03 sets the ball up as the Bison fall to American 5-1.

The men's soccer team lost their first home game of the season to American University this past Sunday. The Bison was outscored 5-1 in their second Patriot League match of the year. American came out very strong in the first half of play, and they were able to capitalize early. The Eagles scored three goals in the first 24 minutes of the match.

"We came out really slow and had sporadic mental breakdowns during crucial moments of the game. Our play was extremely inconsistent," freshman Dennis DeLuca said.

Adam Rosen scored the first goal just four minutes into the game to give the Eagles the early lead. Six minutes later Kris Bertsch put the ball past Bucknell's outstretched goalie, Steve Whitaker '04. Bertsch scored from 20 yards out for his second of the game and put the Eagles up 3-0 at halftime.

"They're a very good team. We knew American was going to be the most skilled team we would play all year," Deluca said.

American University recently abandoned the Colonial Athletic Association (CAA) and its athletic teams are now participating in the Patriot League. American allowed athletic scholarships in their previous conference and continues to do so in the Patriot League. As a non-athletic scholarship school, Bucknell will always have a disadvantage heading into play against schools like American.

The Bison exemplified better play in the second half, despite the Eagles two quick goals in the first 10 minutes. They out shot American 6-4, but only managed to score one goal. Alex Far '05 buried a pass from junior Tom Ryan 25 yards out from the net. The last 10 minutes was filled with numerous goal-scoring opportunities, but the American defense was able to fend the Bison off for the 5-1 win.

"The end of the game looked more positive for us. We settled down, possessed the ball more, and it resulted in a goal. We would have stood a chance, if we had played the entire game like we did at the end," DeLuca said.

"Right now they are at a higher level than we are. Going into the game we wanted to slow them down, get them out of an attack mode, and passing the ball rather than shooting. We thought if we made it a 65-70 minutes game we could try to sneak out a victory," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

The team has been struggling to find a way to win all fall. Midseason is around the corner, but the frustration has not led into desperation. "We are struggling right now and need to keep working to find our groove. We can change this around but we need to clean up our mistakes. It seems our mistakes are leading directly to goals. It usually is not one mistake, but a series of mistakes. As a team we need to do a better job a helping one another," Nash said.

Nash is waiting for more leadership to surface. He is demanding more responsibility from his players and believes this will assuage some of the team's frustration.

"We are looking for leaders to emerge. Andy [Aurand '02] is our only captain and we need the others to step up and take some of the burden off of him. Last year our seniors did a great job of leading on and off the field. It did not matter who had the captain's band, they all took ownership of the team. Our team is looking for leadership and it is too much for 1 person to handle," Nash said.

The Orange and Blue move to a 2-6 non-conference record and a 0-2 record in the Patriot League. They travel to Jersey City, N.J. Oct. 10 to battle St. Peter's. The next home game will be against Lehigh Saturday, Oct. 13 at 1:00p.m.

"We have six games in a row at home. During that time we need to find the right combinations of lineups, system of play and basically who is going to win the games for us," Nash said.

Equestrian team wins N.J. horse show

Riders finish as High Point Team in first Intercollegiate horse show

On Sunday, September 30, the equestrian team traveled to Briarwood Farm in Readington, N.J. to compete in its first Intercollegiate horse show of the semester.

The BUET took its brand new region by storm, finishing the day as High Point Team, over Princeton, Rutgers, Bloomsburg, East Stroudsburg, Kutztown, Scranton, Cedar Crest, and Lehigh.

In order for a team to win at an Intercollegiate horse show, riders in all of the various levels of classes have to do well because they are awarded a certain number of points for the ribbons that they receive.

"Our team really rose to the occasion," President Amanda Gaynor '02 said. "Intercollegiate riding is tough, because you travel to different barns and ride horses you have never ridden before without any time to warm up. Our team has been practicing really hard and it paid off."

What makes Intercollegiate riding so special is that you can be a beginner and still play a major role in the success of the team.

Heather Mazzanti '04 won the walk/trot class, a class designed for riders who have never competed before.

Edward Burke '04 came in second, Jaime McGlynn '04 placed fourth, and Kristin Seyboth '02 finished fifth in the same walk/trot class.

"We're fortunate to have such talented and motivated beginners on our team. Riding in complicated and takes a lot of patience, but these four newcomers to the sport really took on the challenge," Co-Captain Sara Figoski '03 said.

Lauren Kennihan '04, Caitlin Rothacker '05, Whitney Scott '03 and Figoski also won their respective classes, in levels ranging from demonstrating basic skills, to jumping over an intricate course of fences.

The Bucknell Equestrian Team's next competition is Sunday, Oct. 28 in New Jersey where they will fight to keep their title as IHSA Zone III Region IV champions.

N. F. L. Predictions

Justin McCarthy

(9-6)

Tampa Bay (2-1) at Tennessee (0-3)
The Titans, dominant the past two seasons, have been forced to the bottom with injuries to a number of key players. The Bucs, on the other hand, are looking as competitive as ever. They now have a half decent QB to lead their offense. The Bucs are still a ground control team however, which is apparent in the fact that B. Johnson has yet to throw a TD pass, yet, he has completed over 70percent of his passes. The Bucs will have an easy time with the injury riddled Titans.

Oakland (3-1) at Indianapolis (2-1)
The Raiders are the highest scoring team in the AFC, however, they are going against the best overall offense in the NFL. The Raiders defense better copy the Patriots strategy against the Colts last week; stop the run and pressure Manning (basically textbook defensive strategy). Manning already has seven INTs in three games, while only having 15 last year. Both teams rely on the pass too much and the Raiders possess a clear advantage in the secondary in Woodson and Dorsett. However, I am going to go with my gut and my sport's mentality and say the Colts in an offense barrage.

New York Giants (3-1) at St. Louis (4-0)
Can anyone say playoff matchup? These two teams are division winners, suck it up Philly and Tampa fans. The Rams, possess the top offense in the NFC and surprisingly a defense ranked fourth in the NFC, a huge turnaround from last season. The Giants are a defensive team and better hope that they are able to pressure the Rams into turnovers and mistakes. New York's offense is in dismal shape, Dayne and Barber are both coming off injuries (if they even play) and Collins has struggled so far. The Rams get the W.

Baltimore (3-1) at Green Bay (3-1)
Super Bowl Champions versus former Super Bowl Champions. This game will be a defensive battle, the Ravens showcase the top defense in the league while the Packers are third best. The Packers possess the better offense; however, I said that last week about them when I picked them and then they lost to Tampa. For that reason ALONE, I am going to pick the Ravens. Plus I hate cheese.

Cleveland (3-1) at Cincinnati (2-2)
Two former bottom dwellers in the AFC central, turned "contenders" (loose definition) to make the playoffs. The Browns are coming off a huge win against the Chargers and have a lot of momentum, however, the Bengals have lost two in a row and will be hungry for a victory, especially against a division rival. The Bengals if they hope to defeat Couch and his Browns will need a huge game out of Corey Dillon, because Kitna, unlike Couch, cannot carry the team with his arm. Browns win and stay on pace Baltimore for the division lead.

Tampa Bay (2-1) at Tennessee (0-3)
Tennessee just sucks man. Like, when was the last time they were in the playoffs? Like last year? Come on... what have they done lately? They've sucked, that's what they've done. And added to that, how come Steve McNair is getting all the chicks? How come the starting quarterback of the Tennessee Titans who has led the team deep into the playoffs two years in a row and has great complexion can get girls and me, a sensitive, caring guy sits home on Friday nights weeping into a bottle of... milk. Eh, I ain't complaining. But Tampa Bay out of spite. Take that pretty boy McNair.

Oakland (3-1) at Indianapolis (2-1)
Okay, how many oak trees do you think there really are in Oakland. I'm wagering like five, which is about how many collective brain cells you would probably find on a football team. It's a good thing the cheerleaders raise the curve or we may have to stop and think whether or not we're paying these people too much. And as for Indianapolis, where is that? I don't think Harrison Ford lives there, so what's the point? You're right, there is none. I apologize. Oakland.

New York Giants (3-1) at St. Louis (4-0)
Barry Bonds is the most selfish, stuck up, wannabe poser in the world. He is a cancerous growth on the team and no one likes him. I rank him with Bobby Bonilla, Rickey Henderson, Carl Everett and John Rocker. But Jeff Kent, he's a class act. You don't get more highbrow than that. This man makes Sean Connery look like Kull the Conqueror. Oh, wait... these are football predictions aren't they. Ah well, you get the idea. St Louis by 75 points.

Baltimore (3-1) at Green Bay (3-1)
How exactly do you spell Brett's last name? It's spelled Favre but pronounced Farve. Way to give your child an identity complex. I suppose it's better than my plan to name my child Tom but spell it B-O-B. I pick Green Bay but I'm going to spell it B-A-L-T-I-M-O-R-E S-U-C-K-S.

Cleveland (3-1) at Cincinnati (2-2)
Cleveland and Cincinnati. A match made in a refinery in Jersey. This showdown is the most anticipated showdown since Zach Morris and A.C. Slater fought over Kelly. That episode taught us all a lesson about respecting other people's space. Or do you remember that episode when Lisa broke her leg and was on crutches for the prom and Screech took her out and they invented the new dance, "the hop?" Neither do I. Browns.

Athlete of the Week: Becki Marshall '02

By Pat Evans
Senior Writer

Katherine Thompson—The Bucknellian
Becki Marshall '02 won the ECAC runner of the week award.

Pasta the night before and bagels and power bars around three hours before the race.

"That's what I eat, but that's pretty much average for runners," Becki Marshall '02 said.

Average eating has certainly not produced average results for the Cross Country superstar. So if it's not the food that has produced the Patriot League's best runner, what is it?

"Becki shows a lot of perseverance, never misses her morning runs, and does the little stuff," Head Coach Kevin Donner says. "And that's why she's so successful."

Marshall helped the Bison win the Lock Haven Invitational, finishing first in the 3.8-mile run with a 22:17.25 time, over a full minute faster than her nearest competitor. Her running has earned her the ECAC Cross-Country Runner-of-the-Week award for the second time of this young season.

"I'd like to defend my Patriot League title if I can," she says. "But our most important goal is doing well in Nationals."

Bucknell has won the Patriot League championship every year of Marshall's career, and last year the Bison won the ECAC Championships and placed fourth in the NCAA Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships. With strong training, she believes that her final year will be just as successful, if not more.

"After this past weekend, we're looking very strong as a team," she said.

Marshall's strong self-motivation as well as the help she's received along the way have made her run stronger than she's ever run before, and will be a deciding factor if the Bison want to accomplish more than ever before.

"When I'm running I think about how hard I've worked, and about my coach and family," she said.

Donner couldn't be happier with his senior leader, who last weekend continued her winning ways with a season-best 21:34:21 time, placing her eighth of 269 competitors. Her team placed second of the 39 at the Paul Short Memorial held at Lehigh University.

"Becki is a tremendous team leader," Donner said. "I have never met anyone who is so positive all the time, which really makes things enjoyable for the team."

With their leader and best runner improving day by day, it will be tough for the Bison not to achieve the high standards that they have set for themselves.

Honorable Mention:
Michael Lookingland II '05 won the Patriot League Rookie-of-the-Week on the week ending Sept. 30. He has a team high of two goals. This is the first time he has received the Rookie-of-the-Week honor.

Shannon Walker '02 won the ECAC Player-of-the-Week award this past week, as well as Patriot League Player-of-the-Week last week. She tallied 59 kills in three games and has pulled within 41 kills of second place Emily Pomeroy on Bucknell's all-time kills list.

Cross country teams take first at Loch Haven Invitational

By Jenny Ross

The cross-country teams rested their top finishers from a meet the week before and still swept the competition on Sept. 29 in the Lock Haven Invitational. The men's squad, with a score of 32, defeated five other teams and the women acquired a score of 41 points to place first among five schools.

After a two-weekend rest, Becki Marshall '02 won the women's 3.8-mile race and her time of 22:17:25 was over a full minute faster than her nearest competitor. The next four Bison to cross the line were Michelle Baylor '03 who was fourth among the 53 runners, Cecily Cairns '04 placing 7th, Jennifer Marsh '05 finishing 14th, and finally Katie Fantauzzo who placed 16th.

For the men, three runners broke the top ten. Their top finisher was Stephen Schaeffer '04 who placed fifth out of 69 men with a time of 26:08:33 on the five mile course.

Following Schaeffer was classmate Aaron Hanlon '04 who placed 8th, Garfield Mathis '03 who finished ninth, Matias Palavecino '03 placing 11th and Ken Holroyd '04 the 13th place finisher.

This past weekend both Bison squads continued their success while each placed second in a field of 39 schools at the Lehigh University Aardvark-Mizuno Paul Short Run.

The men's team, who finished only behind Penn State for the team title, acquired a score of 135 points. Leading the way was the Bison's top runner, Greg Costello '03, who finished ninth out of the 274 runners crossing the finish line in 25:04:53. He shaved 52 seconds off of his previous season-best time.

Rounding out the teams scoring was Bryan Johnston '03 who also broke the top 25 by placing 17th with a season best of 25:14:94.

P.J. Ward '02 finished 30th with a time of 25:35:59 on the five-mile course followed by Travis Etters '02 who placed 41st with a 25:44:52 time. Lou Palma '03 was the last scoring runner for the Bison finishing 43rd in 25:46:41.

Like the men, the women's team fell short to only Penn State, but my a mere 14 points, for the team title.

As usual, by Becki Marshall '02 led the Bison to victory placed eighth of 269 challengers with a time of 21:34:21 on the 3.8-mile course, a season best. Marshall was only 26 seconds behind the race's winner.

Theresa Dennis '03 followed Marshall, placing 12th with a time of 21:39:80.

The seniors finished out the Bison's scoring, Chris Crowe '02 placed 19th in 21:52:37, Kelly McConnell '02 was 38th in 22:18:33 and Kristen Ferrell '02 crossed the finish like 51st in 22:29:76.

Both the men and the women will send their top seven runners to the Pre-NCAA meet at Furman University in South Carolina this Saturday, Oct. 13.

Students anticipate change in athletic complex

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
The athletic complex will re-open in fall of 2002.

With the new complex, there will be quite an increase in the amount of time that the Bucknell community will be able to use the different facilities for recreational purposes. Also, with the introduction of the snack bar and the new fitness center equipment, there will be more to do there then ever before.

As far as pool recreational time, instead of merely having lap swimming, which there will be more time for now, and the occasional water aerobics classes, there will now be time for diving boards, and perhaps some instructional swim times.

"I can't wait to be able to just go to the pool and go off the diving boards and just play around with my friends, without the lane lines getting in the way," Charles Ryland '04 said.

As far as the addition of the new athletic equipment, there will be some new Hammer Strength equipment brought in as well as new cardio equipment.

"I'm really excited for the Hammer Strength equipement. From previous experience I like it a lot better than the Cybex," Jeffrey Thomson '04 said

The biggest change in recreational time will be the availability of the gymnasium for sports such as basketball.

"I'm really excited for there to by more recreational gym time because with my busy schedule it is hard to find time to just go and shoot around. This will definitely help a lot" Lauren Cianciotta '04 said.

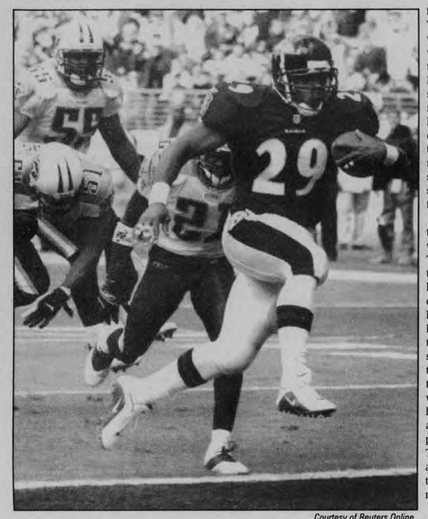
NFL unpredictability helping some and hindering others



Courtesy of Reuters Online

The Ravens will be without the injured Jamal Lewis (29) this year.

By Rob Schmicker
Staff Writer

When told of my assignment for the week, I figured writing about the NFL would be easy. After all, this is the NFL, where endless story lines arrive every week. But after thorough brainstorming efforts, I am still at a loss. It seems as if every newsworthy story has become twisted or scrambled in some bizarre way. Just when it seems as if one team will show itself to be dominant, they lose to a lesser team. The current parody has made the NFL very unpredictable.

Lets start in the AFC West with the San Diego Chargers who finished 1-15 last year. In the offseason, the Chargers signed Doug Flutie, who was let go by the Buffalo Bills in favor of Rob Johnson. While Flutie has provided leadership, rookie LaDainian Tomlinson has taken the league by storm with 412 yards and six touchdowns through four weeks. The duo has provided the Chargers offense with a much-needed kickstart and as a result the Chargers have tripled their win total from last year. But just when it looked like too good to be true, they lost to the hapless Cleveland Browns.

The Browns, who finished with two wins last year hired Coach Butch Davis from the University of Miami and have quietly won three in a row. Rookie Running Back James Jackson has helped take some of the pressure off of QB Tim Couch, who is leading the offense even though he is not throwing for a lot of yards. Add in a tough defense that has taken on Davis's personality, and Cleveland is quietly on the top of the AFC Central. Who could have imagined that?

The upstart Browns and Chargers haven't been the only surprises, though, as several of the contenders have taken a trip through the Twilight Zone.

Baltimore lost to Cincinnati before destroying the mighty Tennessee Titans 27-6 last week. They are now 3-1, while the Titans don't appear to be so mighty after all. The holders of the best regular season record last year, Tennessee is now 0-3, and will have to play inspired football down to stretch if they want to make the playoffs. Baltimore on the other hand, seems to have finally hit their stride after struggling in the first few weeks.

In the East, Miami rolled to a 2-0 start with impressive victories over Oakland and Tennessee. The NFL quickly took notice of the suddenly hot Dolphins, who were then quickly extinguished the following week by the St Louis Rams. Their division rivals, the Indianapolis Colts also started 2-0, before losing to the pitiful New England Patriots. What made the loss worse was that the Patriots held the Colts to 13 points, after they averaged 43.5 points in the first two weeks. The Colts are just getting over a bye week and look to take their anger out on Oakland next week.

While the AFC has been as unpredictable as Dennis Rodman's next hair color, the NFC has been a little less crazy as St Louis is on top in the West and the Giants are in first in the East. But as in the AFC, confusion arises in the Central.

The biggest mystery is the Minnesota Vikings, who were last seen on the wrong side of a 41-0 drubbing in the NFC Championship. While their offense could do nothing against the Giants in December, there was no chance that the Carolina Panthers could equal the Giants feat in the opening week.

Now I presume most of you have seen the movie Any Given Sunday where Al Pacino's character, Tony DiMato is often heard saying, "On any given Sunday, you're gonna win or you're gonna lose...."

He couldn't have been more right, as rookie Chris Weinke led Carolina to a 24-13 win. The following week Minnesota showed that there loss wasn't a fluke, with a loss to the Chicago Bears, who are hardly the team we once knew.

Since then Minnesota has upset Tampa Bay, who then went on to defeat the undefeated Green Bay Packers 14-10 this week.

Does anyone want to take control of the division? The Bears would like to be the ones after an impressive 3-1 start, but they will need some luck since their offense is well below average. Rookies Anthony Thomas and David Terrell will be the keys if Chicago is to keep on rolling.

Meanwhile, in the city of Brotherly Love, the Eagles were stunned Sunday by the Arizona Cardinals. Cards Quarterback Jake Plummer led Arizona to an improbable fourth quarter comeback, his fifth all time versus Philadelphia.

Arizona is one of the teams that the Eagles will need to beat if they want to dethrone the Giants in the East. But, as we have seen anything is possible in the NFL.

The Giants and Eagles still have to play twice against Dallas, Washington and Arizona who although are a combined 1-10 always seem to pose a threat to their division rivals.

That just about wraps up this confusing and tiring look at the NFL through four weeks. The upcoming week should definitely help clear up the NFL as we see it.

Some pretenders may be ready to run out of steam, while others may do a lot to help convince us that they belong at the top. One thing to remember is that anything can happen. Expect just about anything.

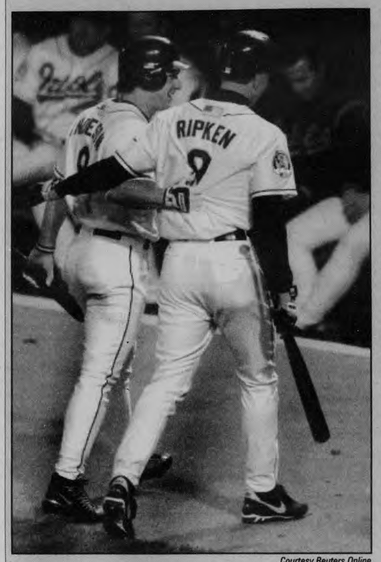
Anderson and Ripken share goodbyes after 2001 season



Courtesy Reuters Online

Brady and Cal prepare to part ways after Cal's last MLB game.

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

"I'll make that happen."

That was Brady Anderson's promise to his best friend, moments before he stepped out into the on-deck circle in the ninth inning of the Baltimore Orioles' last game of the 2001 season. When it became apparent that he would need to reach base for Cal Ripken to get another plate appearance, Anderson turned to his teammate and asked if he wanted one more chance to swing the bat, to which the Iron Man nodded "yes." "OK," replied Anderson, "I'll make that happen."

So Anderson strode out to the plate with two outs in the ninth, ready to swing his way on base. The crowd, begging for one last chance to see Ripken at the plate, gave Anderson a roaring ovation—perhaps the loudest standing ovation a crowd has ever given a .202 hitter.

For Anderson, it would have otherwise been a meaningless at-bat. It was a futile finish to a dismal season, in which he struggled with a sub-.200 average for the bulk of the year, plunking out a paltry eight home runs in the process. With the season beyond the hope of resurrection, and his team down by four runs, it would have merely been a formality.

But it was not his own average, or the score, or even his own dignity, that concerned him. Rather, it was the man in the on-deck circle.

Anderson joined the Orioles in 1988. Ripken, by that time, was the team's poster-boy, an All-Star, and well on his way to becoming a baseball legend. Anderson was only three-and-a-half years younger than the stunning shortstop, but had only just broken into the Majors earlier that year.

Still, it didn't take long for the All-Star and the unproven rookie to bond, and they've been there for each other ever since.

Between then and now, Ripken has done nothing but impress. Anderson watched him break an "unbreakable" record. Brady was there when the Iron Man finally reached the coveted milestones of 400 home runs and 3000 hits. He watched the nation fall head over heels for his teammate, while he himself was blessed with one brilliant season, and a few decent ones - between that and his classic good looks, he managed to earn a small fan base of his own.

Thirteen years later, Ripken was still the legend and the poster-boy, and Anderson was still in his shadow, and by some accounts, still unproven. And they're still best friends.

After years of benefiting from Ripken's team leadership and carefully thought-out advice, Anderson was given the opportunity to be the hero for his friend. Right there, beneath the lights of Camden Yards, surrounded by affection, enveloped by the overwhelming din of a crowd possessed by love for a player—albeit another player— Anderson had the ultimate chance for redemption.

And he whiffed.

Nobody booed. Nobody cursed. Nobody even groaned. They just watched in silence, and slight disbelief, as Anderson hung his head and turned back to the dugout.

For that small moment, probably all that ran through his head was the fact that he had let his friend—and 50,000 baseball fans—down. And maybe it crossed his mind that his bat's big gulp of air, that clumsy strikeout, was most likely his last at-bat as an Oriole.

But Ripken, standing in the on-deck circle, his storied career now over, wasn't disappointed in his friend. As Anderson walked by, Ripken reached over, patted him on the head and told him it was alright. The two walked back to the dugout with their arms around each other, their numbers, eight and nine, beside each other for the last time.

Ripken will go on to the Hall of Fame and subsequent immortality. Anderson will most likely be dropped by the team, and will fade into relative obscurity. He won't leave the same void that Ripken will; not a lot of people will sit around with their grandkids and reminisce about the "Brady Anderson days".

But before we criticize Anderson for his failure to deliver on Saturday night, we should try to put it in perspective. We should remember the decade he spent as an above-average contributor to the lineup.

We ought to keep in mind that no one wanted that last pitch to be hit as much as he did. And perhaps most importantly, we should remember that, while men like Cal Ripken may inspire us to believe otherwise sometimes, ballplayers are just human. It can't always end perfectly.

Somebody has to be the last out.

Ultimately, it may have been an appropriate ending, despite the way it may have come across to fans. When all is said and done, it was simply a privilege to see two inseparable friends, batting one after the other in the lineup, spending one last evening in that dugout together - spending the last minutes of the game standing on the same diamond, one at the plate and one in the on-deck circle, waiting to walk off the field one last time.

That it didn't end perfectly doesn't make it any less special.

Art Gulden: An alumnus' perspective

By Glenn McLaughlin '74
Contributing Writer

Art Gulden's memory lives on in the hearts of thse who were here when he first arrived.

There was a time when I thought I would never get old, it always seemed too far away. And there was a time when I could not conceive that anyone really close to me would ever die. As I sat and listened to Jeff Greenfield's commencement address this past May, I realized that both of those times had finally arrived. It had been 30 years since I first met him and Art Gulden had just died.

Art and I were "freshmen" together in Aug. of 1970. I was never going to run again, he was going to build an empire. Only one of us held to our original game plan, and that made all the difference to me. Contrary to what many might think, Art Gulden was never another father to me. I already had one of those and he was quite good at it. Art was only 10 years older than I, so he could have been the older brother I never had. But really, he was just my coach. And that became his name, to all those who ran for him and all of those who came to know him along the way. Even in a time when success is more than ever measured by fame, money and possessions, his title of "coach" is nothing small and actually, as it describes the man, is bigger than them all.

He was not a saint. Early on, he would not have stood out as different at a frat party. He was not the easiest person to get along with as a friend recently reminded me. But, as they say, he had a way about him. That way was passion. Passion can be frightening if it is true because true passion expects something in return from you. It sneaks around your barriers and walls and challenges you to be something other than what you thought you could be. It says that if you believe, you can rise to levels no one ever thought you could achieve, not even yourself in your wildest dreams.

That first fall day, a good part of the cross country team could not make it around the golf course, less than the distance of a race, without walking. The only field house was Davis Gym. The indoor track was not even a daydream, it was a soccer field. The track in the stadium was cinders not synthetic, more the purview of football than track. There was no string of league championships to look back on, no national invitations to look forward to and there wasn't even a women's program, except of course for Val. I don't even think there had been a "win" in recent memory. There were no traditions. There were no nifty sweats and shoes. Forget nifty, we didn't even have stuff that matched except for the grays we got from the gym. There had not been a full time track coach in years. And I'm sure there was no clear vision of the future other than it had to be better than this.

I'm not certain why they hired him. Maybe he was cheap because he was young. Maybe it was his vision. I like to think the latter is true because when he arrived, everything changed. Each day was an adventure, for him and for us. Each day we learned something new about ourselves, both him and us. We all worked hard. Cross country training weeks soon exceeded 100 miles each, with no walking. Indoor track arrived in the form of a 160 yard wooden oval, made of 2X4's cut, creosoted and painted by Coach and the team. The physical plant did the final construction following plans that I think Coach won in a poker game. The track was set up on the soccer field. Granted, that was outdoors, not indoors, and the winter months required that we shovel it off before we could practice, but those were just details. It made us better he said. I thought it just made us cold but in the end, we all knew he was right.

Cross Country and Track have always been regarded by the uninitiated as individual sports. Just about everyone can run so all you do is go out and put one foot in front of the other as fast as you can. But those who have competed know there is more to it than that. Still, even those who had been around for a while marveled at what Coach taught. He developed a philosophy of "team" that while not necessarily unique in concept, was thoroughly unique in application. It didn't matter if you were world class or barely made the JV team in high school, if you came to practice every day, you were on the team. If you were on the team, you had a role to play. The strong helped the weaker and everyone cheered for everyone else at meets. Strength, individual and communal, grew from a belief in the team, Coach's forever message. Reaching higher, beyond your self-imposed limits, was easier because someone was always there to catch you. He tried to be that someone for everyone, but we all helped. Believing in yourself and believing in the team became intertwined. As long as you did your best and lived by his simple rules, you would never be cut from the team. In Division 1 sports, that is a remarkably unique statement.

And therein lies the beauty of the man. It may have taken him a bit to figure out Bucknell, but he always knew what coaching was about. It was as much teaching as what Jack Wheatcroft did in an English course or what Chuck Root did in a chemistry lab. They were all masters of their craft because beyond the obvious grasp of their respective fields of study, they understood that the real joy, the real challenge of teaching, is reaching inside the student to search for that little bit more. That was how they could share their own spark, the lesson they had learned, that life is a bit more than just walking around and making money and breathing air. What's the point if you don't make the most of what you have been given and make a difference while you are here?

I can't say that Coach touched everyone this way but I do know he wanted to. I'll never know if he originally thought that Bucknell would just be a stepping stone to something bigger. I know he was tempted to leave a few times, but the place, and the people, had become too much of his own fabric. The coaching flame even faded a bit once or twice when he felt his touch with the team weaken. Yet there was always someone or something that got him back on his path.

Seven years ago, the flame soared highest when he was told that he would likely succumb to the cancer spreading in him. He did but that is only part of the story because it was after the diagnosis that the desire to make the most of his time burned more intensely than ever before. I visited soon after that, after he recovered from surgery and chemotherapy, and watched as he went through part of his day. As people came and went, he joked and argued, counseled and listened, orchestrated and took direction. Our time was cut short by some unexpected problem he had to attend to but as I was leaving, having seen again the admiration and respect and love for the man, I said, "You know, you are a very lucky guy." He smiled and said, "I know."

He taught me new things and reminded me of things I already knew. He taught me to eat carnations, just the white ones though, because you just can't be serious all of the time. He shared that sitting on a porch swing with a friend, not talking but just looking at the corn grow, isn't a waste of time at all. At his memorial service, I was struck by how many he had touched and how they all felt compelled to be there. It was certainly many hundreds, maybe a thousand, that we saw when a classmate of mine said that one of the most amazing qualities of Coach was his ability to make you feel like one of his best friends. It wasn't an act, he said, it was just him. My friend said that even though he knew that he wasn't in Coach's top 10, if there even was a top 10, it didn't matter because whenever he saw him, even with years in between, it was like they had always been together and the time just melted away.

I left that day with another lesson reconfirmed: you are not always born into a family, you can find one through the common bond of experience. Those who competed for Art Gulden feel that bond, runners and field athletes alike, and that's why they all returned on that day in May.

MLB Playoff Picks

By Scott Kloss
Staff Writer

Another storybook season has ended with its share of surprises and milestones broken. While I was disappointed to see that my Mets did not pull out the impossible, I have come up a cliff notes version of the first round series match-ups.

Braves vs. Astros

Braves: "The Braves know they're heading for this particular October invitational favored by no one except themselves. But if they're going to do that underdog dance, they'll be dancing as one of the most dangerous underdogs of all time" analyst Jason Stark of ESPN.com said. The Braves may have conquered the East once again, but with an 88-74 record, can the wheels be coming off the once dominant team of the '90s?

Astros: The Astros battled for their division until season's final day, with the Astros defeating St. Louis to clinch their fourth pennant in five years. They are lead by pitchers Roy Oswald and Wade Miller. Both experiencing the big dance for the first time, Oswalt, 24, went 14-2 for the season and Miller, 25, went 16-7 showing that experience doesn't hold all the cards. Jeff Bagwell must improve on his 5-for-39 (.128) in his postseason career to guide the Astros to the next round.

Prediction: The Astros has never actually won a playoff series, while the Buffalo Bills of MLB, the tomahawk chopping Atlanta Braves, are returning for the 10th straight time to October baseball. The Braves will take it in four. Houston has failed to make it past the NLDS in each of its previous three trips to the playoffs and was knocked out by the Braves in 1997 and 1999. The Braves always find a way to squeak by and this year won't be any different.

Cardinals vs. Diamondbacks.

Cardinals: Lead by 22 game-winner Matt Morris and super slugger Albert Pujols, the Cardinals have the best of both world. Had the Cardinals just won their last regular-season game, they would have had home-field advantage in all three postseason series. Instead, they had to get on a plane and fly 1,500 miles to Arizona, where Schilling and the Big Unit formed their very special welcoming committee.This is a tough team, and that might not matter. But the Cardinals did have the best home record in the National League (54-28)—and the worst road record of any of the eight playoff teams (39-41).

Diamondbacks: Curt Schilling and Randy Johnson combined for 43 regular season wins. Curt gets the call on day one. Although he was one of the top pitchers in the major leagues this season, he allowed 37 home runs, tied with San Diego's Kevin Jarvis for the most in the NL. But that won't matter since they'd have to catch up to his fastball to connect and the Cardinals aren't going to find much success there.

Prediction: Diamondbacks in four. When you look up and down the roster you see the Diamondbacks winning at each position. Mark Grace, Jay Bell and Matt Williams are solid players that know what it is to play in the big game.

Mariners vs. Cleveland

Mariners: Explosive, fun to watch and most importantly smart, the Seattle has a new rock band by the name of 'Mariner Domination.' It doesn't matter what your winning percentage was during the season; if you don't win it all in the postseason, you will not be regarded among the best teams of all time. As Seattle pitcher Paul Abbott said, fans outside Seattle will finally start talking about the Mariners being one of the best teams of all time "if we win the ring."

Cleveland: Bartolo Colon will lead the Indians as much as his right arm can muster, but is that enough? Rookie C.C. Sabathia, won 17 games this season but is only 1-1 with a 4.18 ERA in four career postseason starts. The question will be can the 'tribe' raise their level play matching their predecessors in the movie 'Major League'.

Prediction: The Mariners were the best team in the regular season tallying 116 wins, while the Indians, despite having the worst record of any AL playoff team, with their postseason experience makes them a formidable foe. Cleveland is making its sixth appearance in the last seven years.

Mariners in three. I'm not a betting man, (mom it was Rich and he gave the money to charity), but not many people are betting against the Mariners. They don't have a major weakness and adapt to each teams style of play.

Yankees vs. Athletics:

Yanks: My question to them is do you get bored winning the title year in and year out? I guess not, and as evidence the Yanks have a solid team once again vying for the coveted championship. "The Rocket," Roger Clemens, leads an all-star cast of pitchers including Andy Pettitte, Mike Mussina and Mariano Rivera to keep Oakland at Bay.

Athletics: They're flying into the playoffs, having won six in a row. They haven't lost two in a row since Aug. 23-24. The A's finished the second half of the season in torrid fashion with a record of (58-17) which was topped only by the 1954 Indians (55-16). With a healthy Mark Mulder with the Rosen bag, Miguel Tejada and the Giamba brothers driving in runs, the Yanks may be feeling green soon.

Prediction: The Yanks were almost dethroned by the A's last year. The question is can the Athletics finish the job this term.

Yanks in five. This series will come down to 5 due to the skill and determination exhibited by both clubs. I expect a low scoring, pitchers duel to dictate much of the games. The Yankees are a team that turns it on when it counts. After a slow opening to the season, the Yanks have turned the jets on at exactly the time to bring home another title.

Fight the "Dawson's Creek" and "Buffy" fans to catch some of these opening round match-ups starting Tuesday.

Copyright act is reported to violate the first amendment

By Matthew Casper
Staff Writer

Few laws in recent years have provoked more controversy than the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA). Enacted in 1998, the purpose of the bill is to extend copyright protection to digital media, most notably, MP3s.

One of the most troublesome parts of the DMCA reads as follows: "No person shall manufacture, import, offer to the public, provide, or otherwise traffic in any technology, product, service, device, component, or part thereof, that is primarily designed or produced for the purpose of circumventing a technological measure that effectively controls access to a work protected under this title."

In other words, it is illegal to create or distribute any program or technique that can decrypt protected media. While there is a later section that claims that reverse engineering and encryption research is allowed under the DMCA, the conditions under which such acts would be allowed are not useful. An example of this is seen in the case of Edward Felten, Associate Professor of Computer Science at Princeton University.

In September of 2000, a challenge was issued by the Secure Digital Music Initiative organization to the general public. The SDMI organization, a partnership between the Recording Industry Association of America and several technology firms, was developing a way to ensure that digital music files could not be copied without permission, or played in devices that do not adhere to the standards issued by the SDMI.

They had developed several different methods which they believed would protect digital music files from unauthorized use by including a digital 'watermark' which would be recognizable to software that knew to look for it, but would have no effect on the playback of the file. They challenged the public to download samples of these protected files, and to find a way to 'break' the protection without significantly affecting the sound quality of the file.

Felten and a team of researchers formed one of the "teams" in the contest, and eventually found ways to crack all four watermarking schemes without noticeably affecting the sound quality.

Instead of continuing onto the second round of the contest, which would have required them to sign non-disclosure agreements, Felten and his team decided to publish the results of their study at the fourth Annual Information Hiding Workshop. This workshop was a symposium of researchers in the field of "information hiding", or the hiding of data in an unrelated collection of data - in this case, hiding a watermark in a music file.

According to princeton.edu, when the SDMI organization heard of this, the Organization and Recording Industry Association of America contacted Felten and insisted that he not publish the paper. They informed him that they considered the publication of his research a violation of the DMCA, and that they planned to prosecute him and his team.

Felten brought his case to various groups on the Internet, and attempted to disseminate his story as widely as possible. The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EEF), a group which, among other causes, seeks to insure that First Amendment rights are protected on the Internet, agreed to take on the responsibility of defending Felten in court.

Surprised by the public backlash against them and the DMCA, the SDMI organization quickly sent another letter to Felten, stating that they had never seriously considered taking him to court, and that they respected the right of an academic professor to publish research findings.

Citing the first letter to Felten, the EFF is currently seeking to get a federal court to declare that Felten has the legal right to present his finding. If this attempt is successful, it will demonstrate a flaw in the DMCA, which violates First Amendment protections that, some hope, will result in the DMCA being revised or struck down.

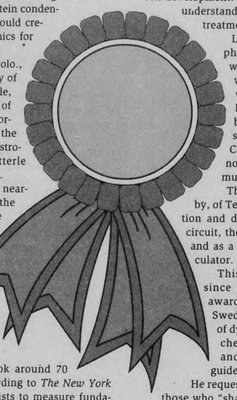
According to freesklyarov.org, Professor Felten's case certainly is not the only case of a researcher prosecuted by the DMCA. Another notable case is that of Dimitry Sklyarov, a Russian Ph. D. candidate, who presented his findings on the encryption used in Adobe's eBooks at a conference, and was promptly arrested by the FBI.

While there is much loose talk, online and elsewhere, of large corporations attempting to stifle the rights of individuals, particularly the right to free expression, Professor Felten's case seems to demonstrate that there are laws in the books that can and have been used to limit the expression of people.

Nobel prize winners unveil new state of matter

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

Two Americans and a German scientist won the 2001 Nobel Prize for physics for creating a new ultra-cold gas called Bose-Einstein condensate in 1995. This discovery could create smaller and faster electronics for the future.



Erin Cornell, of Boulder, Colo., Carl Wieman, of the University of Colorado and Wolfgang Ketterle, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, won $943,000. Cornell and Wieman worked at the Joint Institute for Laboratory Astrophysics together, while Ketterle studied in Germany until 1990.

"I discovered that I'm not nearly as excited about winning the prize as I was about seeing the Bose-Einstein condensate for the first time," Wieman said.

"The biggest reward is to make discoveries, the thrill of seeing new glimpses of nature. Of course, it's nice to be recognized," Ketterle said.

The discovery, which took around 70 years to piece together, according to The New York Times, will now allow scientists to measure fundamental properties of matter. It will also bring advances in fields like precision measurement and nanotechnology.

According to www.salon.com, the term Bose-Einstein refers to Indian physicist, S.N. Bose, as well as Albert Einstein. Bose did research on photons and sent his work to Einstein, who extended Bose's theory to cover mass. Einstein found that particles can produce a new state of matter when they slow down and approach each other.

The Nobel medicine awards were given to American researcher, Leland H. Hartwell and British scientists, Tim Hunt and Paul Nurse, for their work on cell development. Their work helps researchers understand how cancer spreads and new treatments to prevent it.

Last year, the Nobel Prize for physics was split between two winning projects, according to www.salon.com. One half went to Zhores I. Alferov of St. Petersburg, Russia, and Herbert Kroemer, a German-born scientist at the University of California, for developing technology integral to satellite communications and cellular phones.

The other was given to Jack Kilby, of Texas Instruments, for his invention and development of the integrated circuit, the forerunner of the microchip, and as a co-inventor of the pocket calculator.

This year marks a full century since the Nobel Prizes were first awarded. Alfred Nobel, a wealthy Swedish industrialist and inventor of dynamite, endowed the physics, chemistry, literature, medicine and peace prizes, leaving few guidelines for selecting its winners. He requested that the prizes be given to those who "shall have conferred the greatest benefit on mankind" and "shall have made the most important discovery or invention within the field of physics," according to www.salon.com.

The prizes will be presented on Dec. 10, the anniversary of Nobel's death. Because this year marks the 100th anniversary of the awards, all living winners of the Nobel Prize have been invited back to attend the ceremonies.

This Week In London...

You could be ...
- catching the red hot hit "Mama Mia" in the West End
- shopping in Covent Garden for one-of-a-kind clothing and jewelry
- sitting next to a rock star in a trendy Kensington eatery

Or...
- cheering like crazy at a football match between Arsenal and Tottenham (that's soccer to us Yanks).
- taking a train this weekend to Wales for horseback riding and some of the best scenery in Britain

Sound good?
In many ways London is the classroom for the BU London Internship Program. Quite aside from taking classes in Advertising, Film, Theater, Political Science or the Liberal Arts, you'll learn about England by living in London. Trip and tragedies provide a new perspective on life

RACHEL LASKOW
Senior Writer

On Aug. 9, I woke up to the phone ringing. It was my dad calling from California to tell me that there had just been a terrorist attack at a Sbarros in Jerusalem. I didn't know what to say—I was planning to leave for my trip to Poland, Bulgaria and Israel in three days. My dad said he wasn't sure he wanted me to go anymore. My only answer to that was, "We're going to Poland and Bulgaria first, so we won't be in Israel for another 10 days. Maybe things will be better by then." I guess that was wishful thinking on my part.

Over the next few days, I had friends asking me if I wanted to die, relatives telling me not to go, a State Department advisory warning Americans not to travel to Israel, and my rabbi telling me that I am in God's hands and to come back with a tan. After a few calls to the Anti-Defamation League, the sponsor of the trip, some encouragement from my mother and two one-dollar bills (It is a Jewish tradition that someone gives you a dollar bill before you go on a trip so that you can give it to charity. This guarantees you a safe trip because your journey has a purpose), I decided to listen to the rabbi who I had only known for four years, rather than the U.S. government and th relatives I had known my whole life.

That Sunday I met 17 other college journalists from schools such as Stanford, Yale, Columbia, Syracuse, Northwestern and Dartmouth at John F. Kennedy Airport. All 18 of us were the original students picked to go on the trip. While we were waiting for our flight to leave, we heard that there had been another attack—this time at a coffee shop. Again, I said hopefully, "We still have another week until we are actually in Israel." After more waiting in the airport, we began what was either to be the best or worst experience of our lives.

After a long plane ride with no sleep and a lot of talking, we finally landed in Warsaw, Poland at 11 a.m. Although we had been up all night long, we did not waste any time. We put our luggage on the bus and started our journey.

Our first two days in Poland included a tour of the Warsaw Ghetto, a visit to the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw and a trip to the Old Town and a meal near a salt mine in Krakow.

Although our first two days proved to be very interesting and gave us a taste of the country itself, our third day brought an unforgettable experience. Not only were we allowed to see the country from another perspective, but we "encountered" one of the worst events in history— the Holocaust. First, we went to Auschwitz where a tour guide walked us through barracks, where thousands of people were once forced to live. The barracks had been turned into a museum, similar to the one in Washington, D.C. Items such as victims' shoes, and even hair were displayed.

We left Auschwitz and traveled a few minutes down the road to Birkenau. We entered the main gates and walked along the train tracks, where part of Schindler's List was filmed. As we continued to walk, I tried to imagine what thousands of Jews were thinking and feeling as they walked shoeless in the snow. I knew I would leave Birkenau in a few hours. Not only did they not know if they would ever leave, they had no idea where the tracks were taking them.

At Birkenau, women stayed in the camp on the left and men stayed in the camp on the right. We entered the women's camp and went into a barrack with wooden bunk beds and cement sinks. The beds were only slightly larger than twin beds and five or six people often slept in them. Also, no more than two feet separated the people from the bed above them.

We walked out of the barrack and followed the path to the crematorium. Piles of bricks remained untouched and a sign read, "It is forbidden to step on the ruins." I looked down the steps and realized I was standing in the exact spot where many people saw their last glimpse of daylight.

After a few physically and emotionally draining hours in the hot sun, we returned to the bus. In a few hours, we were back at the Chopin Hotel for our final night in Poland. The next morning we boarded the bus and headed for the airport. After a while we arrived in Sofia, Bulgaria's capital. Most of us could not even find Bulgaria on a map, let alone know what to expect. After meeting with the Vicar and many government officials, we learned that Buglaria was once a Communist country and that was why buildings looked were so damaged. Also, Bulgaria saved thousands of Jews during the Holocaust.

We also learned that Bulgaria has a fairly large Roma (gypsy) community. For as long as I can remember, I have been told that Romas like to pickpocket and that was all I knew about them. That evening we were invited to have watermelon with the mayor and one of two lawyers from the community. After our snack, they informed us that we were going to a restaurant for dinner. We started to walk and before we knew it, we were surrounded by hundreds of Romas—babies, teens, kids and parents. Our group was dressed in nice clothing because of our meetings earlier in the day and the Romas were wearing mismatching, torn clothes or no clothes at all.

We continued to travel throughout the community in a parade-like fashion. Children posed as we took pictures of them. This was the first time that most, if not all of them, had seen Americans. After about one half hour of walking, we realized that we were nowhere near our restaurant. In fact, the restaurant was in the opposite direction. When we finally arrived at the restaurant, we were invited to join in the celebration of a Roma woman's 50th birthday. We danced and then ate a wonderful dinner on the roof of the restaurant.

Our final days in Bulgaria consisted of watching Bulgarian college students dance and sing for us and attending more meetings with government officials. On our last night in Bulgaria, I waited with a few of my friends to get onto the bus to go to the airport. They were all talking about the violence in Israel and were making jokes. Although I knew they were just kidding, it still made me very nervous. I walked over to two of my friends on the trip and gave them each a dollar and they gave one to me. "Now we'll be safe," I said.

After going through intense security at the airport and a fairly short plane ride, we landed in Ben Gurion Airport near Tel Aviv. We got on our big yellow bus and took a short ride to the Cinema Hotel. As we drove, I read the Hebrew signs, even though I had no idea what they meant. While I watched the people and cars around me, I was overcome with an indescribable feeling. In a way, it was a mixture of pride, excitement and spirituality. But there was still something else there.

That night I was standing with one of my Jewish friends on the balcony of the hotel looking out at Tel Aviv. We were talking about being in Israel and we both agreed that although we felt fairly safe in the hotel, we felt ourselves looking over our shoulders while we walked down the street. We continued to look at the buildings and the few people walking down the street, and we realized how much people really love this country. We were being forced to stay in the hotel at night and here were people, although not many, willingly walking down the street, not knowing when the next bomb would hit. Then my friend asked me, "Have you had that feeling yet?" Even though he just said "that feeling," I knew exactly what he meant—he wasn't talking about fear. I told him that I had had it on the bus ride to the hotel and he told me it had struck him when we were getting on the El Al flight. We both knew exactly what we were talking about, but neither one of us could describe that feeling. We knew it had something to do with being a Jew in Israel, especially during a time when Israelis are fighting for their country, but we still couldn't place a finger on it.

Throughout the week, we met with Israeli and Palestinian journalists, had Shabbat dinner with a family in Sefad, rode camels, dined with Bedouins and climbed to the top of Massada. However, one of the most defining moments of the trip for me was when we went to the Western Wall. On our way there and we saw a box labeled "tzeduka" (charity). My friends and I put our dollars in the box, and from that moment on, I knew we would be safe.

The men went to one side of the Wall to pray and women went to the other. I stood infront of the Western Wall with a few dozen other people who I didn't know, said a little prayer and stuck a written prayer to the Wall. Again, it is such a special feeling, a feeling I can't explain, to stand and pray at such a holy sight with other Jews. As our group waited for everyone to be finished, I remembered what my summer roommate, who spent first semester last year in Israel, told me. She told me that going to Israel would change my life. When she told that to me, I didn't quite know what she meant. However, now i know she was right. Going to Israel changed my life as a college student, journalist and a Jew.

Since I've been back, the first thing I do in the morning is read The New York Times to find out the latest news in Israel. As a college student, I read each story to learn what happened and as a journalist, I read each one to see how the event was covered. However, when I read it as a Jew, the story takes on a whole other meaning. It gives me that feeling that I can't explain—feeling pain for people who are losing their lives, feeling pride for soldiers who are fighting for Israel and feeling hope for Israelis so they can live in a country where they won't have to worry if they will come back from a pizza restaurant alive. I also sometimes have a feeling of relief—a few days after I came home from Israel I found out that Palestinian terrorists perpetrated a terrorist attack on the Mount Zion Hotel, a place I stayed for three days in Jerusalem.

On Sept. 11, another phone call woke me up. This time it was my roommate's mother telling me to turn on the television. I turned it on and saw one of the Twin Towers on fire. Then I saw the plane hit the other one, a plane hit the Pentagon and the towers collapse. The Twin Towers are only 40 minutes from my house and I had been in them every day last summer. This summer, I spent seven weeks in D.C. Two places that are so familiar to me will never be the same. I picked up the phone to call my dad in California and tell him the news. He was so worried about me going to Israel and now I was closer to danger in my own country. His first words to me were, "Now America knows what Israel is going through." Many are saying that things like this just don't happen in America. My parents gave me a dollar to assure me a safe trip to Israel—I bet they never would have imagined that the same fear that once made me question my trip to Israel is now making me question future trips to New York City and Los Angeles, places in my own country.

An Abroad Perspective: A Year in England

BY ALLISON CROTZER
Contributing Writer

When I stepped off the plane in London's renowned Heathrow Airport last September, I was faced with a flood of emotions and dizzying images. My study-abroad program had whisked my fellow travelers and I on an all-night flight directly to the busy city life of London. We landed at nine in the morning local time, and since it was four a.m. to my body, I was one tired traveler. But I knew it was time for my year-long adventure to begin and I was ready for it.

Traveling to England was like returning to a part of my past, not because I lived in England or had ever even been there, but because my grandmother was a native Liverpoolian who married an American when she was twenty years old. My grandfather, a handsome and kind young soldier stationed in England during the Korean conflict, won her heart and took her back to America, away from all she knew.

The strange parallel to this story is that I was myself twenty when I stepped off the plane and into a new country, a new culture, and a world I did not know. But there is a difference between my grandmother and myself—I was preparing nervously to stay for a year, while she made the decision to stay in the United States for a lifetime.

I remember the bus ride through the city to our hotel. With my overstuffed bags taking up space above and below me, the amazement struck me. It took over me in the form of quaint red telephone booths, the typical black cabs one sees on postcards from London and the look of English people.

I was amazed at all she had given up for my grandfather, for the children and grandchildren she had yet to know but already loved in her dedication to this man. How could she have left this place, this country she had talked about since I was small, this country she loved so dearly and the beloved family whose stories bring both a smile and a tear to her eye?

It was time to come to know all that my grandmother left behind, to have my own experiences in England while retracing some of hers. My excitement increased with each English phone booth and post office box and continued well into my call home to my mother and father that night. It was a strange feeling, knowing that I was no longer as close to them as they are when I call from the University, but they were on the other side of an ocean. I couldn't comprehend that distance— and to be honest, I didn't try.

My program was hosted by Butler University in Indianapolis, Ind., and I was prepared to go to St. Catherine's College, Oxford University. Butler first held an orientation in London, their base in England, followed by a family visit after those first few days. I was placed with a sweet older couple in Worcester named Norm and Ita Hope. They were quite a cute couple, and Ita diligently continued to write me letters during my entire stay at Oxford. Our correspondence continues and I have promised that when I go back to England, I will visit. Butler did a good job of sending us quickly through that first week in London, then family stays, and finally en route to Oxford, a stop at Stratford-upon-Avon, home of William Shakespeare.

I was actually very surprised when I arrived at "Catz," as we affectionately called St. Catherine's, because I hadn't really paid attention to the details of where I was headed. The name Oxford meant enough to look over such details. Catz is not the typical portrait of Oxford's dreaming spires and beautiful old buildings. It is much more modern, founded in 1963 rather than 1226, 1438 or 1886 like some of the others. Catz has a modern appearance, a state school type of appearance some of us (from private schools) commented. It is the concrete realist creation of renowned architect Arne Jacobsen, and, quite frankly, sticks out in Oxford like a sore thumb. That said, this is the place I came to call home, the place I came to love for its differences, and when all was said and done, I wouldn't have wanted to attend any other college.

Known for its rather laid-back attitude, I meshed well with both English and American students at Catz. I met some of my best friends there. A few came home with me and others are still across the Atlantic. I have noticed the strange feeling since my study abroad experience that instead of having two homes, one with my parents and the other in at the University, I am fortunate enough to have three, counting Oxford, St. Catherine's and England as a whole.

I grew firmly attached to the people, places and my life there in a way that makes me understand how, after nearly fifty years of living in the Unite States, my grandmother still calls England home. I envision myself as stretching between both sides of the Atlantic, calling one place home while part of my heart is in another.

This continental divide has given me a new awareness of what my grandmother gave up and of why talking about England sometimes brings a melancholy look to her face. Never have I felt closer to her than when she came to England to visit and took me to Liverpool to show me the sights from her childhood. Never have I felt the painful reality of all that she left behind than when my cousin Paul took me to see my great-grandmother, great-grandfather and Aunt Ena's graves. Never have I connected with the English part of myself more than when I visited my grandmother's two living sisters and their families who welcomed me into their homes and their lives for a year.

My year at St. Catherine's and the study abroad experience in general provided me with many meaningful experiences through the challenging course work and distinct tutorial system at Oxford. I studied with noted scholars such as Jonathan Wordsworth, a relation to William Wordsworth, and I succeeded in keeping up with the responsibility of a chiefly self-taught academic system.

I had the opportunity to tour seven European countries on my own for an entire month, seeing sights like the Colosseum and the Eiffel Tower. But the most important knowledge I gained did not take place in the famed Bodleian library or even finding my way after wandering lost in Venice. The knowledge that has become a part of me is an appreciation for all my grandmother sacrificed with the added gift of experiencing some of that connection in a very special place with the very special people I call my English family.

Good Wil's offers homestyle dining

BY ALYSON WALKER

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Offering a true greasy experience, Good Wil's is a must for everyone.

Just as you can't judge a book by its cover, you also can't judge a restaurant by its facade. Almost anyone who has been to Good Wil's Restaurant, located on Route 45 East in Montandon, can attest to that.

Inside a building that slightly resembles a large red barn is a homey country atmosphere that everyone should experience at least once. "It turns out that inside that sketchy exterior lies a really great restaurant" Michelle Dombeck '05 said.

My first trek to Good Wil's for a Saturday breakfast was during my freshman year. As we pulled into the lot, I was horrified by the exterior and had the worst pictured for the inside. My fears were allayed when we entered the building- the interior was clean and looked like a country diner. We ordered from the extensive breakfast menu and within a reasonable amount of time, our breakfast was before us. The pancakes were very good, reminding me more of my mom's cooking than the cafeteria's. Only someone with a serious appetite could finish that breakfast.

I've been back to Good Wil's several times since, including this past Parent's Weekend. Although it was crowded, we were seated and served relatively quick. I decided to expand my horizons and get the French toast. Once again, it was a pretty yummy decision. The coffee wasn't the best I've ever tasted but was still enjoyable. The service was still excellent for such a busy weekend.

Dombeck, who also ventured to Good Wil's on Parent's Weekend notes that "The service is excellence, and the quality of the food is superb."

Having enjoyed both breakfast experiences, I decided to go on a lunch excursion. Once again, I had excellent service from a charming waitress who called me "hun." The meal was not quite as good as breakfast, but I enjoyed the fresh vegetables on my sandwich as well as the applesauce complete with cinnamon on top. The French fries, however, were another story. There was enough grease on them that I could almost see my reflection. Other than my artery clogging fries, I liked the meal, and there was a good selection of sandwiches and entrees to choose from.

Aside from the food, most people comment on the atmosphere and prices that Good Wil's offers. Alisa Grosser, '02, said, "It's one of the few restaurants left that really has a hometown feel to it. The prices for the quality and amount of food you get is the best aspect of Good Wil's."

On Saturdays, Good Wil's offers a ten percent discount to University students with a BUID from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.

If you chose to go to Good Wil's sometime, remember to keep an open mind. Although it may not be as aesthetically pleasing as the cafeteria, the breakfast definitely gives Saturday brunch a run for its money. The atmosphere, food selection, and prices are something that every student should try once.

"Friendly and fast service at an extremely low cost makes Good Wil's a wonderful place for people to grab a bite to eat," Lauren Scott '04 said.

Junse Kim: 2001 Philip Roth Writer

BY KATIE HEISE
Senior Writer

Nestled away in a subterranean corridor of Bucknell Hall is one of the University's best-kept secrets - Junse Kim, the 2001 Philip Roth Writer in Residence.

Kim, last year's recipient of the William Faulkner Award for short fiction and author of many stories and essays, has fallen under the University's spell after just a few short weeks, continually expressing his gratitude for the chance to write and create against the stunning backdrop of autumn in Pennsylvania and to experience life in a small, close-knit community.

Kim is at home in his tiny office in the Stadler Center for Poetry, surrounded by the tools of his trade. Music plays softly from the computer, and drafts and research dominate the desk space. In fact, Kim considers his office to be one of the luxuries of the residency.

"You can't believe how much I appreciate it," Kim said. "I don't have to worry about anything except the writing."

Indeed, the University has created an atmosphere most conducive to composition; the Philip Roth Resident is awarded free housing in the Poet's Cottage, food, and a sAipend in addition to the studio and the freedom to pursue his or her own projects while serving as a resource to the University community.

Competition for the position was fierce, for the residency is, in the words of Kim, "a wonderful opportunity for an emerging writer". Though a friend, a 1995 graduate of the University, shared stories of the University with Kim, the reality is greater and more vivid than he had ever expected. For the first time in his life, the Chicago native is living outside of suburbia, and he finds himself amazed and intrigued by the hills, the colors and the architecture.

Kim's path to writing as a profession was a winding one. As an undergraduate at the University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign, he earned a BS in psychology, intending to become a therapist. But he soon realized that his dreams pointed elsewhere, remembering that he had taken every creative writing course available during his years at Illinois.

A self-styled "closet writer", he had fallen victim to the American cultural mores that undercut the value of the arts and place so much emphasis on profit and utility. After his decision to pursue creative writing, Kim received his MFA from Goddard College and began to publish his work, eventually landing the Philip Roth Residence.

His current projects include a novel that is nearing completion and several essays about the experience of growing up in the suburbs of Chicago in the early 1970s. The novel, as yet untitled, follows three generations of a Korean family, from Korea in 1907 to the present-day United States. It "indirectly reveals the U.S.'s foreign policy and how it affects other countries," Kim said, sharing some of the background of his nascent story.

Korea was annexed by Japan in the early 1900s and was liberated following the Second World War. It appeared as though the nation would be unified through socialism, yet the Cold War intervened, bringing the U.S. into South Korea. Today, Korea faces the lasting implications of this split; many struggle with the Southern government that was installed and promoted by the U.S., a government that was oppressive in the eyes of its own people.

In his book, Kim attempts to answer a difficult, multifaceted question: What if someone must emigrate to the country responsible for his own oppression and interact with a third generation that has been completely immersed in American culture, that has adopted the American perspective on Korean history, effectively negating the first generation's experience?

Thus far, Kim has focused on his work and on enjoying the overall experience of Bucknell. On September 23, he participated in a prose reading with Professor Lisa Roney, and he will be presenting at Pennsylvania State University in several weeks.

Just as the University has enriched his writing and his life, Kim hopes to give back to the community in some small way. Though he has found the faculty very friendly and hospitable, Kim would like to see increased interaction with students and urges all members of the campus community to approach him with questions on any subject - the themes of his work, the stereotypes and reality of the life of a writer, goals and dreams. For anyone with an interest in Korean culture, he is a particularly invaluable resource; he has a full library exploring the identity and struggles of Korean Americans throughout the past century.

The Philip Roth Residence lasts only until the end of the fall semester, so the time to seek out this hidden gem is now.

Magic lanterns paved way for film

By Jason Oster
Staff Writer

The Campus Theater on Market Street hosted "Moving Images Before the Cinema: A Magic Lantern Presentation" last Tuesday, Oct. 2. The lecture introduced the magic lanterns as the ancestors to the film projections that we encounter today.

"You can naively believe that cinema invented itself or you can look for influences from the past," said Eric Faden, associate professor of English. "Clearly magic lanterns have had an influence. Today we have a screen audience with projecting devices behind them with models and moving pictures."

Faden, who recently purchased the Campus Theater, brought in special guest David Francis to give the presentation. A retired British professor, Francis has extensively researched the magic lanterns. The use of lanterns can be traced as far back as the late 1700s, when they were simply animated slides. Often they were used to recreate historical events or to depict movement by animated sequential images. Dissolving views and panoramic slides were also used to imply movement. Working the slides of the lantern was not a one-person job; as one slide was ejected, a new one replaced it. Everyone had a certain purpose to fulfill.

Natalie Casp—The Bucknellian
Magic lanterns were the predecssors of modern cinema

"It takes up to six people just to work the Magic Lantern and sometimes it's total chaos," Faden said.

The magic lanterns had levers to produce the sliding movement. Colors and shapes were able to be distorted, which was appealing to the audiences. People would often tell stories to accompany the animation or photographs.

Magic lantern slides were employed to tell people about distant lands. These journeys were depicted by hand-painted images. Photography changed magic lantern shows, enabling the audiences to see the places described to them through stories.

Until the early 1900s, the lantern was still a competitor in the world of moving pictures, since they were short films that the viewers could enjoy.

"Compared to the earliest movies, in some ways the Magic Lantern was superior," Faden said. "They were clearer, the pictures were in color and early films would sometimes break, be grainy or have poor lighting."

Professors, students and residents of Lewisburg flocked to the Campus Theater to enjoy the show. Many were astonished by how advanced the lantern was for its time.

"I think it's amazing that even centuries ago, people made use of their technology and could watch their versions of stories," a Lewisburg resident said. Others enjoyed participating in the story process.

"I thought it was interesting. Especially how our minds had to work so much with pre-cinema to fill in the story," said Renee Gosson, an associate professor of French. "Today the stories are told to us."

Faden agreed that the people of the past relied on their imaginations.

"Today the stories are basically spoon-fed to us," Faden said. "During magic lantern shows, the audience was allowed to use their imaginations."

Faden also believes that the Campus Theater has the unique opportunity to visit the past.

"There's something that has been lost from today's theaters," he said. "Today, theaters are functional. There are only about 300 theaters like the Campus Theater in America today. The majority have been torn down or converted into multiplexes. The Campus Theater is elaborate and has perfect seating."

Next at the Campus Theater, the Library of Congress Film Preservation Tour presents "A Panorama of American Cinema" from Oct. 26 to Nov. 9. This is the only stop the tour is making in Pennsylvania, and it will showcase films made between 1903 and 2001.

West Branch readings feature poetry, prose

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

The Second Annual West Branch Reading on Sunday, Oct. 7, featured authors Elizabeth Kirschner and Paul Maliszewski. Both were invited to read from their works because of their edgy, up-and-coming style. The staff of West Branch wanted to ensure that the campus appreciated their honest approach to the new literary world.

Elizabeth Kirschner has published two books of poetry, Twenty Colors and Postal Routes. She read selections from her new book, Slow Risen Among the Smoke Trees.

A series of seven poems traced the maturation of Lily, the main character, from childhood through motherhood and into old age. Kirschner especially focused on the sexual awakening of Lily, which produced reactions of discomfort, longing and desire. The startling frankness with which Kirschner presented Lily's circumstances expressed the thought process of the modern woman, and she almost certainly draws them from personal situations.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Maliszewski shares his prose at Bucknell Hall

"We found her poems startling in boldness and beauty," said Paula Closson Buck, professor of English.

Kirschner focused on surprising objects, poetically referring to a slug as a pearl. She explained that this idea was a challenge to her students.

"I told them you can write about anything," Kirschner said.

Paul Maliszewski followed Kirschner's reading with his own selection. An editor for McSweeney's, his style contrasts with that of Kirschner. Maliszewski utilizes prose, not poetry, to portray candid thoughts.

He explained to the audience his last-minute decision to set aside his scheduled reading and read an essay inspired by the events of Sept. 11. The honest musings of his mind were heartfelt and thought-provoking. His words encompassed feelings of disbelief for the events as he slowly came to realize its severity.

"I convinced myself that 'collapsed' was an imprecision of language," he said.

In closing, he remarked that he took mental pictures in his mind of the firehouses filled with flowers, the chalky film that covered the block around the site and the changed skyline, "wanting to forget nothing."

"Serendipity" fated to be a hit

John Cusack and Kate Beckinsale star in this enjoyable romantic comedy

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

"Serendipity: an aptitude for making fortunate discoveries accidentally." Ever wonder what would happen if you let fate decide your life for you? What would you do if you accidentally encountered your soulmate? Mirimax Films introduces "Serendipity," a lighthearted and clever romantic comedy that probes the powers of destiny.

Jonathan (John Cusack) and Sara (Kate Beckinsale) randomly meet on a magical winter night in New York. While sparks fly, Sara believes the time isn't right and if their relationship is meant to be, destiny will run its course and they will meet again. The two reluctantly part without even sharing their last names—their only chance for reunion relies on a five dollar-bill, a book and a glove.

A few years later, Jonathan and Sara are thousands of miles apart and engaged to their significant others, yet neither can forget the night they shared. What follows is a sequence of events that could only have been orchestrated by fate. The film adopts a "Sleepless in Seattle"-like quality as the two keep missing each other at every turn. Magical signs and strange coincidences point Jonathan and Sara toward each other—but will destiny come through in the end?

Cusack and Beckinsale share on-screen chemistry.

Cusack proves himself again as the never-truly-appreciated king of romantic comedies. His character is slightly spastic but sweet, and he masters the role of the ordinary yet irresistable guy. Women in the audience cheer as he frantically runs around New York, trying to track down the one he believes could be the love of his life. Watch out, ladies—the estrogen level is guaranteed to rise.

Beckinsale, last seen in this summer's "Pearl Harbor," is fun and intelligent in the role of Sara, a woman who allows fate to rule her life. While her destiny-obsessed lifestyle is a bit hard to swallow, she brings up a question about fate that everyone has pondered at one time or another—the big "what if?" Sara's character is real and relatable and Beckinsale successfully portrays her as such.

Cusack and Beckinsale share great on-screen chemistry. Their natural ease makes them enjoyable to watch. Gentle banter and sweet one-liners contribute to their undeniable attraction.

Other members of the cast include Jeremy Piven ("The Family Man") as Jonathan's best friend, Dean, and Molly Shannon as Sara's best friend, Eve. Piven portrays Dean with a layer of sensitivity hiding beneath a shell of pure craziness. He and Cusack make a great pair with their boyish charms and close-but-slightly-strange bond. Shannon portrays Sara's loyal friend, Eve, with a unique style that can only be achieved by the commedienne.

Another fun aspect is the appearance of Eugene Levy as a neurotic salesclerk who surprisingly assists Jonathan's efforts to find Sara. Also keep an eye out for Bridget Moynahan ("Coyote Ugly") and John Corbett ("Sex in the City") as Cusack and Beckinsale's significant others.

While the formula of "Serendipity" may be predictable, the way in which it is executed is unexpected. The film has a lot of charm and a pleasant cast. However, a quick warning for men—if you have no tolerance for "chick flicks," this movie isn't for you. For most people, it will be a successful mix of humor and romance. Predictable? Maybe. Enjoyable? Definitely.

Turi's talents abound in and out of class

By Melissa Farrar
Staff Writer

Stephanie Turi is a senior who has not only been a contributor to the University's Dance Program, but has also excelled in the classroom. For this reason, she will be graduating one year early with the class of 2002. As she leaves, one of her most memorable experiences will be her participation in the dance program.

Turi grew up in Scranton, Pa., where her parents owned a dance studio. She has been dancing for over 17 years, so this integral part of her life came into play when she chose a college. The strong dance program prompted her to attend the University. As an incoming student, she recognized the numerous opportunities for dancers, and that the Dance Company was a very supportive, tightly-knit group.

"The dance professors push you to excel, but are never critical," Turi said. "Whether in class or rehearsal, they make you comfortable with what you are doing, even if it's not your strength."

She describes performing as a magical and unique experience.

"There is a point where everything comes together and you feel a part of something wonderful, and it came from nothing," she said.

On average, Turi spends 10-15 hours a week in the studio. First and foremost, she considers dance as a form of stress relief. Most people would need a release if their workload looked anything like Turi's. She takes six classes and two or three dance classes, in addition to teaching step/sculpt classes twice a week.

As a psychology major with a minor in dance and philosophy, Turi takes on a number of responsibilities, and manages to be successful in all of her endeavors. She spent last summer on campus researching under a Price Waterhouse Cooper grant, and is currently writing her honors thesis on human emotion. She also maintains the position of secretary for Psi Chi, and is a member of Pi Beta Phi.

"Everyone needs a constant, and for me it's dance," she said.

Turi stresses that dance will always be a part of her life and considers it as something useful in many contexts. She plans to pursue a doctorate degree in clinical psychology, with hopes of opening her own clinic and integrating dance as therapy for children. In the past she has taught dance classes for mentally and physically handicapped children, and found the experience to be highly rewarding.

Turi feels lucky to have been given a talent that she can share with others.

"There is no better feeling than showing something new to someone, in a way that no one else could," she said.

Professor of dance, Danna Frangione, praises Turi's artistic abilities.

"Stephanie is a remarkably self-possessed artist, beautiful on stage and intellectually strong in the classroom," Frangione said. "Skilled at flamenco technique, Stephanie's choreography has given the Dance Company a new challenge and direction." Turi's work for the Spring Showcase debuts on April 26 in the Weis Center. She will also perform in modern/jazz dance pieces in the Fall Concert on Dec. 7 and 8 in the Harvey Powers Theater.

Students seek Borough government positions

Sorber, mayor

By Natalie Casp
News Editor

Though 54 years younger than his incumbent opponent, Nate Sorber '02 is running for mayor of the Borough of Lewisburg in next month's election. Sorber, as a write-in candidate, faces two opponents who have been mayor of the Borough before, but believes his "fresh" approach to Borough politics and support from student-voters will enable him to win the election.

Aside from two experienced candidates, Sorber, 21, also faces the challenge of gaining acceptance within the community in what has become a controversial election. Recent escalations in town-gown tensions prompted Sorber to seek office.

"Three weeks ago when I decided to run, I asked myself, 'Would I be taken seriously if I won? Would I be seen as a viable mayor? Would my election actually be a setback to University-community relations? Would the community reject me in my position? And then I realized I'm up for this challenge, that I would be capable of opening those lines of communication, building those bridges between the University and the community and that I would be honest and thoughtful in the community's best interest," Sorber said. "Now, I'm working on getting others to see my full-fledged commitment to being the mayor."

Less than a week into his official campaign, Sorber has come across many roadblocks, ranging from finances to electoral boundaries.

"The red tape around running for a position is unbelievable. Campaign finance law and getting people registered to vote in the Borough are very complicated and require large amounts of attention," Sorber said. "The biggest challenge involving boundaries was with Union County. I fought to make it possible for students who live in the actual Borough to register with their physical dorm address, rather than their mailbox address." The Langone Center, which houses the student mailroom, is located in East Buffalo Township and not the Borough of Lewisburg.

Sorber's campaign began fund-raising last week, but only after establishing a nonprofit, "Friends of Nate Sorber" bank account.

"There have been several people who have generously donated money to the campaign," Sorber said, "but all of those dollars have to be recorded and reported to the state, extensive logs of the contributors' address, occupation and political affiliation have to be documented as well."

On its first day of fund-raising, the Sorber campaign raised $614. At press time, $909 in donations and pledges had been collected.

"We have been very impressed with the aid the administrators, students, their parents and townspeople have given to us," said Ryan Karchner '03, Sorber's campaign fi-

Kasdan, ward III

By Rachel Laskow
Associate Editor

Running as both a concerned student and resident of Lewisburg, Matthew Kasdan '03 is seeking the ward III seat of the Borough Council with hope that he will be able to provide students with more of a voice, thus improving town-gown relations.

If elected to this two-year position, Kasdan will be a voting member on the Borough Council. He will also serve on various committees and attend town hall meetings.

According to Kasdan, 20, a political science and environmental studies major, he decided to run for the position because he feels that students should have more representation in off-campus relations.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro agrees that Kasdan has the potential to influence cooperation between the town and University.

"If Matthew were to win, I think he would do his level best to improve town-gown relations. I believe Matthew would honestly try to serve both student and long-term resident interests," Ferraro said.

Borough Council President Yvonne Morgan believes that Kasdan's mere decision to run will improve communication between the town and students.

"I think Matthew's will to run suggests to the Council that we should have better communication with students. Win, lose or draw, he's going to make a point that the town needs to be talking to students," Morgan said.

Kasdan feels that both his experience as a University student and downtown resident have helped him understand students' concerns.

"Almost three nights a week there are cops on Sixth Street and in the alleys. It's not the most comforting situation for students," Kasdan said.

In order to best serve the students' needs, Kasdan hopes to address issues such as fine violations, parking, noise and drinking. He also looks to bring more student oriented stores downtown, similar to the new video store and the sporting good store.

"If you don't make waves, it will be worthless," Kasdan said.

Ferraro expects that Kasdan will help bridge the town and students.

"I think Matthew may help town folk rethink stereotypes about students; and similarly he may help students rethink stereotypes about town folk," Ferraro said.

Although Kasdan expects to influence the Council, he also admits that there will be challenges.

University trustee killed in home

By Meredith Atkinson
Assistant News Editor

University Trustee Robert Theodore Ammon '71 was found dead in his home in East Hampton, N.Y. on Oct. 22. Ammon had been a member of the Board of Trustees since 1992 and gave $15.1 million to the University in 1996; it was the largest single gift in University history.

Newsday.com reported that Ammon died of blunt-force trauma to the head, though a weapon has not been recovered. The body was not discovered until several hours after death when a concerned friend realized he was missing. He could have been killed as early as Saturday night, officials said. Lt. John Gierasch, commander of Suffolk's Homicide Squad commented "the house doesn't appear to have been ransacked or gone through" and investigators have not ruled out the possibility that Ammon was attacked by surprise or in his sleep.

Ted Ammon '71 had been a member of the Board of Trustees since 1992.

"He will be sorely missed," University President Steffen Rogers said. "He shied away from the spotlight. He didn't want his name on any building. He just wanted to do good things for the university."

In addition to creating a named scholarship fund, he issued a challenge to other donors that culminated in a total of $52.4 million in new gifts and endowed scholarships.

According to a press release from the Office of Public Relations, Ammon received a Bachelor of Arts degree in economics, then attended the University of London, College of Law.

He was a founding partner of Chancery Lane Capital LLC. He also served as general partner at Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., a private equity firm in Manhattan. He was chairman of the board of 24/7 Media, Inc., and a member of the Board of Directors of Host Marriott Corporation and CAIS Internet, Inc. and served on numerous boards of privately held companies.

Newsday.com reported that Ammon was involved in several nonprofit organizations in addition to the University's Board of Trustees. He was chairman of the board of Jazz at Lincoln Center and a member of the Board of Directors of the Municipal Art Society of New York.

Surviving Ammon are his estranged wife, Generosa, and 11-year-old twin children Alexandra and Gregory.

University on alert for anthrax attacks

By Michelle Dombeck
Staff Writer

In response to the anthrax threats across the nation, the University devised a plan of action to protect the campus community from the unlikely event of a threat and put both faculty and students at ease.

In an advisory issued to the entire campus, Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 advised all to be wary of suspicious indicators, such as misspelled words, strange odors and the absence of a return address.

Vincent DeCerchio, director of Public Safety, believes that this plan is warranted, yet he said that the University is not in any real danger.

"We have a plan in place to identify suspicious parcels and letters, to deal with them safely and to minimize any potential danger to the community," DeCerchio said. "We're not in a high, critical area and we're certainly not in harm's way. Nevertheless, it's important to employ intelligent precautions to prevent the possibility of being exposed to any type of biological contamination on campus in the future."

Pollock also understands that although the University is not at risk, there is reason to be concerned.

"Our alertness is a matter of generalized caution, in the way that all Americans should be cautious now," Pollock said.

In the event that someone finds a suspicious package or letter, Public Safety will retrieve the item and keep it in a separate hazardous material room created specifically to isolate these pieces of mail. After this, the first step is to identify the origin of the piece of mail.

"We employ every method of investigation to track the origin of the suspicious parcels or letters," DeCerchio said. "In all cases thus far, we

Alumni revisit the past with Homecoming

"It was the best Homecoming we've seen so far," declared Jim Saffle '92. The weather was crisp, warm and sunny, the fall foliage was at its peak, the football team won in a shutout and spirit permeated the campus; Homecoming 2001 was one to remember. Alumni were back in full force to watch the Bison take on the Hoyas and see how their alma mater has changed, and perhaps more importantly, how it has remained true to tradition.

Arthur DiNicolah '52 commented that he enjoyed "the great hello spirit" at the University, noting, "we had 650 in the class; everyone knew everyone and that friendliness continues to resonate throughout the Bucknell community."

During halftime, different generations of Bucknellians were honored for their athletic and overall contributions. The eight senior homecoming hosts were individually presented awards for their contributions throughout their four years at the University. Following that presentation, players from the 1952 undefeated football team and several other of the University's most accomplished alumni athletes

Star of "Psycho" to visit Campus Theatre

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

As Halloween approaches, the Campus Theatre on Market Street brings a special treat for the community: Janet Leigh, the star of Alfred Hitchcock's "Psycho."

Leigh will present her film "Touch of Evil" in the Campus Theatre on Saturday, Oct. 27 at 8 p.m., kicking off the Library of Congress' film preservation tour, "A Panorama of American Cinema." The two-week event will showcase new prints of legendary and historic films in a location where many people did not originally view them: a movie theater.

"I hope students and the community enjoy this opportunity to watch the movies as they were meant to be seen," said Eric Faden, associate professor of English and new owner of the theater. "For many of these films, it is truly a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

According to a University press release, Leigh's film, "Touch of Evil" was once described as a "great American film noir crime thriller, dark mystery, and cult classic." Orson Welles directed the 1958 film and starred in it alongside Leigh, Charlton Heston, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Marlene Dietrich and Dennis Weaver.

The press release also revealed that "in some ways the film anticipates and parallels Hitchcock's 'Psycho' ... for instance, Janet Leigh's character in the earlier film, as in 'Psycho,' is victimized in an out-of-the-way motel by a creepy after-hours motel employee." According to an article in The Day,

More anthrax found at Hart Senate Office Building

Anthrax was discovered in a new location of the Hart Senate Office Building Wednesday night, near a freight elevator on the first floor in the southwest quadrant, investigators said.

Word of the latest anthrax discovery came shortly after the U.S. government announced a deal to buy more of the antibiotic.

The Hart building houses the office of Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle—where an anthrax-laden letter was delivered more than a week ago. It also showed a positive reading for anthrax in the southwest quadrant next to a freight elevator on the first floor. Mail to the building is typically brought up that elevator, but it's not known whether Daschle's letter took that route.

United States buying 100 million doses of anthrax antibiotic

As the number of confirmed and suspected anthrax cases grew, the government said Wednesday it had made a deal to buy more of an antibiotic that kills the insidious bacteria.

The Bush administration said it agreed with German pharmaceutical Bayer to purchase the anthrax antibiotic Cipro for 95 cents a pill — down from the previously discounted price of $1.77 per tablet.

Pentagon: United States will 'bring the Taliban down'

A top Pentagon official said Wednesday he was surprised by the determination of Taliban forces but stressed that the U.S.-led assaults would continue until the Taliban government is toppled.

U.S. Navy Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem said the Taliban are "tough warriors" who are operating in an environment with which they are very familiar.

Israeli forces kill Palestinians

Israeli forces have killed a number of Palestinians and made several arrests after entering a village near Ramallah. The exact numbers of those killed and arrested Wednesday is in dispute. The Israel Defense Forces said five were killed and 10 arrested. Palestinian sources said 10 died and 20 were arrested.

Nasdaq hits seven-week high

NEW YORK (CNNmoney)—Upbeat forecasts from the wireless and software sectors helped send the Nasdaq composite index to a seven-week high Wednesday as investors bet technology profits will rebound next year.

Shares of Nextel Communications and Citrix Systems rallied after issuing positive financial outlooks. AT&T Wireless gained for a second day after posting better-than-expected earnings.

Passenger surrenders gun in flight

A passenger on a Southwest Airlines flight Tuesday remembered he was carrying a small handgun and surrendered it to a flight attendant, according to an FBI spokesman, who said the incident appeared to be an "innocent mistake" and will not lead to charges.

House passes antiterrorism bill

WASHINGTON (AP)—The House gave overwhelming approval Wednesday to a compromise antiterrorism bill giving police new power to secretly search the homes of terrorism suspects, tap all their phones and track their use of the Internet.

The bill passed 357-66. It was to be taken up by the Senate later in the day or Thursday with the idea of getting it to President Bush for a possible Friday signing at the White House.

O.J. Simpson not guilty of 'road rage'

MIAMI, Florida—O.J. Simpson was found not guilty Wednesday on charges stemming from a traffic altercation with another motorist in Dec. 2000.

A four-man, two-woman jury returned the verdict in Dade County Circuit Court on Wednesday afternoon.

Simpson had been charged with misdemeanor first-degree battery and theft from an occupied automobile, a felony, for allegedly grabbing the glasses off a man who had honked at him for driving through an intersection in front of him.

Afghan opposition maps plan for future

PESHAWAR, Pakistan—A conference of around 800 Afghan opposition leaders meeting in Pakistan has endorsed a plan for a post-Taliban government for their country.

Under the plan, Afghanistan's former king would become head of state and a U.N. security force made up from Islamic states would restore order in the war-ravaged country.

The move came at the start of a two-day "Assembly for Peace and National Unity of Afghanistan" conference in the Pakistani border city of Peshawar.

Janet Leigh will introduce film this weekend

THEATRE From A1

"Touch of Evil" is one of the 300 most significant films in American cinema, as listed on the National Film Registry.

Leigh became active in film preservation when she saw a screening of a damaged "Romance of Rosy Ridge," said the article in The Day. Discouraged to discover the lack of care taken to preserve the old movies, she joined the effort to save these films.

Faden, a film studies professor, also supports the Library of Congress' project to preserve and showcase culturally-significant films.

"The tour is an outreach program," he said "They want to reach people who have never seen these films on the big screen, or will never have another chance to see the films again."

Faden agrees that seeing the films on the big screen is an important experience for today's audiences.

"Video, and even DVD, is half the resolution of 35mm film," he said. " In the age of video or DVD, we forget that filmmakers never intend their films to be watched on the small screen. I hope it will raise awareness about the importance of watching films on film."

One of the reasons Faden bought the Campus Theatre was for its historic value and architecture, making it a unique and perfect place for special events, such as the Library of Congress tour. He points out that these old-fashioned theaters are a dying breed, and should be preserved alongside the old films.

"What most people do not realize is historic, single-screen movie theaters are the most endangered architecture in the United States today," he said. "In the 1940s and 1950s, there were thousands of movie theatres like the Campus Theatre. Today, there are less than 300 historic theatres left, and Bloomsburg and State College lost their historic movies theaters just this year."

Faden explained the noticeable differences between theaters in the past and theaters today.

"What makes these theatres special is their extraordinary design," he said. "Today, mall multiplexes have zero architectural design and are created purely for function—to get you in and then get you out. By contrast, historic movies theatres were made to be just as spectacular as the films themselves—with lavish architectural details, exotic materials, complex designs, and wall and ceiling murals. They were, quite literally, works of art."

Faden believes it was because of this elaborate architecture and historic ambience that the Library of Congress decided to make Lewisburg their only stop in Pennsylvania. The theater is an ideal location to show the films.

"I think the Library [of Congress] is interested in showing the films as they would have originally been seen—in a historic movie theatre," Faden said. "The Campus Theatre is an important part of film history."

The tour will feature a variety of films every day from Saturday, Oct. 27, to Friday, Nov. 9, including Hitchcock's "Shadow of a Doubt," Martin Scorsese's "Raging Bull" and Stanley Kubrick's "Dr. Strangelove."

Faden believes the tour will be a rewarding experience for the community and hopes for positive feedback.

"I've received all sorts of feedback [from the community]," he said. "Most of it positive, some of it negative. Everybody has an opinion, and I'm glad the community feels comfortable telling me what they think. Ultimately, the community is 'the boss' since we can not survive without customers. I think most people are excited about the [Library of Congress tour] though. We'll see ..."

University not at risk for anthrax, but reason for concern have been able to legitimize suspicious parcels or letters. I am confident that the probability of receiving contaminated mail here is very slim."

If mail cannot be legitimized, it will be turned over to the Union County Emergency Services (UCES), the local organization that handles hazardous materials and the official organization to handle suspicious letters or parcels.

"The UCES determines whether they want to analyze it or destroy it. There, at least it's out of harm's way," DeCerchio said.

A plan has been established for suspicious mail.

"If an opened parcel is found to be suspicious, like having a white powder or contaminate in it, we contact the UCES and 911 to let them know we have the potential for a biohazard," DeCerchio said. "Mail handlers are to cover that item immediately and not handle it. Public Safety will secure the area and ensure that all people who have handled the item are cleaned, tested and receive medical attention."

Although no one has actually handled any dangerous materials, the University receives roughly two or three suspicious cases per week. Public Safety recently handled a particularly suspicious package that came from Saudi Arabia.

"Last week we received a large envelope from World Wide Express from Saudi Arabia that was hand-addressed to the University," DeCerchio said. "It said 'Urgent,' and only had a foreign bank for a return address. It was placed in a sealed container, and it took us a day to track it down to a legitimate Bucknell family that was sending a money order to the University for their student."

Despite these isolated incidents, the University's actions help students feel safer on campus.

"The precaution the University is taking with the mail provides comfort and security to students," Jamie Slupe '05 said. "However, there is a level of security that can always be felt here at the University, and I do not fear an attack in the near future against myself or anyone else."

Breanne Geery '05 also feels safe because of the University's isolated location.

"Right now, I feel safe because I'm at a college, and that gives us some anonymity," Geery said. "I don't think they're going to be sending Bree Geery at Bucknell any mail with anthrax in it. On the other hand, I would be worried if I was a senator or some other known figure."

According to Pollock, the University is doing all that it should to help protect the campus community from any biohazard attacks.

"We've worked at that general level with anyone who receives mail, by issuing a general advisory to the entire campus. We've worked at a more detailed level for people who open a lot of mail, by providing them masks and gloves if they choose to wear them," Pollock said. "We're behaving as any responsible organization would."

Two students seek local office in upcoming election

nance treasurer. "The contributions that were donated in the first few days were so much more than anticipated that our financial situation at this point is where we want it to be, if not above that."

Sorber said that since the voter registration drive earlier this month, which he helped organize through his capacity as president of the Bucknell Student Government (BSG), he has felt pressured by local residents.

"Unfortunately, I have a feeling that many people are watching over our shoulder, making sure we are acting to the letter of the law," Sorber said. "For that reason, we have been very careful to make sure we're in total compliance with all the regulations that have been set forth."

If elected, Sorber hopes to ease tensions between University students and local residents, as well as work to promote the overall well-being of the Borough. Sorber cites his background and experience at the University as logical stepping-stones for being mayor.

"Ever since I've been involved in leadership positions at Bucknell, the biggest problems that have arisen have dealt with Lewisburg; this was disheartening from the beginning," Sorber said. "I come from a town much smaller than Lewisburg, and when I first arrived at Bucknell, I was fascinated with all aspects of this small town—from the businesses, to the historic movie theatre, to the park, to the historical district."

According to Sorber, Lewisburg was one of the main reasons he decided to attend the University.

"I thought Lewisburg would be a very fascinating place to have my college experience. When I look back on that college experience, I'm disappointed that Lewisburg wasn't more of a positive experience for me," Sorber said.

"I absolutely believe that the relationship between town and gown should be mutually beneficial; both sides have actually been arrogant in their belief that they can stand alone."
—Nate Sorber '02

Sorber believes cooperation between students, residents and local business will enhance the quality of life in the Borough.

"I absolutely believe that the relationship between town and gown should be mutually beneficial; both sides have actually been arrogant in their belief that they can stand alone. The University has a ton of resources—particularly the students—that take on a vast array of activity, from community service, to music, to sports, all of which members of the community mutually enjoy," Sorber said. "Lewisburg offers a wonderful setting for many of these activities to take place."

According to Sorber, many of the tensions that exist between students and residents result from the inherent age and cultural differences. This, Sorber said, is unnecessary.

"An age dichotomy, like the one in Lewisburg, does not necessarily have to be a negative situation. On the one hand, the elder members of the community bring experience—professional and life—while the younger members bring fresh ideas, wonder and ambition, which, together, this combination is more productive together than apart."

Sorber is a senior economics and political science major with a 3.4 GPA. He has served as the vice president for finance for BSG and is currently the organization's president. He is an alumnus of the Social Justice College and referees high school basketball in the area school districts. Sorber is registered as a democrat, though he is a write-in candidate for the Nov. 6 election.

is a lot of stone-walling. It will be one student versus seven adults," Kasdan said.

Kasdan also anticipates a strong reaction from the town if he wins.

"If I do in fact get elected to the Borough Council we are pretty sure that there is going to be an upheaval with the town when they find out that a Bucknell student has gotten on board along with them," Kasdan said. "I'm not exactly expecting a grand welcoming party to sitting on the Council, however I want to make an impact and become as involved as I can on the important issues that face our students on a regular basis."

"I'm not exactly expecting a grand welcoming party to sitting on the Council, however I want to make an impact and become as involved as I can on the important issues that face our students on a regular basis.
—Matthew Kasdan '03

Morgan also senses a reaction from the town.

"Right now the climate in town is very antagonistic, but that doesn't mean in the long run it won't be beneficial," Morgan said. "However, I am not willing to say that any student would serve the community well. Neither am I willing to say that any man, woman or even lady living in a purple house would do a good job. In short, it all depends on the strengths of the individual."

According to Kasdan, one of his main goals between now and Election Day is to educate students on the importance of voting and get them to vote.

"Along with a group of supporters for getting student representation on the Borough Council between now and Election Day, we'll be trying to amass the support of the students who have registered to vote in Lewisburg to make sure that they are aware of the benefits to the student body of getting a strong representation on the Council, and the importance of their vote on Election Day," Kasdan said.

Sorber a fresh choice for mayor

In what is turning into a controversial election, the race for mayor of the Borough of Lewisburg consists of three candidates: Incumbent Mayor Lewis Hendricks, former Mayor Michael Molesevich and an unprecedented candidate, Bucknell Student Government President Nathan Sorber '02. Today, Sorber plans to announce his entrance into the campaign as a write-in candidate. Hendricks's campaign focuses on the traffic and pedestrian problems in the Borough. Molesevich plans to relieve housing problems. Not only does Sorber hope to mend tensions between students and residents, but he also looks to implement a comprehensive plan to promote the health of the Borough. The Bucknellian fully supports and endorses Sorber for mayor of the Borough of Lewisburg.

In the past, Hendricks, who served as mayor from '78-'93 and from '98-present, has established a working relationship with the police department and is currently working on increasing traffic control in the Borough. If elected, Hendricks wants to encourage residents, businesses, the University and Borough officials to have quarterly meetings to discuss problems. Although Hendricks has a lot of experience leading the Borough, we feel that the Borough needs a fresh perspective. Hendricks believes that traffic is one of the biggest problems currently facing the Borough. However, we believe that other issues such as town/gown relations and the prosperity of downtown businesses are larger concerns to the community.

Molesevich, who served as the Borough's first and only democratic mayor from '94-'98, has been a part of the University as a graduate student and also as a guest lecturer on energy and environmental issues. Some of Molesevich's plans include making downtown healthy, enforcing traffic laws and to develop partnerships between the University, Lewisburg and Union County. Molesevich minimally addressed students' concerns, but only in ways that did not appear to resolve current tensions. In fact, he made no effort show his support in easing student/resident conflict.

The Bucknellian endorses Sorber because we believe that he appropriately identifies the concerns of both the residents and students. His solutions are both detailed and feasible. For example, to improve the business district, Sorber proposed to implement a system where University students could charge their purchases to their accounts, similar to how they do at the bookstore. This plan costs nothing to businesses, could greatly increase their revenue and would make students feel more welcome downtown.

Sorber expects to help both residents and students by increasing the amount of events in the town involving both students and residents of the Borough. He believes that this joint venture will make students more excited about downtown and what it has to offer, as well as downtown residents aware of everything that students have to offer.

Because of his unique situation as a student and a resident, Sorber is the best candidate to build bridges between the two groups and work to make them one cooperative entity. We are confident in Sorber's leadership and innovative ideas. Many students feel that the Borough does not take students seriously, so as students, we feel that Sorber could maturely link the concerns of all constituencies fairly.

Sorber's platform also includes items such as maintaining the historical and aesthetic qualities of the Borough, traffic/parking concerns and advancement of the business district with tools such as practical websites. His plans will not abuse taxpayer's money; they only require open minds to fresh ideas.

We respect Sorber's mature approach to running for mayor; he has committed himself to live in Lewisburg after graduation and is mindful of all of the issues this community faces. We are confident that he will act in fairness and not adversely disrupt the flow of local politics. The Bucknellian encourages all registered voters in the Borough of Lewisburg to vote for Sorber Nov. 6.

Letters to the Editor

Convicted terrorists at Lewisburg, Pa.

To the Editor:

It has been confirmed, the four convicts from the Embassy bombing have found a new home at the local federally run and operated, Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary. They join the previous World Trade Center bombers from the 1990s incident there.

Why Pennsylvania? Why not the middle of the country in one of the other two high security prisons? Could this have been a deal? Director of Homeland Security Tom Ridge moves to a new powerful position in response for cooperation for housing vicious deadly criminals in our state? What we have created is a hot triangle of housing. For what reason would these men be housed so close to New York City and Washington, D.C., in Lewisburg? The convicts for what? What was the deal? Ridge positioned?

Years ago Pennsylvania built a notorious identity when it first accepted trash from NYC and New Jersey for our local state dumps. Now apparently we still do have a policy to accept trash—but trash from the world!

At what price do these prisoners enter our neighborhood? These are the questions we should be addressing to our leaders and the obvious question is, who wins? Certainly not you or I, Mr. and Mrs. Resident of Pennsylvania. Help us find the answer and an alternative to putting our local innocent and uninformed citizens at risk.

Who in Pennsylvania is responsible for this? Finding out may affect our upcoming elections. This is indeed a security risk to all of us in the local area. Our neighbors, the bombers, are not good citizens, now are they?

Thirst for oil dominates U.S. policy

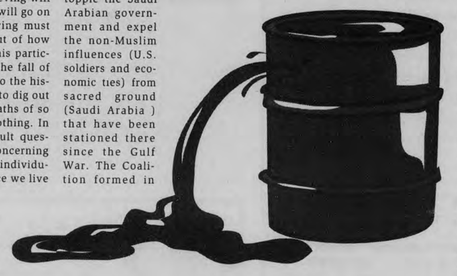
By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

After five weeks of constant headlines about terrorism, fear, revenge, patriotism and death by cruise missiles, it is time to think more critically. The grieving will eventually end and we will go on with our lives. The living must make some meaning out of how our nation arrived at this particular state of affairs in the fall of 2001. With a wary eye to the historical record, we have to dig out the facts so that the deaths of so many will not be for nothing. In order to do this, difficult questions must be asked concerning what drives us, both as individuals and as a nation. Since we live in a tightly interconnected global economic system the same question must be extended to all humanity.

Do we live economically and politically in our modern society in any semblance of a sustainable manner? The industrialized countries of the world are using natural raw materials and minerals at an alarming rate.

Many international conflicts are over natural resources that are necessary for people to exist within their immediate environment. The 1967 Arab/Israeli war was fought over the Golan Heights, the watershed for the Jordan River, as much as it was over religious differences.

The finite nature of oil particularly endangers present day global economic systems and the futures of children all over the world. The addiction to oil has distorted the political objectives of great nations, international global corporations, and now terrorist organizations.



The group led by bin Laden states that one of its aims is to topple the Saudi Arabian government and expel the non-Muslim influences (U.S. soldiers and economic ties) from sacred ground (Saudi Arabia) that have been stationed there since the Gulf War. The Coalition formed in 1990 was meant to keep the essential oil flowing. Economically developed nations have unwisely made it policy to maintain a high standard of living on this finite resource.

We do this knowing that conflicts will arise. In the United States we scrapped a government-led synthetic/alternative fuels program in 1980. We are more dependent on foreign oil than ever. When we shifted from car-based fleets to the predominance of SUVs, we only exacerbated the situation. We are short changing the ability of our environment and economy to sustain itself much past the middle of this century.

Ignoring these facts can only lead to political instability within countries that are resource-rich but are economically and politically dependent. Nigeria has long suffered under the predatory nature of bad political leadership and international oil companies that exploit the situation.

In Asia it is known that the next great oil fields will be beneath the Caspian Sea. The U.S. based corporation ExxonMobil has been actively developing fields and securing rights for oil and gas pipelines in this area. ExxonMobil is making millionaires of many in this unstable area of the world. Are they funding the next bin Laden?

Our military has in recent years been developing ties of cooperation with the Uzbeks and others in this area since the fall of the Soviet Union. It is interesting that pipelines to the large Chinese and Indian markets would go through Afghanistan. When we fight for our country are we fighting for Exxon-Mobil as well? Patriotism aside, when an economy is addicted to something as essential as oil, political entities alter their priorities to maintain markets to foster their stability. These sad facts are true for Nigeria and the United States.

The following questions must be asked. Will we alter our lifestyles before we have to fight another war to maintain our oil and fossil fuel addiction? In another 10 years will we be sending soldiers to the Caspian Sea to guard pipelines?

Will we accelerate our move to fuel-cell technology for automobiles and other new technologies that promote economic and environmental stability? How we answer these questions will determine the course of humanity throughout this century.

The answers are up to us as students now, and later as parents and citizens. We operate in an economic atmosphere which caters to the marketplace. As consumers we must play our role smartly and demand fuel alternatives or else the circle of violence and our addiction to oil will drive our foreign policy. The world needs us to lead in more than just military coalition building and blind consumption of goods. An unbalanced energy policy will just maintain our oil dependence. A sustainable world should be our goal. What better legacy can we possibly leave?

Locking Horns

Are patriotic ad campaigns tasteless?

Yes

By Maren Johnson
Forum Editor

Driving down Route 15, here in Lewisburg, on Sept. 12, I was amazed, comforted and proud to see "God Bless America" and "United We Stand" adorning marquees from Dunkin' Donuts to small town car dealerships and even Lewisburg High School. I thought about how quickly we had come together as a nation. I was awed at the immediacy with which these proclamations of hope and pride sprung up. For the first time in my life, Burger King and McDonald's had forgotten about super-sizing and burger wars to display the same simple message for our country.

But just over a month later, my pride in our unity has become jaded. Banners made quickly out of sheets and poster board, proclaiming our love and wishes for New York and D.C., are starting to be crowded out by store bought flags, t-shirts, plaques, stickers—almost anything that could be emblazoned with a flag. When I turned on the television and started watching the commercials that have sprung up, I lost even more faith in our country. Everywhere I saw flags that attach to car windows, compact disc compilations ranging from pop star covers of patriotic tunes to Elvis singing "America the Beautiful" and worst of all, rings engraved with the American flag. Those rings were probably being sold on the one of the home shopping networks after being made in a sweatshop in Malaysia. It was disheartening to know that American pride can be bought with $19.95 plus shipping and handling.

What is most important here for me to convey is that I am not claiming that our thoughts and hearts are in the entirely wrong direction, only that we've gone astray. Capitalism and patriotism make for strange bedfellows. Trying to raise money for the various causes that support victims of Sept. 11 is honorable. Showing our pride to live in a country that can and will recover from the forces that have attempted to destroy us is honorable. Making money off the exploitation of national feelings of vulnerability resulting from terror and destruction is nauseating. I understand that it takes money to produce these goods. I understand that portions of these proceeds are meant to support those in need. I understand that when we buy pins, flags, shirts and bumper stickers were are showing unity and mass pride. What I have trouble with is the idea that somewhere down the line, someone is making money. The leap from pure patriotism to capitalist-tinged pride is unsettling, and I fear, characteristically American.

A little girl from my hometown decided right after Sept. 11 that she would make American flag jewelry out of safety pins and sell them at her mom's office. She got so many orders that she told her mom she was going to donate the extra money to the Red Cross. This is the kind of patriotism that makes me proud to be an American. This was the kind of simple gesture which gives me hope that our country is not so caught up in the recent brand of hyperpatriotism that we have lost sight of what we are proud of.

We should not be proud to walk around with t-shirts of Osama bin Laden's head in a bulls-eye. We should be proud to donate blood, money, time and effort to get our country back on its feet. If patriotism is so important-and I do believe that it is, if nothing else than to simply give comfort and support-then why not pull out old flags from Fourth of Julys past or make your own banner. If you want to support the cause monetarily, donate to the Red Cross or other organizations, not shopping networks and CD manufacturers. Be proud to be an American, not proud to be a consumer.

No

Managing Editor

As I sit here in my room, listening to Old Blue Eyes belt out "New York, New York" and Bruce Springsteen follow with "Born in the U.S.A.," wearing my new NYPD hat and hanging up my American flag, I can still vividly remember the events of Sept. 11. I am also constantly reminded of all the men and women fighting our war against terrorism half a world away. And I remember what it really means to live in this great nation of ours as an American.

The terrorists struck at the heart of American business and capitalism, embodied in the World Trade Center. That is not to say that New York was hit harder or affected more than those in the Pennsylvania crash and in Washington at the Pentagon. But symbolically, the WTC attack was meant to send a message that they wanted capitalism to die.

However, that is where the terrorists failed. Americans are resilient. We took a few days off to mourn the loss but when the time was right, we went back to the stores and the malls to buy American. And buy American we did.

In the last few weeks, there have been many businesses cropping up to capitalize on the emerging American patriotism that has been sparked by attacks on our soil. This has been very healthy and, in a sense, cathartic because it has allowed us to show our defiance and strength.

American flags are the hardest things to buy right now (Wal-Mart sold 110,000 on Sept. 11 and every Wal-Mart in America sold out of flags by the end of the week). When I went to Wal-Mart here in Lewisburg a few days after the attacks and asked about a flag, the clerk looked at me and laughed. Through television advertisements, one company is even selling flag sets that attach to your car windows.

If you need a car to display those flags, many of the American car companies are selling theirs without any financing costs to the consumer. They are calling their sales "Ford Drives America" or "Keep America Rolling" (GM). These companies are taking a huge hit up front to help keep the economy at full steam because they know that profits will come later.

Clothing companies are rushing to bring clothing with flags and other patriotic sayings to their stores and the company that makes the baseball caps for Major League Baseball is having a tough time keeping the hats with the American flag on the side in stock. Even the music stores in the mall have special displays with patriotic albums covering them.

Is this a good thing? Absolutely.

The strength that America has is its economy. Many of you may say that the economy is slowing down right now and I will not disagree with you. However, renewed spending will spark our economy to do great things. Spending creates jobs, increases profits for companies that help keep their stock prices strong and it shows the world that we are not afraid.

And right now, one of the best things to spend money on is patriotism. Wearing a flag on your hat or shirt is a symbol of your support. Its something that can be easily done and it has a number of positive effects. Showing the flag lets our service men and women know that we support their efforts. We defy the terrorists and show our continued support for our government and our way of life.

Sept. 11 was a day that will live in infamy here in America. It will also be the day Americans became patriotic and, if the spending on flags and other American symbols continues, that the economy took a turn for the better.

Privacy under attack

Anti-terrorism may lead to Big Brother

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

In the past month, I have seen more American Flags then I ever did on the fourth of July. Undoubtedly, it seems most have never been more proud to call themselves Americans and defend our nation's values of freedom and democracy.

However, as the U.S. government intensifies its efforts to hunt down the terrorists responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks, I fear we are losing the very freedoms we are fighting to protect.

Today, approximately three and a half million Arab-American's call the U.S. home. Today, these three and a half million citizens are in danger of losing their civil liberties. And although the U.S. Department of Justice is tasked to enforce U.S. laws that ensure fairness and justice for all, it seems that most Americans of Arab decent will not escape the scrutiny of our federal government.

For example, according to the Sept. 23 New York Times, racial and ethnic profiling has now become common practice and is being used more than ever by various government agencies. For the sake of security, many people with Arab backgrounds will have to face numerous detailed interrogations by law enforcement officials. Their phone calls will be monitored, credit card bills examined and routines observed.

While such screenings are nothing new to the FBI and CIA, I certainly do not want to invoke a new era, similar to that of McCarthyism.

Unfortunately, it seems American citizens are determined to catch the terrorists, no matter what the price. After all, would I not be suspicious if a group of Arab men boarded my flight? In the back of my mind, I know I would be afraid, but hopefully I would not act on this fear. On Sept. 20, however, passengers aboard a Northwest Airlines flight refused to fly with four Middle Eastern-looking men.

Of course the Arab community will not be the only ones placed under increased scrutiny. Nationwide, new security measures will undeniably challenge all people's freedom and liberty. For instance, could America enact laws requiring citizens to carry a form of proper identification at all times? As I pass through airport security, will it become common practice for me to be frisked as armed guards walk the gates?

I also fear the new forms of surveillance technology that will become more prevalent. For example, according to the Sept. 22 Economist, closed circuit television systems (CCTV) like the one installed at last year's Super Bowl, scanned the faces of all 72,000 fans and as they passed through the gates. Their faces were then compared with a database of known criminals, using a facial recognition system. Other facilities across the nation are similarly expressing interest in such technology.

The systems are justified on anti-terrorism grounds. Lastly, in the week following the attacks, Congress passed measures to dramatically extend the scope of phone and Internet-wiretapping.

The question I raise is, how much of our privacy are we willing to give up? I realize these security measures could prove crucial in locating criminals and terrorists and that they are implemented for our own safety. I know also that I will be thankful for increased security measures as I board my flight home in December.

However, unbeknownst to many Americans, they could lose many of their rights to privacy, freedom and democracy. In an age where our technological innovations have incredibly capabilities to protect our freedom, they are simultaneously encroaching and controlling our life styles. In the end, it utterly creeps me out to know that Big Brother is watching me. An even greater fear is that he mistakes me for someone else.

Therefore, I realize now that the events of Sept. 11 did much more than strike fear into the heart of our nation. In reviewing these security changes, it seems the terrorists have won their game. America can never be as "free" as it once was.

Aid to Afghans hindered by U.S.

By Daniel Morel
Staff Writer

As soon as Operation Infinite Justice was established as America's plan of action in response to the events of Sept. 11, it was also promised that humanitarian aid would go out to all the refugees suffering in Afghanistan. A month after this promise was made, where are the supplies that so many desperately need?

The effort made by America has been a farce and the rest of the joint U.S./U.K. war effort has hindered and hurt any attempts at relief made by others.

No one outside of the United States views the 37,000 rations dropped as helpful. If anything, the rations have served a purely political purpose; creating positive PR for America. Other relief agencies view the ration drops as even more morbid.

Dominic Nutt, spokesman for Christian Aid, was quoted in The Scotsman on Oct. 18, as saying, "Tony Blair and George Bush have repeatedly said this is a three-stringed offensive—diplomatic, military and humanitarian. Well the diplomatic and military are there but where is the humanitarian? A few planes throwing lunchboxes around over the mountains is laughable. "If the U.S. had really wanted these supplies to be helpful there are other options they could've taken to ensure that most of the food ended up with the refugees, and not in the mountains or in the hands of the Taliban."

For the rest of the international community, agencies such as Islamic Relief, Christian Aid, Oxfam and many others, are becoming desperate; pleading with all parties in conflict to cease hostilities in order to help those in need. Supplies are not getting through. From a purely logistical point of view, many of these organizations are running out of food to give out. They are sending as many supplies as possible to those in need, but it doesn't all reach the end destination. And soon it will be winter. It is estimated that two million Afghans will need food to get through the winter, and 500,000 will be entirely cut off from contact once snow hits in mid-November.

The true desperate nature of this situation is reflected in how all relief agencies are beginning to agree that soon it will be unrealistic to do what is necessary.

There is a reason why the situation is so desperate for these groups. All efforts to help refugees and destitute civilians are forced to go up against the conflict at hand.

The Taliban is intercepting air-dropped U.S. rations, the Northern Alliance is causing problems with caravans waiting to get through from countries such as Uzbekistan and the U.S. bombings are making it nearly impossible for relief aid to do any good.

Local truckers, who so far have been responsible for transporting the supplies across the borders, are no longer willing to help for fear of losing their lives during the night bombings or caravan attacks.

The United States, which previously promised to be as humanitarian as possible, is creating more problems than not. Bombing a Red-Cross warehouse, a U.N. building and a neighborhood have all become simple, acceptable losses so far in this "War on Terrorism." There is nothing humanitarian about willingly bombing Afghani civilians. The attacks on Afghanistan at this point are more about vengeance than justice. We are hurting people who have far less control of their government than we do.

If we are not careful, as Michael Mandel put it in the Oct 9 Toronto Globe & Mail, "We may come to remember that day [Sept. 11], not for its human tragedy, but for the beginning of a headlong plunge into a violent, lawless world."

Gender equality can't be legislated

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Carl Perrone, an all-star athlete at Roxbury High School in New Jersey, elected to attend The University in order to continue competing at the highest level possible. Bucknell had a solid wrestling program that would enable him to match up with some of the best Division I athletes in the nation.

"For me, wrestling was just as, if not more important to my college career as academics," Perrone said. And now, because of Title IX and the University's decision regarding it, Perrone, as well as 12 other athletes in the wrestling program, are being forced to drop all aspirations of a dominant University wrestling program.

This comes at the hands of the University's desire to comply with Title IX, the federal statute supposedly purporting to achieve "gender equality" in sports. This decision does not lead to a higher goal, nor does it make sense.

Between 1981 and 1999, NCAA and NAIA colleges eliminated 40 percent of their wrestling teams. I shall briefly digress to note that at the 2000 Olympics in Australia, U.S. freestyle wrestlers failed to win a single gold medal for the first time since 1968.

This insane federal policy has manifested out of the attempt to live out an arcane feminist dream of making women's sports equivalent to men's.

According to Congress' General Accounting Office, American universities have dropped 171 wrestling teams, 84 men's tennis teams and 56 men's gymnastics teams between 1981 and 1999.

More needs to be said about the self-defeating nature of Title IX and its odious materializations. In order to achieve gender equality and forbid gender discrimination, the University must discriminate against a gender. Even in clear cases of non-discrimination, evidence is futile, and quotas are forced into being.

It is also the only law I am aware of which presupposes discrimination exists without proof. More could be said about the questionable constitutionality of such an act.

The people supporting such federal acts towards gender equality should be considered suspect.

For example, the quintessential liberal daily, The New York Times, according to a 1999 study by DePauw University, allocated only 6.7 percent of the sports stories to women's sports.

Undoubtedly, until the day a federal referendum calls for equality in column inches according to gender, The New York Times would support cutting men's sports to achieve the same end.

The problem is that, as The New York Times knows, interest in female sports is limited. Accordingly, feminists continue their quest to make the man and woman wholly equivalent through legislation. You cannot force women to take up wrestling just as you can't force men to watch it.

At the University, there is a vast dedication to wrestling, and to crew for that matter; just not enough for women's sports. Its not that the women aren't given opportunities, it's just that there aren't women interested in more female sports.

As evidenced by the [ ] petition signers and the wrestlers who started those petitions, there is both the support from the student body and the devotion of the athletes to keep this program aloft.

Unfortunately, these men are now being punished for being born in the wrong gender.

At any student's ideal university, the administration would proudly and pointedly declare, "We will not allow this injustice against our male athletes. We shall fight this! For we shall not go silently into the night!"

At the University, the administration put its tail between its legs, dodged the bullet for a while and finally, quietly announced, "We will go quite silently into the night ... and we will even praise the act that sent us here."

The price of the war on terrorism

By Nathan Blagrove
B&P Layout Editor

For decades the world lived under the threat of a nuclear apocalypse. Then, in 1989, the Berlin Wall tumbled down—a prelude to the fall of Soviet Communism.

Before long, the superpowers agreed to stop aiming their nuclear missiles at each other. Now we face a new war, one with biological and chemical weapons that can wreak havoc without a high-tech delivery method.

With the number of reported anthrax cases in the United States growing, I am beginning to question the war on terrorism.

This war will not be fought only on foreign soil; the terrorists will continue to strike back right here in America, and we have only begun to see the devastation.

Former Secretary of Defense, under the Clinton administration, William Cohen said "A lone madman or nest of fanatics with a bottle of chemicals [or] a batch of plague-inducing bacteria ... can threaten or kill tens of thousands of people in a single act of malevolence." These religious radicals do not think in terms of hours, days or weeks, but in terms of decades. They walk among us, invisible, spending years inserting themselves into sensitive positions before striking.

What price are we willing to pay in our attempt to stop terrorism throughout the world. I cannot wake up to another day like Sept. 11. The murder of over 5,000 innocent American civilians is absolutely horrendous. It is heartbreaking to watch family members of victims helplessly wander about, carrying pictures of their loved ones, searching, hoping and praying.

There will be no winners in this war, just the loss of more innocent lives. However, these crimes against America can not go unpunished. Whoever is responsible for these crimes should be brought to justice.

Nonetheless, it seems clear that no good will come out of our campaign to eradicate terrorism from the face of the earth. Only more tragedies.

This campaign has the possibility of spiraling into some sort of apocalyptic crusade. But it must be waged.

After the nuclear détante of the Cold War, there was a brief moment of relief. Now the world faces a new challenge. Can it be met?

APEC condemns Sept. 11 attacks

Member nations resolve to fight global terrorism and to promote trade

Furthering the aims of the administration to bring together the world against terrorism, President Bush paid a visit to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum Monday to rally the 21 nations to the cause of the United States. While the group did not give a complete approval of the military actions in Afghanistan, APEC did release a strong statement condemning the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 as well as terrorism in general. According to CNN, the group hoped that their statement would be considered a "constitution" against terrorism in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks. The group's members also agreed to help fight terrorism by freezing terrorist assets along with implementing stronger security measures in their individual countries.

While not on the same page with many issues, the group has come together to condemn terrorism and help the United States in its newfound war. The single-mindedness displayed by the group was quite an achievement considering the vast economic and political gulfs separating the member countries. The diverse membership includes nations such as the United States, China, Russia and Vietnam.

CNN reported that the statement, which was called "visionary" by many leaders, condemns all terrorism, and vows to fight "...other terrorist attacks in all forms and manifestations, committed wherever, whenever and by whomsoever as a profound threat to the peace, prosperity and security of all people, of all faiths, of all nations." However, there is some concern that the fine line between freedom fighter and terrorist could cause problems in the future.

The statement also included a declaration of the group regarding their commitment to free trade. According to CNN, the terrorism declaration is the first political statement in the group's history.

In addition to these promises and declarations, the APEC Conference served as a meeting place for Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin. The two leaders have grown closer since the terrorist attacks, each becoming less rigid on the contentious issues between the United States and Russia. The two most important points between the two countries, and the greatest points of conflict, are the U.S. plan for missile defense and nuclear arsenals. Now it seems the two are beginning to work towards compromise—Russia now saying the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty might be modified, and the United States saying that further reductions in our nuclear stockpile might be acceptable.

In addition to addressing the concerns of the United States over terrorism and security, the conference also addressed the issue of free trade, which, according to MSNBC, the group believes is essential to improving the members' economies. The members also pledged that the attacks would not severely damage the world economy for the long term. The delegates said that they would support policies in their respective countries to slow the downturn seen in the world markets since Sept. 11.

Overall, the APEC conference has been considered a success by the leaders, provided the member nations live up to the promises made this past weekend. It would seem the United States and Russia gained diplomatically, and much of the world gained economically from the conclusions reached at the summit. Provided these are the terms the world is now working under, this could be a truly momentous era in human history.

IRA begins program to decommission weapons

In response to a demand by the Ulster Unionist party of Northern Ireland, the Irish Republican Army (IRA) has embarked on a large-scale program to decommission its weapons. According to a report by CNN, the move followed the resignation of three Ulster Unionist leaders from the Northern Ireland assembly due to the lack of progress in disarming the IRA. The ministers stated that they would only return to the government if the IRA made good on agreements to disarm reached 18 months ago.

The move is receiving praise from both British and Irish politicians. British Prime Minister Tony Blair said that the move was of "fundamental significance" to both the communities of Northern Ireland and the rest of the world. He also encouraged "splinter" groups to follow suit. Otherwise the peace process could still be in danger.

As reported by MSNBC, the British Secretary of Northern Ireland John Reid told Parliament that two security watchtowers were being torn down. Also, the destruction of a British army base and other security installations will begin on Thursday. These actions are in direct response to the move by the IRA and could signal the start of a new era in British-Irish relations. CNN reports that the new decommissioning will most likely lead to the lifting of a ban on Sinn Fein members attending North-South meetings.

Although this action signals a great step forward in peace negotiations, all sides are quick to point out that there is still a great deal of work to be done. Reid was quoted by CNN as saying, "To sustain this will require hard work, steady nerves and the continued ability on all sides to reach out and make difficult compromises." He also said that British security and troop reductions would continue so long as relations continued to normalize.

Hoping that the actions undertaken by the IRA could encourage other terrorist organizations, the Spanish government has asked the Basque separatist group ETA to follow the lead of the IRA. According to CNN, the government asked ETA to begin turning over weapons in the wake of the IRA announcement. Spain's deputy prime minister Mariano Rajoy was quoted by CNN as saying, "The IRA move is enormously positive. It could leave the terrorist organization ETA as the last group in Europe that is still killing people." However, many political analysts believe that the disarmament of the ETA is unlikely.

"Power Lunch" highlights University's Student Managed Investment Fund

By Michael Gorman

On Wednesday, the Student Managed Investment Fund took the national stage with an appearance on CNBC's "Power Lunch." CNBC is a financial station that recently introduced a weekly segment in which they profile an investment club.

In response to an email sent by senior Peter Seuss, CNBC selected Bucknell's group for their profile.

Speaking from the academic quad, the group discussed the origin of the program as well as some of the stocks which they either own or have been following. The program's faculty advisors are Professors of management, Robert Needham and David Jensen.

The fund was established last year, with a donation of $200,000, and received an additional $125,000 in donations this year.

After discussing the origins and purposes of the class, spokespersons Debbie Chien '02, Mike Fusarelli '02 and Seuss each discussed a stock which the group has been following. Their conclusions were then compared with financial professionals. After brief technical difficulties, the group rated Nokia, Wal-Mart and Chevron-Texaco, giving technical reasoning for each.

For every stock, the two experts offered conflicting advice. However, the group found support for their conclusion from at least one expert in every instance.

Anchor Bob Sellers said that the group members were excellent representatives of the University, utilizing terms that he could not even pronounce in college.

Stocks weather the knockout punch

It has been well over a month since two jetliners smashed into the World Trade Center in New York and cast a very dark cloud over an already suffering economy. As expected, the world's financial markets took a brief hit in the days after the buildings fell and while New York mourned. Unexpectedly, however, the markets have gotten themselves up off the mat and are beginning to show bullish signs that would signal a return to the days when the markets could not go down.

Many have been wondering how the markets can act like this, even in the face of bad news. The answer is not that simple since much of what happened in the past refuses to make itself applicable today. The financial world will certainly take some time to settle all the issues it has been given since the attacks. And everyday investors will learn that the markets just got more difficult to understand.

Business news has been puzzling in the last few days and the market's reaction has been equally so. On Wednesday, the markets shrugged off some bad corporate earnings and news of layoffs that should have caused problems.

According to CBS MarketWatch, Sears announced 4,900 job cuts and earnings in line with estimates, Hershey Foods announced a major cost cutting and streamlining effort and Honeywell reported in-line third quarter numbers but guided analysts down for the upcoming quarter. Normally, that would be enough to send those stocks plummeting. However, Sears' stock rose 1.4 percent, Hershey's stock lost a penny on the day and Honeywell's stock rose almost 70 cents.

Financial institutions were also included in the group showing amazing resiliency in the face of trouble. One of the biggest names—in light of the downtown situation—in this category has been American Express. The company, hit very hard for many reasons, had to move most of its employees who were housed in its World Financial Center and Vesey Street locations.

According to TheStreet.com, earnings were 60 percent lower than the same period last year. American Express had been aiming to hit their original goals before the attacks set them back. However, in the face of this bad news, American Express stock has risen solidly.

American investors have shown their trust of publicly traded companies on the New York Stock Exchange, NASDAQ and all the other financial markets in the country and abroad. They have all but understood the many factors going into earnings numbers and the need for some layoffs in light of the business slowdowns that were almost inevitable following Sept. 11.

One factor contributing to the gains made by companies since the attack has been the fact that some did not do as poorly as was first believed. They have been able to build a customer base of consumers willing to go and spend money. Another factor is that patriotic buying of American stocks has allowed stock prices to remain stable and in many cases, go up.

Many people were talking about buying for the sake of supporting the nation after the equities markets reopened for business. In some senses, that has happened over the last month.

Whatever does happen over the next few months, it is sure to be groundbreaking. Much of the happenings in the last few weeks have defied the laws of gravity previously understood by so many. But one thing is for sure, the financial markets have weathered the storm and are poised to make their next move.

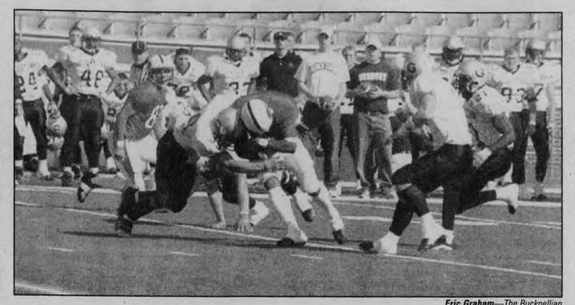
Bison shutout: Hoyas defeated 34-0

Brinson rushes for 164 yards and a touchdown in fifth straight Bison win; team defeats Lafayette in previous week 17-16

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Jess Brinson '04 rushed for 164 yards against the Hoyas in place of the injured standout Jabu Powell.

After two weeks of breezing past opponents for easy wins, the Bucknell football team showed that they can win close games as well, defeating Lafayette College 17-16. The Bison then returned home and continued their winning ways, pummeling Georgetown University 34-0 in front of a Homecoming crowd of over 8,000 people.

It was obvious by the way that Lafayette came out of the gates that the Bison were not going to have an easy win like they had the previous two weeks against St. Mary's and Towson. On the first drive of the game, the Leopards moved the ball 72 yards in 12 plays, but the Bison defense held Lafayette to a field goal, and the score was 3-0 only six minutes into the game.

The Bison struck back late in the first quarter. Following an interception by Juan Morales '03 on the Lafayette 41-yard line, the Bison moved the ball deep into Leopard territory. The six play, 41-yard scoring drive was capped off by an eight-yard run by Jabu Powell '02.

The Bison held onto their 7-3 lead until two minutes left in the first half when the Leopards began to move the ball yet again. The Bucknell defense held them in the red zone for the second straight time and forced Lafayette to settle for a 32-yard field goal to make the score at the half 7-6 in favor of the Bison.

The Bison moved in for another score mid way through the third quarter following an interception by Bobby Young '02, which he returned to the Bucknell 44-yard line. From there the Bison moved into Leopard territory, but could not put the ball in the end zone. Chris Lundberg '03 knocked in a field goal from 42 yards out to extend the Bison lead to 10-6.

On the ensuing drive Lafayette pushed for 89 yards in nine plays to score their first touchdown of the game, making the score 13-10 in favor of the Leopards. After both teams traded turnovers, Todd Wenrich '03 connected with Jim Horan '03 from 33 yards out to give the Bison a 17-13 lead that they would not relinquish. For the third time in the game the Bison had converted on a Leopard turnover.

The Leopards made a last attempt at a comeback when they hit a field goal with just over six minutes remaining in the game to make the score 17-16 Bison. Patriot League's Defensive Player of the Week, Stephane Pluviose '04, secured the Bison win when he intercepted a Lafayette pass with 10 seconds remaining in the game.

Team of the Week

The following weekend the Bison returned to their old ways, getting out in front early against Homecoming opponent, Georgetown. On the first play from scrimmage, Reed Tunison '02 intercepted a Georgetown pass and returned the ball 29 yards for the Bison touchdown. The Bison had a 7-0 lead 16 seconds into the game, and would not look back. "You can't do it better than that," Head Coach Tom Gadd said.

On their next drive, the Bison moved that ball 41 yards on four plays and capped off the drive with a four-yard touchdown pass from Wenrich to J.C. Morgan '04 to make the score 13-0 Bison. While the Bucknell offense was making it look easy, the Bison defense was not letting Hoyas move the ball much at all.

Wenrich began the game 9-9 on pass attempts with 140 yards passing, and this helped the Bison get out to such a fast start. With just under six minutes remaining in the first quarter, Todd Warmington '03 ran the ball in from 14 yards out to give the Bison a 20-0 lead. The next Bison drive consisted of two Wenrich passes, both connecting with Albert Marquardt '04. The first was for 47 yards, and that latter for 18 yards for a touchdown, giving the Bison a 27-0 lead.

With just over eight minutes remaining in the first half, Jess Brinson '04 ran in from 53 yards out to give the Bison a 34-0 lead that would prove to be the final score. Brinson ran for 164 yards on 18 carries to earn himself the Diversified Player of the Game.

"I was just waiting to get my time to shine, and when I got it I didn't want to let it go to waste," Brinson said about his opportunity to start the game against the Hoyas due to an injury to Powell.

The second half of the game did not consist of any scoring, but both teams were quite sloppy with many turnovers. The Bison defense proved to be too much for the Hoyas, and the Bison recorded their first shutout since 1997 against Towson.

"The shutout was just the main focus for the second half of the game," Tunison said.

"Coming into the game we wanted to throw the ball," Wenrich said. "Passing early opened up the run."

The Bison look to extend their winning streak to six games next week when they visit Fordham University.

Club ice hockey gets season underway, ends weekend 1-2

By Scott Kloss
Senior Writer

The men's club ice hockey team concluded its first weekend of action with one victory and two defeats.

On Friday, the Bison took to the ice for the first time against St. Joseph's. Scoring two goals in the first period, St. Joe's used the fast start to keep the Bison off balance and eventually lead to the victory. Shining for the Bison was sophomore Brad DeVoog, firing in two goals in each of the final periods to keep the Bison within striking distance.

On the opposite side of the ice, goalie Tim Sather '02 did his part, pushing aside nearly 40 shots to hold St. Joe's from a convincing win.

The Bison fought to tie the game at five in the third period, but St. Joe's pressured home a sixth goal, and added an empty net goal when Sather was pulled in the closing moments of the match for a final tally of 7-5.

"Tim played well, and kept us in the game. We just couldn't find a way to score late," said senior forward Chris Newhouse.

On Saturday, the team welcomed Lafayette to the rink. While the Bison finished with a 5-4 loss, the team played hard for first year Head Coach Brain Cardello.

"You can't teach a team to stick together and fight to the end. I was proud of our guys for making a nice run in this contest." Cardello said.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The club ice hockey team will try to turn around a 1-2 start against Temple and Franklin and Marshall.

Keeping them close was again goalie Sather, stopping 34 shot attempts. This provided a fail safe for the squad, but reminiscent of a season ago when the team squared off with Lafayette, the result was not in the Orange and Blue's favor.

The Bison have a rich history with Lafayette, facing off versus one another last year in the conference finals. The Bison finished with a two-to-one defeat in the series, concluding their first year in the Delaware Valley Collegiate Hockey Conference.

When you want to talk about dedication, go no further than the staff and players of men's ice hockey. Arriving at the rink at 6 a.m. each morning, the team develops a unique bond, which shines through on the ice.

"The 6 a.m. practice alone brings a team together. We do work hard in practice which prepares us for each game," Captain Graham Dewar '02 said.

To wrap up the weekend, the team took to the ice on Sunday against Rutgers College. Using skillful passes and team hustle combined with only seven players dressed on the opponents' side helped propel the Bison to an 8-0 blowout of the Scarlet Knights.

"I really applaud their effort only playing with two subs the entire game. I know after one minute of skating you need to catch your breath, but they gave it their all," Dewar said.

Halfway through the second period, with a 5-0 lead, Tim Sather was replaced by freshman Matt Ellis.

Getting his first taste of the "big show," Ellis played brilliantly, corralling 15 saves for the Bison.

Scott Whitefield '04 tallied two goals, while Dave Gerlach '04, DeVoogd, Morgan Chesnik '02 and Chris Nicholas '05 each added a goal, completing the Bucknell romp.

"The team is looking good. A little more practice and some more games and we are all set. These early games against tough opponents allow us to work out our 'kinks' and figure out our lines. With coach's help we will be alright." Dewar said.

Cardello can now breathe a sigh of relief watching his team finish its first week of play. "Relived, that's how I feel at the moment. There were so many unknowns coming into the first game, and there is only so much I can do once the puck drops," he said. "The emotions were high from the start and once the lines get used to one another, good things will probably happen."

The men's ice hockey team's next match is at Temple on Friday, while on Sunday the Bison return for a match against Franklin and Marshall at 4:15 p.m.

Soccer defeats St. Peter's and St. Francis but loses to Buffalo and Lehigh

By Tara Utchel
Staff Writer

The men's soccer team suffered a 2-1 loss to Buffalo over Homecoming weekend. The Bison dominated most of the game, but were unable to capitalize on scoring opportunities.

The Bison were first to get on the scoreboard with a goal from Chris Beekman '04 midway through the first half. Senior Captain Andy Aurand chipped an indirect kick over the Bull's defensive wall and found Beekman's head. Beekman headed the ball into the lower left corner for the 1-0 lead. Buffalo retaliated 10 minutes later though, and the two teams headed into halftime with a 1-1 tie.

Early in the second half, Buffalo scored what was to be the winning goal off a penalty kick. Bison goalkeeper Steve Whitaker '04 and one of the Bull's forwards collided during a break away. Generally, these incidents generate a whistle and a yellow card. The referees protect the goalies during these occasions, but ironically Whitaker received the yellow card and Buffalo was awarded with the penalty kick.

The Bison outshot Buffalo in the second half 15-5, but were unable to put any of those shots into the back of the net.

"This weekend's game was one where you just shake your head after the final whistle. The effort was there. The quality of play was there. We just did not win," Head Coach Brandon Nash said. "When you outplay another team and do not get the result, those are the toughest losses to take. We are 4-8, but we are a better team than our record indicates."

Aurand agrees with Nash. "The Buffalo game was a disappointing loss," he said. "The score did not reflect the way the game was played and we deserved better."

On a more positive note, the Orange and Blue generated a win against St. Peter's on Oct. 10. The team dominated the game in Jersey City, N.J. to record its first win on the road for the 2001 season.

"We asked the seniors to step up and lead the team," Nash said. "They did a good job, with Ryan Weber getting a goal and an assist, Nathan Hopfinger an assist, Greg Stunzenas anchoring the shutout and Andy at outside midfield."

Webber started the game at forward, instead of his traditional position as a central midfielder. This change greatly benefited the team. Webber scored his first career goal and assisted the game-winning goal to help the Bison to a 2-0 shutout. Junior Nick Taylor opened the scoring 15 minutes into the game from Webber's assist. Late in the second half, Webber insured the win with a shot in the right corner of the net. "We played better," Aurand said. "We moved the ball better at times, but continued to play sporadic soccer."

Over fall break, the inconsistent play of the Bison cost them a game against Lehigh. The Mountain Hawks scored three unanswered goals to defeat Bucknell 4-1 in a Patriot League match. The men dropped to 0-3 in league play.

"Things weren't going our way. We need more consistency and we need 90 minutes of good soccer, instead of playing 40 on-and-off minutes," Aurand said.

"Against Lehigh we lost our focus at halftime," Nash said. "We had control of the end of the first half and relaxed a bit to start the second half. This has been our downfall all season long. When we relax, we make fundamental mistakes. All three of Lehigh's second half goals could have been easily prevented, if we did what we were supposed to do."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bison keeper Steve Whittaker '04 (top) and Chris Beekman '04 dominated Buffalo but did not win.

The Bison continued the oscillating effect of winning and losing over the remainder of fall break. St. Francis came to Lewisburg with five wins and left with five wins.

"It was a good win. We played well considering the bad weather conditions," Aurand said.

In preparation for the Red Flash game, the team made a significant decision to change the formation of their defense.

"As a staff we felt a flat back four was best for the program," Nash said, "but we felt it would be too hard to implement this year. The team made a decision to make the change, which I admired because we talk about them taking ownership of the team. By approaching the staff they took ownership. Though we still have a lot of work with it, the team looked pretty good the first time out against St. Francis."

Wind and rain restrained either team from getting many shots off. The Orange and Blue, however, were able to score the lone goal of the game. Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 buried a pass from Michael Lookingland '05 past St. Francis' keeper.

The Bison have six games remaining, four of which are Patriot League games. They must win all four league-games in order to advance to post-season play.

The next match will be a home game on October 27th against Binghamton University.

"I feel things will work out here at the end if the team stays positive," Nash said. "We have the ability to put together a nice streak to end the season and change our luck. We need to win our last four Patriot League games to get into the tournament, but I 100 percent believe we will get it done."

World Series Predictions

Justin McCarthy
Senior Writer

Do the Diamondbacks have a chance against a Yankee team going for a four-peat which has won four of the last five World Series? Hm ... maybe, if Johnson and Schilling can win four games. However, all the Yankees need to do is beat one of them once and with the pitching depth and the way the Yanks pitchers are rolling it wouldn't surprise me if the D'Backs got swept. While the D'Backs aren't as good as the A's or the M's, they do have Johnson and Schilling, two pitchers who have the potential to dominate a game. However, Johnson and Schilling alone will not be enough to vanquish the defending Champs. Yankees in five games.

Rob Schmicker
Senior Writer

This time every year brings out the worst in me. For some reason, I am angrier and more bitter. I can't blame this on schoolwork, but rather on baseball. For a Mets fan, seeing the Yankees win the World Series every year kills me. If it's October, I know the Yankees are winning. This October was no different, as the Yanks defeated two teams with 100 wins each. Led by Captain America, Derek Jeter, they will once again haunt me this October. I want them to lose in five, so naturally they will win in five. No analysis is needed- the Yankees will win to spite me. It will be a long off-season.

Scott Kloss
Senior Writer

In this series I see the "City That Never Sleeps" controlling the tempo and coming away with its fourth ring in five years. All season it seemed as if the Yanks have been on cruise control, just waiting for their time to strike. Since Game Three of the division series vs the A's, the Yanks have been the team of old—finding a way to win. Even if Randy Johnson and Curt Schilling pitch every fourth day, that might not be enough to keep Yankee bats from adding runs to the scoreboard. And after considering what the city has been through, having New York on top kind of makes you smile.

A World Series prediction from a New Yorker? Everyone probably knows where I'm going with this one. Earlier in the year, I predicted that the Yankees would beat the Diamondbacks in seven games. I said it so I'll stick to it. The ALCS and NLCS are still going on as I write this but there's no need to wait. Looks like my prediction might come true anyway. Clemens and Mussina will out-duel Johnson and Schilling. That's all the Yanks need. DestiNY again.

Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

As with much of the postseason thus far, I imagine that we'll see a lot of low-scoring nail-biters, particularly in the first two games against Curt Schilling and Randy Johnson . I think the Diamondbacks have a slight edge in the first two matchups—Schilling has been indomitable this postseason, and Johnson owns the Yankees' (see 1995 ALDS). It's impossible not to respect the Yankees, but at the same time I hate to see the Diamondbacks—the "youngest" expansion franchise ever to reach the Series—overlooked. I'm going to take a chance and pick Arizona to prevail in a very competitive six game series.

Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

Those smug bastards are at it again. I finally feel comfortable building that shrine in my closet dedicated to the Yankees so I can worship it and kiss my Joe Torre bobble-head doll every day for good luck, praying that the Yanks are casting their pixie dust on me wherever I go, keeping me warm on those cold nights along with my officially licensed Yankee jersey under my navy Yankee windbreaker wrapped in my pinstripe fleece blanket. But sadly, I would eventually come to realize that there comes a time when you have to kill a loved one just because they're the devil. I think that's the crossroads at which we stand. Arizona in six.

BCS Rankings stir up college football world

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

Surprise! With college football's first Bowl Championship Series (BCS) standings released this week, controversy has struck the nation.

Miami (5-0, 2-0), ranked the number one team in the land in both of college football's major polls, has been told otherwise by the BCS. This is not the only time in which the Hurricanes have felt robbed by the system that has ranked them number four this year. Last year the 'Canes finished the regular season ranked second in both polls but were snubbed by the BCS of playing in the national championship game. Florida State ended up playing for all the marbles despite losing the season's head-to-head match-up with Miami.

The fact that Miami's strength of schedule is ranked 92nd in the nation out of 117 teams surely has something to do with their low BCS status. They won't get any help in that category this week as they host the lowly 2-4 West Virginia Mountaineers on Thursday night. Will the 'Canes be fortunate enough to travel to Pasadena this year?

Although it cannot please everybody, the BCS has treated the nation to number one Oklahoma versus No. two Nebraska, creating an even bigger showdown than fans initially anticipated in Lincoln Saturday.

The Huskers (8-0, 4-0) survived a scare last weekend when they found themselves knotted up at 28 at the half with the mediocre Red Raiders of Texas Tech (3-3, 1-3). It looked as if Nebraska had gained enough momentum to stave off Texas Tech when Quarterback Eric Crouch scampered seven yards into the end zone on the Huskers' first possession of the second half. However, it took two fourth-down stops in crunch-time by the Husker defense to seal the deal.

Moving to the Pac-Ten, fans will enjoy a huge match-up this weekend in Palo Alto when number 22 Stanford hosts unbeaten UCLA (6-0, 3-0), who is ranked third in the BCS.

The Cardinal (4-1, 3-1) was ranked in the top 25 two weekends ago before falling short 45-39 to Washington State, who is now ranked 15th. However Stanford got their redemption last weekend, stunning No. five Oregon in Eugene. The Cardinal rallied from a 42-28 deficit to pull within one and later scored on a Kerry Carter three yard touchdown with 1:10 remaining to seal the deal, 49-42.

Upsetting the Ducks was nothing new to Stanford, who halted Oregon's nation best 23-game home winning streak. The Cardinal also ruined an undefeated record by the Ducks for the eighth time since 1964. Oregon (6-1, 3-1) plummeted to number 13 after the loss.

It has been a long off week for the University of Florida football team after being shocked by Auburn Oct. 13. The road does not get any easier for the Gators (5-1, 3-1), as they must travel this weekend to Athens and face No. 16 Georgia (5-1, 4-1). In fact, four of their remaining five games are against teams currently ranked in the top 20.

The Gator-Bulldog battle is not the only noteworthy SEC match-up this week, however. Number nine Tennessee will host Lou Holtz's No. 14 Gamecocks (6-1, 5-1) this Saturday. Although ranked lower than the 'Vols (4-1, 3-1) in both major polls, South Carolina actually stands atop the SEC East division, controlling its own destiny. The Gamecocks rolled up a school-record 656 yards last weekend while smacking Vanderbilt 46-14. South Carolina has the opportunity to go to back-to-back Bowls for the first time since 1980.

Courtesy of Reuters

The 7-0 Maryland Terrapins, who take on Florida State next week, are ranked seventh by the BCS.

The Fresno State Bulldogs seemed almost destined to attain a BCS bid this year. They had everything going for them, especially their cupcake remainder of a schedule, right? Well ... not exactly. The Broncos of Boise State (4-3, 3-1) terminated the Bulldogs' improbable run at a national championship last Friday night when they sacked Heisman Trophy candidate David Carr 10 yards from the end zone with 51 seconds remaining. Fresno State (6-1, 2-1) scored just two points in the final 27.5 minutes. Carr threw for 345 yards in the 35-30 loss. After Fresno State's debacle last week, it is safe to say that the Cinderella story of the season has migrated to College Park.

The Maryland Terrapins (7-0, 5-0) have not won an ACC title since 1985, nor have they won seven games since then. The Terps' 7-0 start this season is their best since 1978. However, despite their number eight BCS ranking, they have only defeated one ranked-team this season (Georgia Tech). They will surely have their hands full Saturday when they invade Tallahassee to face No. 18 Florida State.

The Seminoles (4-2, 3-1) are coming off of a 43-7 pounding of Virginia, in which wide receiver Javon Walker had 124 receiving yards and a touchdown. However, the 'Noles are suffering with internal problems right now, trying to find a quarterback. Turnover prone starter Chris Rix has been so inconsistent that Coach Bobby Bowden is considering starting freshman Adrian McPherson Saturday, who has played reasonably well as a backup this season. Florida State desperately needs a win against Maryland this weekend to build momentum for their final three games against Clemson, North Carolina State and Florida.

Lehigh avenges volleyball loss

Bison sweep Lafayette but fall 3-1 to Black Hawks

By Pat Evans
Senior Writer

Fired-up crowds have been part of the fuel that feeds the Bison fire this season, but they have also been a downfall.

After dominating Lehigh at home earlier in the season, the Orange and Blue fell to their league rival 3-1 (26-30, 30-28, 30-22, 30-19). The Bison were able to bounce back and sweep Lafayette 3-0 (33-31, 30-21, 30-15).

The Bison got off the bus at Lehigh ready to play, coming out strong and taking the first set 30-26. But the Black Hawks battled back to take the next, and never looked back after that.

"We just lost our concentration," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "We went away from our game plan, and you can't play someone else's game at your own speed and expect to win."

Shannon Walker '02 tallied 16 kills on 34 attempts with just two errors to lead the Bison in the losing effort.

"It's always difficult when we're in someone else's gym," Walker said. "But we just didn't play our best, which was more of the reason for the loss."

Brandi Trapasso '04 recorded 15 kills and 14 digs to continue her streak of versatile play. Jackie Leahy '05 and Whitney Williams '02 also recorded "double-doubles." Leahy contributed with 12 kills and 10 digs and Williams had 37 assists and 10 digs.

"The main area where we struggled was in serve receive," Trapasso said. "We're usually really good at that, but we didn't have it against Lehigh."

For the Bison it was the third loss in Patriot League play, moving them to third in the League behind Lehigh and American.

The Bison had a chance to redeem themselves in the next contest against league foe Lafayette and capitalized. In a much-needed win away from home, the Bison showed their resiliency by dominating throughout. Walker once again led the way, slamming match-highs 19 kills and five blocks.

"We were much more focused against Lafayette," Walker said. "We were coming off some disappointing losses and were ready to come and earn back our confidence."

With the Bison in control of the match, Opalski had an opportunity to go deep in the line-up to improve the depth of the team. Breean Trapasso '04 posted a career-high six service aces to go with eight assists and six digs. Caroline Dougherty '05 added 10 digs, a match and career-high for the freshman.

"It was a match in which it was a total team effort," Opalski said. "I was very pleased with how we responded."

The Bison have major upcoming opportunities to bury the Lehigh loss and regain control of the Patriot League. Navy and American, two teams that the Bison faced earlier in the season away, come to Davis Gym this weekend.

"We need to not let ourselves get frustrated and have a really good weekend," Brandi Trapasso said.

Davis Gym has proved itself as a major factor in Bison success this season. The team has only lost one match at home, and will look to overcome some unfortunate losses to inferior teams that they have suffered.

"We're going to prepare our best in practice," Walker said. "And the home court advantage will hopefully be a major advantage for us."

But while American may be the more difficult of the two matches this weekend, Opalski will not let the team make the mistake of overlooking a very strong Navy squad.

"We have to take this one match at a time, or we'll lose focus," Opalski said. The total team effort that was present against Lafayette will once again be needed in order to have the productive weekend that the Bison are looking for.

Men's polo goes 4-4 in Princton and California tournaments

By Barbara Morgan

This past weekend the Bison traveled to Princeton for the inter-regional championships of the Collegiate Water Polo Association.

The squad opened up the weekend with a 13-3 victory over Washington & Jefferson. Freshman Aaron Platshon scored five goals in the victory and eight other Bison each added a goal. Junior Chris Saxton had one goal, two assists and a steal.

In the team's 9-8 overtime win against George Washington, Dave Kennedy became the school's all-time career saves leader. Kennedy was also named the Collegiate Water Polo Association Southern Division Player of the Week for the week ending Oct. 14. Heading into the contest Kennedy needed only four saves to top the record board, but recorded 15 in the contest.

Saxton was again solid offensively with five goals on five attempts, including the game-winner in sudden death overtime. He also contributed two assists. Platshon played solid defense recording a career-high nine steals and five ejections drawn.

Meeting up with No. 16 Princeton later in the day, the Bison suffered a disappointing 11-4 loss. Eliott Benoist recorded two goals, sophomore Scott Afzal and freshman Paul Yerkes each had one goal for the Orange and Blue. In goal, Kennedy stopped nine Princeton shots and Martin, playing the last two minutes of the game, recorded two saves and a steal.

On Sunday, the Bison fell 10-8 to Johns Hopkins, giving them a fourth place finish at the tournament. Sophomore Jamie Saettele and Platshon led the squad with two goals each. Platshon also handed out one assist and had one steal in the contest.

"Johns Hopkins is a tough team," Platshon said. "We had struggled against a weak GW team, but reorganized to come back with some intensity. Early in the game, we played flat and allowed a 0-4 deficit to accumulate but no one shied from the challenge. We kept challenging their lead with tenacious defense and movement offense."

Eventually Hopkins would win by two, but the Bison were proud of their comeback effort. "It was our best team effort of the season so far," Platshon said. "We need to play this motivated as a team in every game for the rest of the season."

Traveling to California over fall break, the Bison competed in the Claremont Convergence Tournament Oct. 12-14. The Bison went 2-2 in the tournament, bringing their record to 6-9 before this past weekend's competition.

A disappointing 13-9 overtime loss opened the weekend on Oct. 12. The Bison played a tough four quarters against Brigham Young University of Hawaii before a goal scored in the last four seconds of regulation took it into overtime and Bucknell couldn't force a win.

Later in the day, the Orange and Blue lost 8-5 to a tough LaVerne squad, the nation's seventh-ranked Division III program at the time. The tired Bison squad came out sluggish and allowed LaVerne to score six of their eight goals in the first quarter.

"Although we played outstanding defense the rest of the way, we struggled to score and could not complete a comeback," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

Hungry for a win, the Bison came out strong the next day against Whittier, taking the game 7-3. The Bison outscored Whittier 6-0 in the first and fourth quarters to seal the win behind balanced scoring from Saettele, who finished with two goals. Afzal and Platshon each had one goal. Kennedy was also solid in goal as he recorded 12 saves.

Success continued as the Bison took on Occidental College in their last game of the tournament, winning 12-3. Adam Yerkes '03 had a solid game with three goals and Nick Ferring '05, Saettele and Afzal each had two-goal performances. Martin made his first start as a Bison and recorded six saves.

"It was great to be able to play polo outside and beat some teams form California," Kennedy said. "Relaxing on the beach was also a plus."

The Bison next compete in the ECAC tournament this weekend at Harvard University.

"There were a lot of good teams there," Campbell said. "It was a very hard course too, which made me even more happy with our results."

As a sophomore last year, Campbell excelled, scoring the lowest for the Bison in almost every tournament. But the Bison finished a disappointing 11th in the final ECAC tournament for the season. This year, Campbell and her teammates brought their game to a new level, resulting in a much-improved team.

"Over the summer I played a lot of golf, which helped me out a lot this year," she said.

Campbell will travel to Australia for her second semester, and will not participate in the spring golf season. The team will undoubtedly lose one of its best golfers with Campbell's absence.

"We'll miss our leader in practice, and our lowest scorer in the tournaments," Jamieson said. "It's going to be a bumpy spring season, and we'll have to work very hard to keep things together."

N. F. L. Predictions

Justin McCarthy
Staff Writer (10-10)

Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor (10-10)

Jacksonville (2-3) at Baltimore (3-3)
The Jaguars have lost three consecutive games and the Ravens have dropped two in a row, so each team will be looking to turn around their current slides. Jacksonville had allowed the second fewest points in the AFC, and with the Ravens' questionable offense Baltimore may struggle to find the endzone. I gotta give the W to the defending Champs ... Baltimore.

Minnesota (3-3) at Tampa Bay (2-3)
Tampa Bay, who is used to handing out the punishing defense, was decimated by Pittsburgh. Luckily for Johnson, the Viking defense is nowhere close to that caliber. The Vikings already defeated Tampa Bay this season and now Minnesota has their offense up and running; scoring 30-plus points the past two weeks. Did you doubt that Culpepper & Co. would not match their offensive prowess of last season? Vikings get the win.

New Orleans (3-2) at St. Louis (6-0)
Last season the Saints won their first playoff game in franchise history at the expense of the Rams; this Sunday they will be trying to hand the Rams their first loss of the season. The good thing for the Saints is that Faulk will likely not start; the bad news is that Canidate will, who in his first start last week racked up 195 yards. The Saints will need Ricky Williams to be their work horse. However, it may not matter against these Rams, whose defense is finally decent. The Saints don't have a prayer.

San Francisco (4-1) at Chicago (4-1)
San Francisco with the second best record in the NFL, no surprise there; Chicago with the second best record in the NFL, hell yeah that's a surprise! And the Bears are doing it with defense, they have allowed the fewest points in the NFL while giving up only four TDs over five games. The Bears will need another big performance from rookie RB Anthony Thomas, who rushed for 188 yards last week, since their second leading receiver, Marcus Robinson, just went down for the season. Decisions, decisions, decisions ... 49ers.

Tennessee (2-3) at Pittsburgh (4-1)
The Titans have finally figured out how to win, or maybe they are just finally recovering from all their injuries. With a two game winning streak, they face the top team in the AFC in Pittsburgh this Monday night. The Steelers are copying the formula that the Ravens used to win last season. First, play great defense; as was shown by their 10 sacks last week. Secondly, deploy a ruthless running attack, with Bettis, the Bus, who is mowing down would be tacklers. The Steelers' defense is looking like the old Steel Curtain and a Bus hasn't run this well since the movie Speed. The Terrible Towel will fly high on Monday night as the Steelers prove they are for real.

Jacksonville (2-3) at Baltimore (3-3)
Jacksonville is about as intimidating as Bill Gates on sedatives. They also make a game about as exciting as watching Bill Gates inject himself with the aforementioned sedative. I wonder what kind of sedative Bill Gates would use. I wonder if he would inject himself or have a low-level computer geek do it. He could always use a pill. Oh right, predictions ... writing a prediction about Jacksonville makes me feel like I've just taken a sedative. I'm sure reading it wasn't much better.

Minnesota (3-3) at Tampa Bay (2-3)
Brad Johnson to Keyshawn Johnson. I'm sure if he ever completes a pass this year, some dorky broadcaster will make a joke about "Johnson & Johnson." Yet, surprisingly, watching Tampa Bay play makes me want nothing more than my blankee, a juice box and my mommy, so there goes the "No more tears" angle. Watching Randy Moss is even worse. Is this guy British? Get some caps, dentures, something!

New Orleans (3-2) at St. Louis (6-0)
Canidate ... who voted for this guy? I certainly didn't. What the Faulk's up with that? Bring back Marshall. I don't mean Marshall Faulk, I mean Penny Marshall who used to do those delightful K-Mart commercials with Rosey O'Donnell. Whatever happened to her? I heard she was directing a movie. In fact, they were filming that in my home town, I think. That's so cool. Way cooler than Marshall Faulk. When did HE ever direct a movie?

San Francisco (4-1) at Chicago (4-1)
Did I miss the memo or was Chicago supposed to be good this year? I guess the best thing they did in the off season was replace their whole team. That helps. For a team from the Windy City, it's surprising they don't blow.

Tennessee (2-3) at Pittsburgh (4-1)
The Pittsburgh Steelers? Who is running this team? More to the point, who is running the teams that the Steelers have played? How could you possibly let Pittsburgh not be abysmally horrible? Kordell Stewart? Trust me, he's never heard of you either. And Jerome Bettis isn't "The Bus" that he used to be. He's that broken down VW Microbus in the parking lot behind JC Penney with the smashed windows because little kids throw rocks at it. The only plays this guy should be seeing are at one o'clock when the orderlies at the Old Folks home changes the channel to the public access station that sells those little tote bags. Tennessee because I hate those tote bags.

Women Golfers tie Yale for fifth at ECAC tournament

By Brooke Rea
Sports Editor

Women's golf Head Coach Kevin Jamieson was "absolutely pleased" with the Bison's fifth-place showing over the weekend at the ECAC championship tournament. The Bison hosted the tournament, bringing in golfers from 23 schools to end their season on a high-note by tying Yale for fifth place with 662 strokes.

James Madison University took first place in the tournament with 619 strokes. Princeton, Brown and William & Mary also finished in the top five.

"I couldn't be happier with how well we did," Jamieson said. "Last year we finished close to last in a smaller pool of teams, and this year we tied one of the most prestigious teams in the country."

On Saturday, 120 golfers took on the par-70, 5,895-yard course at the Bucknell Golf Club. Junior Jess Heitich led the Bison with an impressive 78 strokes on day one, finishing the weekend on top for the Bison with a 159 total. This performance earned her eighth place overall in the pool of 120 competitors.

"Jess' eighth-place finish really says a lot about her as a player," Jamieson said.

Senior Hilary Mainka also finished well, tying for 20th place with a final score of 165. The two other scoring golfers were freshman Jamie Hays and Junior Amy Jones. Hays, who has been an integral addition to the team this year, tied for 37th with a 170 total. Jones had 172 on the weekend, which earned her a tie for 46th place.

"Jamie Hays is a great contributor to the team," Molly Campbell '03 said of the rookie. "We are so much deeper this year because we have stronger players across the board, and can count on several people to play well, choosing the best four scores rather than depending on the same people every time."

Campbell also competed in the tournament, tying for 41st with 171. Senior Bridget O'Mara tied for 75th with 183, and Allison Kasic '05 tied for 84th with 186.

O'Mara believes that the reason this season has been so successful was because of a strong team dynamic and work ethic. "Our team of 13 girls is a great number, and we all get along really well," she said. "There is a new competitive element to the team with the addition of three really great freshmen. This has kept everyone on their toes and makes us all work harder."

This hard work has paid off, as the Bison not only broke two school records this fall, but were invited to compete in some of the most competitive collegiate golf tournaments in the country, including one at James Madison University and the largest NCAA tournament in the country at Myrtle Beach

"Being invited to play in such prestigious tournaments is proof that people outside the Bucknell community are starting to see what a strong non-scholarship program we have here," Jamieson said. "They notice what we are doing and think it is special, as do I."

"I was really excited every time that we played," Campbell said. "Each weekend we just wanted to see how much better we could do than the year before. Overall, it was so much fun."

O'Mara is approaching the end of her collegiate career, but knows she is leaving behind a strong golf tradition at Bucknell. "Coach Jamieson is focused on building this program into the futre," she said. "We can only go up from here."

The Bison will compete again in the spring, opening their schedule at the William & Mary Invitational March 29. They hope to carry over success from this fall into the spring season.

"What our achievements this season really boil down to is hard work from the girls," Jamieson said. "They are dedicated to getting better, and the scores prove that they are. As a program, we really appreciate all of the support we receive from faculty, the Athletic Department, and the Bucknell Golf Club."

Breeders Cup a nose ahead

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

They say the Kentucky Derby is the most exciting two minutes in horse racing. Ask anyone on the street what the most important Thoroughbred race in the country is, and they'll tell you it's the Derby. In fact, the Derby is probably the only race they've ever heard of.

And I must admit, it's tempting to get caught up in its prestige— the pageantry, the celebrities, the roses, the mint juleps. It's the Super Bowl of horse racing. Every owner and trainer in the world wants a piece of it. All the television networks devote to it hours and hours of coverage every May. Every fan pines away for one chance to watch it live.

That is, every fan except this one.

Cover your ears, Kentucky. Avert your cameras, ABC. Muffle those microphones, ESPN2.

I dare say the most exciting two minutes in horse racing isn't in May; it's in late October (sometimes early November). Sure, it will inevitably be overshadowed by football, and it doesn't hold a candle to the enthusiasm garnered by the World Series. Yet quietly and dependably, every year since 1984, the Breeders Cup has been a stage for some of the greatest moments in the history of the sport.

There are no swanky alcoholic beverages. No roses. The hats fade in comparison to those worn to the Derby. It generally merits a few small back-page articles in various newspapers around the country—a sharp contrast to the massive headlines emblazoned across each publication for every Kentucky Derby winner.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Breeders Cup has many memorable moments in its 17-year storied history.

The Breeders Cup has followed a slightly different path to historical significance.

Seventeen years ago, Wild Again, a 30-1 shot, bumped and slammed his way down the stretch to win a controversial and unforgettable inaugural Breeders Cup Classic. It was a hell of a first impression.

The race has sustained that flair—that unpredictability—ever since. Every year, around this time, I have to explain to several people exactly what the Breeders Cup is. Sadly, most people haven't even heard of it. I could tell them it's a special day set aside for eight races—each for different age groups, over different surfaces and distances—to be run at a different racetrack each year. I could tell them it's the deciding day for horses and trainers as far as Eclipse Awards are concerned. I could tell them it's an international extravaganza of speed, beauty and grace.

But I'd tell them the Breeders Cup is more than that.

I'd tell them about a dwindling evening at Churchill Downs, with Alysheba flying out of the darkness late in the stretch, and hitting the wire with speed to spare, as though he had the whole thing planned.

I'd tell them about Lady's Secret, leaping to the front and never looking back, showing us that a lady could have a heart of iron too.

I'd tell them of the dashing Easy Goer running out of time at Gulfstream, sealing up a career that was undoubtedly marked by the curse of an underachiever.

I'd tell them about Dayjur, poised to outrun Safely Kept in the last meters of the Sprint, suddenly leaping awkwardly over a shadow, and subsequently handing the lead—and the victory—to his foe.

I'd have to tell them how, eleven years ago, Go For Wand tried so desperately to keep her precious and unforgettable blazed nose out in front of her elder, courageously ignoring the searing pain in her right front ankle, which, unbeknownst to anyone, was shattering beyond repair with every tenacious step.

I'd mention Fraise, a horse awarded to Madeline Paulson by her legendary husband as the spoils of a golf game, shooting down the turf to nail superstar Sky Classic by a nose.

I'd tell them about Arcangues, a horse with an unpronounceable name, and no real right being in such a prestigious race, storming to victory at astounding odds of 133-1.

I'd tell them how the unbeatable Cigar capped off an unthinkable perfect season—ten races, ten victories—and earned a place in history beside legends like Spectacular Bid and Man O'War, as Jerry Bailey sat atop his back, wearing the familiar red, white and blue silks, and holding his index finger up in the air to signify "number one."

I'd remember Inside Information winning the Distaff with devastating ease, Awesome Again upsetting a field for the ages, Favorite Trick showing just how professional a two-year-old colt can be, and jockey Corey Nakatani dedicating a victory to his slain sister.

Finally I'd tell them how, last year, the lowly-bred Tiznow held off a group of blue-blooded, high-priced stunners, proving once and for all that you don't need four-million dollars to purchase true heart.

And that's just the first 17 years. This weekend, the legacy will grow.

So toast your mint juleps to that.

It's better than anything you'll ever see in the Kentucky Derby.

U.S. National Team diamond in the rough

With the recent terrorist attacks on the U.S., sports just don't seem important anymore. But instead of shutting down, the games have gone on and those who watch can momentarily forget about what happened to our nation.

Outpouring of support has gone out to teams from the Big Apple—people in Boston even put away their hatred for the Yankees for a few days. But with all of that going on, the most obvious choice for America's Team has been overlooked. There may not be a better team for the nation to rally around than the U.S. Men's National Soccer team. After all, they wage war on the field against other countries, rather than against fellow countrymen.

The U.S.'s qualification for the 2002 World Cup could be a great aid in the recovery of our nation. They were in jeopardy of not making the World Cup after a hot start left them in first for most of the year. But after a 2-1 win over Jamaica October 1 (and a little help from Trinidad and Tobago,) the United States punched a ticket to their fourth consecutive World Cup.

Commentary

ROB SCHMICKER
Senior Writer

My point is simple—like the rest of the country, the U.S. National Team was in trouble. But in its most important hour as a team, the team responded with grace under fire—just like our country has since the terrorist attacks. But this fact has gone unnoticed as baseball and football have received all of the attention. The National Team is lucky to get ten seconds a month of airtime on SportsCenter. Major League Soccer (MLS), the United States' premier soccer league, is lucky to have an article on its championship game next to the local Jai Alai results.

I just don't understand how the most popular children's sport is tossed aside like an old gym sock. While it is up to the fans to make the sport successful, I believe there is a conspiracy amongst sportswriters to keep the soccer movement suffocated throughout the nation.

When MLS began, after a hugely successful World Cup in 1994, optimism abounded. But after one season, the novelty wore off, resulting in lower ratings and attendance. Critics of MLS were everywhere, calling for a change of rules as well as ideology.

MLS responded in 1999 by first getting rid of the highly controversial shootout. While trying to "Americanize" soccer, they actually angered the hardcore fans by implementing a shootout for all those games that ended in ties. It wasn't even a real shootout either, but some lame breakaway shootout that was supposed to be more exciting. MLS then aligned with the rest of the world by allowing the clock to count up rather than down.

MLS didn't worry about how starting over may hurt their image, but instead went with what the fans and media wanted. But the changes in rules and scheduling did nothing, as attendance was still down. The same critics who before had a problem with the rules were now barking about the talent level in MLS.

"MLS can't compete on the world level" was the constant theme heard in most soccer circles. MLS had to increase the level of international signings while not jeopardizing young American talent. In 1998, MLS implemented a new program called Project-40, in which college and graduating high school soccer players could skip school and train together, all while having a guaranteed roster spot on a MLS team for at least a year. Project-40 has been a huge success, responsible for up-and-coming stars as Bobby Convey, DaMarcus Beasley, Ben Olsen and Chris Albright.

Because of MLS and Project-40, the U.S. National Team is now deeper than ever before. When starters Claudio Reyna, Clint Mathis and Brian McBride all went down with injuries, the team didn't miss a beat with Josh Wolff, Landon Donovan and Olsen in charge.

MLS not only succeeded in helping U.S. soccer, but it also improved its own image through crafty signings of young and talented foreigners. After being hurt by likes of Branco, Roberto Donadoni and Lothar Matthaus, MLS has set its eyes on young stars, rather than older players who only use MLS as a means of further extending their careers. Stern John, Mamadou Diallo and Alex Pineda Cachon, who all went on to scoring titles, are just three examples of the new breed of MLS signings

The result has been a higher level of play—so much that the L.A. Galaxy defeated teams from Mexico, Honduras and Ecuador on route to the 2000 Football Confederations Cup. But still there are critics. So what does MLS have to do in the near future to energize its image? They have to carve their own image by building soccer-specific stadiums. They need smaller, more personal venues like that in Columbus, where fans can interact with the players—stadiums that will actually fill to capacity. While the media has no hand in that, it is up to taxpayers and lawmakers to come up with the plans.

In order for soccer to succeed in the United States, MLS must succeed. It's pathetic that we must pin the future of MLS on the construction of stadiums, but we are running out of options. No one has talked about all of the good that MLS has done. But, would the National Team be where it is now without MLS? I think not.

So I'm calling out all of the media outlets in the United States—pay more attention to soccer. Our country was in need of a team to rally around, and we were denied that opportunity. This has continued through the years, and without a change in our thinking, it will continue in the future. Soccer is a beautiful game and deserves to be a part of American culture. So give MLS a chance. Give the WUSA a chance and most importantly, give all of our national teams a chance. As Americans, I think we all deserve this.

Field Hockey misses playoffs

BY JEN GIANIS
Staff Writer

The 10 seniors on the field hockey team are preparing for the last week of their season both emotionally and physically.

For the first time in their Bison careers, they will end their season without a trip to the Patriot League Tournament. They fought hard this season and played every single game with heart, but unfortunately the games just didn't go in their favor.

Senior Meghan Hopping said, "Although our season ended rather abruptly and not exactly the way that we had hoped that it would, I have about absolutely no regrets. We gave it everything that we had and [we] have to be happy with that. We could not have had more fun as a team."

On Oct. 17, the Bison traveled to Colgate for their fifth league game. They knew going into the game that they would have to come out with the win in order to stay eligible for a bid to the Patriot League Tournament.

The game remained close for the first 30 minutes until Senior Larissa Carso broke the tie with a tip into the cage off of a pass by Senior Tri-Captain Annie Hunsicker. With 11 minutes into the second half, Senior Tri-Captain Lauren Campbell notched a second goal for the Bison off a direct corner from Seniors Melissa Maher and Dena Ebert. Goalie Sonja Wettergreen '03 made four saves to bank her fourth shutout of the year.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The field hockey seniors play with heart, even till the end.

Unfortunately, the team's second league game of the week against the Stags of Fairfield did not end the same way. Once again, going into the game, the Bison knew that they had to win if they wanted to keep their tournament hopes alive. Fairfield jumped out to an early lead of 2-0.

Senior Erin Plasteras tallied her first goal of the season right before the half to make it a 2-1 score. Freshman Meiko Boynton tied the game for Bucknell only seven minutes into the second half. Fairfield answered this with the final goal of the game.

Despite the score, the Bison continued to fight hard for the win. They hit the goal post a few times in the last five minutes of the game, but were unable to finish it.

"We lost to a good team on Saturday, but this team laid it all out on the line and that's what I ask of them," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "Certainly one would say that we haven't gotten the 'lucky bounce' this year but it cannot take away from how hard this team has competed and fought through all of their adversities. I'm very proud of their efforts and look forward to an outstanding [upcoming] week of competition."

The Bison will play their last two games on their home turf. They host St. Francis on Tuesday, Oct. 23, at 6:00p.m. and close out their season on Saturday, Oct. 27 against American.

"I think Saturday's game will be such an emotional day as we'll recognize this outstanding senior class for their four years of dedication, contribution and hard work," Lewis said. "At the same time, we'll be facing Patriot League newcomer, American University, and this team will be excited to compete against them. I have no doubt this team will come out with intensity, emotion and absolute heart as their play their final game of the season."

Women's soccer drops two straight

Team defeated by Army and Columbia after record-breaking start to season

BY ANDREW BEVAN
Senior Writer

The women's soccer team has been experiencing some rough waters of late. After getting off to the best start in school history, the Bison have lost two straight games.

Over Homecoming weekend, the Cadets of Army were in town and earned a tough 2-0 road victory over the Orange and Blue. The teams played to a scoreless first half, with Army out-shooting the Bison 5-3.

The defensive battle continued until the 70th minute of the game when the Cadets got on the board thanks to a beautiful shot from the top of the 18-yard line into the back left corner of the net. Army added an insurance goal with three minutes left when it punched in the ball during a scramble in front of the net. Bison goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 had three saves in the contest.

"We played hard at times but we didn't do the things we needed to do, such as switch fields quickly," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said. "Their defense was solid and we got ourselves in a position to be transitioned on because we were not switching fields fast enough. I wasn't disappointed that we lost. I was more disappointed the team didn't play well in such an important league game. No one really stood out and that was the problem."

Last Tuesday as students returned to campus after fall break, the Orange and Blue were in New York City squaring off against Columbia. Bucknell saw its three-game winning streak snapped as it fell to the Lions, 1-0. Columbia out-shot the Bison 20-10 for the match but Purse kept her team in it with seven saves on the day. With just over four minutes left to play in regulation the Lions scored the only goal they would need to secure the non-conference victory.

"We played hard and had chances but we couldn't convert and they managed to get lucky," Findlay said. "After they scored we played with that sense of urgency that we needed before the goal was scored and we learned a lesson from this game. Emily Keber '03 had a real presence for us on the field that day."

Two weeks ago the Bison earned their second Patriot League victory of the season with a 2-1 road win over Patriot League defending champion Holy Cross in dramatic fashion.

After falling behind by a goal just five minutes into the game and being outshot 7-3 in the first half, the Bison battled back to tie the game with just over four minutes left. With her team-leading seventh goal of the season, frontrunner Savannah Rennels '04 evened the score and propelled the game into overtime. Michelle Santonacita '05 assisted on the play.

Nine minutes into the extra session Kristie Simon '04 hit home her third goal of the year and second game-winner in three games on a penalty kick.

"It was a bizarre game. The field conditions and dimensions weren't great and that took us out of our game in the first half. We were more composed and organized in the second half," Findlay said. "We had better opportunities to score near the end of the game and we managed to put it in."

"I wasn't disappointed that we lost. I was more disappointed the team didn't play well in such an important league game. No one really stood out and that was the problem.
—Head Coach Chrissy Findlay

Individual players shined in the contest. "Michelle came off the bench, provided a real presence on the field and made a big contribution. "Also, Megan Farrell '05 had a good second half and Sarah Klang-Glienna '02 gave us a real offensive punch on the outside," Findlay said.

"We came out against Holy Cross strong and with a lot of heart," Purse said. "We wanted to beat them so badly, and it showed in our game. Abbey Seaboyer '04 has been very strong in all three games, and has been playing very well out of the back. We played well at Columbia, but we just couldn't find the back of the net. The Army game was really hard on us, because we needed that win to get us up again after Columbia."

The Orange and Blue have a critical week ahead of them with road games against Lehigh and Lafayette.

"Our team is a bunch of hard-working players who have faced many setbacks and this week will be a good test for them," Findlay said.

The Bison travel to Lehigh on Wednesday for a 6 p.m. kickoff.

ATHLETE OF THE WEEK
MOLLY CAMPBELL

BY PAT EVANS
Senior Writer

In "Happy Gilmore," Chubs advises Gilmore to put himself in a "happy place" in order to focus before his matches. The University's best women's golfer, Molly Campbell '03, uses no such area.

"We just go to hotels, and everyone does their own thing," she said. "I don't really think about it too much."

So what is it that enabled Campbell to shoot a 77 at the Rutgers Invitational, tying the record for the best 18-hole score in school history, and leading the team to a second place finish out of 17 teams?

"She has a willingness to listen and learn," Head Coach Kevin Jamieson said. "We made some major swing changes midway through the season that have paid off and will continue to pay off because of her dedication."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Campbell continued her quest to become one of the best in Bison history when she shot an 83 at the East Carolina Invitational. Her score, combined with three of her teammates' scores, broke the all-time record for an 18-hole score by two strokes. In the first day of the tournament Campbell performed even better, shooting a 158 over 36 holes, tying her for 20th in the field of 96 competitors.

"I didn't feel like I was really hitting the ball that well," she said. "But I was scoring well, which was good."

This year's squad has been one of the best in recent memory. At the season-end ECAC tournament, the team placed fifth out of 23 schools. Campbell opened the tournament with an 83, tying her for 23rd out of 117 golfers.

Technology alters agricultural methods

BY PARKER TERRIL
Staff Writer

Professor of Biology Gary Sojka is conducting research on a problem that most Americans are unaware exists. He is concerned about high tech agriculture, as well as the "corporitization" and "globalization" of agriculture.

Following the agricultural and industrial revolution, a new "revolution" in food production, is now occurring. Combining the advancements in agriculture and technology, it is changing the way that food is produced all over the world.

Genetically altered food is easier to grow, more profitable to farmers and cheaper for the consumer, but may not contain the same nutritional value as the natural form.

The emergence of agro-business as the major supplier of food in the United States has produced many benefits the world over, but at a cost.

Walking through the produce department of a local supermarket, one will not be able to find the same quality of produce that they would have had 20 years ago. What one is going to find is the results of industrialized agriculture-larger, more visually appealing vegetables, pest-resistant produce and other hybrid forms of natural plants.

After the produce isle, a walk through the meat department will yield similar observations. Larger poultry, leaner meat and once again, better prices. However, lurking behind these improvements is the serious risk of food shortages.

Big business has forced the independent farmer to make a decision. They can either become a member of a farm conglomerate or run the risk of losing their farms.

Professor Sojka says that farmers are offered loans at irresistibly low rates and the potential for improved production if they enter into contracts to purchase all their raw materials, including feed, seeds and livestock from one business. However, this partnership often causes more problems than it cures.

"A country like the United States with many different climates, many different microclimates, many different growing regions and many different soils used to have farmers with collections of various different seeds they would use in different ways," Sojka said.

Now, large numbers of farmers are purchasing from a single company, using the same genetically engineered "super seed" thus creating a uniformity in crop production that previously did not exist.

"Six billion people currently depend on about 100 types of food plants. That's a diminishingly small number from what once supported a smaller population," Sojka said.

This uniformity leaves the world food supply in a vulnerable position. Diseases and other natural dangers to crops could now have devastating results, since the majority of all farmers growing the same crop, are also growing the same breed of crop. A disease specific to a certain type of plant now has the potential to cause huge food shortages.

Disease also poses a much bigger threat to livestock than it once did. In the modernized livestock industry, small, independent animal farms are now being replaced by huge complexes that hold tens of thousands of animals. All of these animals are being fed the same grain, breathing the same air and drinking the same water. These are ideal conditions for a disease to spread. This danger is only complicated by the fact that, like with the seeds, farmers are now keeping only a few species of livestock.

In these mass complexes, farmers serve daily doses of antibiotics to all animals, healthy and ill, to prevent diseases from infecting any of the population. This overuse of antibiotics is creating antibiotic-resistant strains of bacteria that pose a serious risk to both livestock and humans. These mass living compounds pose the same risk of food shortages as seed uniformity.

"Variety provided a kind of security, not a kind of efficiency, but it was secure because there was nothing that could wipe out all of it," Sojka said.

In an article published Sept. 22, Robert Windrem of NBC News discusses the issue of "agro-terror" in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Windrem said that the State Department is in the process of upgrading a New York animal disease center into a top security laboratory that will study many biological pests and diseases. This decision was made after UNSCOM inspectors in Iraq learned of the development of at least one biological weapon aimed at agriculture. Now, inspectors are investigating several others, including two aimed at livestock.

The results of such an outbreak could prove to be a devastation to the world's food supply.

"We perform a constant cycle of produce—consume, produce—consume ... the current world surplus is probably enough to last only a week," Sojka said.

With the suspicion of more planned attacks against America, measures are now being taken to protect against problems not previously thought to be issues. The food supply is possibly one of these problems.

Sojka expresses concern about the state of the nation's food supply and related agricultural issues.

Recent findings in breast cancer research

BY NATE IVANICK
Staff Writer

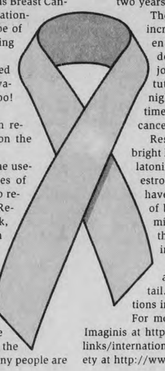
The month of October is designated as Breast Cancer Awareness Month which brings nationwide attention to the most common type of cancer in women and the second leading cause of cancerous deaths.

In the U.S. alone, there are estimated to be over 40,000 deaths a year from invasive breast cancer, according to Yahoo! News.

Two provocative studies have been recently published, shedding new light on the breast cancer threat.

The first of these studies concerns the usefulness of mammograms in saving lives of women with breast cancer. According to researchers in the Nordic Conchrane Research Center in Copenhagen, Denmark, mammograms may not be effective in saving lives in breast cancer despite aiding in early detection.

This controversial study was published in the journal The Lancet a year ago, but was not accepted by the scientific community. Thus researchers repeated the study, this time with stricter standards, and arrived at the same conclusion. Despite this study, many people are not convinced. According to Yahoo! News, the American Cancer Society has not refuted the study, but still suggests that women receive a mammogram every two years after the age of 40.



The other report addresses the potential increased risk of breast cancer for women working night shifts. Two independent studies, both published in the journal of the National Cancer Institute, confirmed that women working night shifts for an extended period of time were at an increased risk of breast cancer.

Research suggested that exposure to bright light during dark hours decreases melatonin levels in the body, while increasing estrogen levels. Increased estrogen levels have been found to increase the chance of breast cancer. While researchers admit further studies must be performed, they maintain that late night work may increase the risk of breast cancer.

Both of these studies are still new and must be explored in further detail. Even so, they raise important questions in the struggle against breast cancer.

Anthrax virus cases continue

University takes certain precautions with campus mail

BY ERIN GRIM
Staff Writer

First killing a man in Florida and now testing positively in cities across the United States, anthrax is a looming and frightening problem.

New York Governor George Pataki's office was found to contain anthrax spores, four sites in the Capitol in Washington, D.C. have tested positive and the seven month-old baby of an ABC News employee was also infected.

CBS said that trace amounts of anthrax had been found in Dan Rather's office and Homeland Security Director Tom Ridge said that the Monday deaths of two postal workers were "likely due to anthrax." These are only a few of the cases that had been filling the news in the past few weeks. Whether they are in correlation to the terrorist events of Sept. 11 is not yet known.

With Anthrax scares becoming more common, networks have been broadcasting tips from how to handle suspicious mail to signs and symptoms of the infection.

The disease causing much unrest in the United States is an acute infection caused by the spore-forming bacterium Bacillus Anthracis. According to CNN there are three different ways that victims can become infected.

First and most deadly is through inhalation. In these cases, anthrax spores germinate in the lungs, causing coughing and fever-like symptoms. The next stage, which usually results in death, involves lung damage and brain infection. Alarmingly, victims of inhalational anthrax can die only one to three days after the first symptoms, and the death rate is nearly 100 percent.

Cutaneous anthrax is contracted when a cut or abrasion on the skin comes in contact with the disease ... 95 percent of victims are infected in this

Cutaneous anthrax is contracted when a cut or abrasion on the skin comes in contact with the disease. According to CNN, this is the most common mode of contraction, as 95 percent of victims are infected in this manner. Symptoms include a skin lesion, which evolves in two to six days from a pimple to a depressed black scab. Antibiotics are available for this type of anthrax and without them there is a 20 percent death rate.

The last type of infection is gastrointestinal anthrax, which is associated with undercooked meat.

The University is taking measures to reduce the chance of an event similar to those occurring around the country. Incoming mail is being screened for suspicious letters and packages.

Charles Pollock, vice president for student affairs, advises students to turn mail over to Public Safety if it appears to be suspicious, contains powder or stains, or has a strange odor.

Pollock said in a campus-wide, "We have no special reason to think that Bucknell will be victimized, and panic is not at all warranted. Yet caution is well advised. If you have any questions, please contact public safety."

An abroad perspective: studying in Florence

By Kelly Korecky
Contributing Writer

Where in the world can you find two thousand-year-old holy sites, all-night discos, the largest selection of leather and the best cuisine in the world? Nowhere but Florence, Italy. While studying abroad through Syracuse University last spring, I discovered all of these treasures and so much more.

I never could have imagined the wealth of culture that I stumbled upon daily during my walks through this charming, vibrant city. Although my first few days in Florence were a little foggy as I adjusted to the time change as well as the lifestyle change, I immediately felt at home when I met my host family.

My host mother, Gigliola, is about 5 ft. 1, 115 lbs., but her smile is big enough to fill a room. I was fortunate enough to have been proficient in Italian after studying the language in high school and here at the University, so I was able to immediately bond with Gigliola, Nonna (my host grandmother) and Annalisa and Serena (Gigliola's daughters). My roommate Sarah (a student from Tufts who I didn't meet until the day we moved in) and I instantly felt like Gigliola and her family were the kindest people in the world.

Honestly, I felt like nearly every Italian I met was the kindest person I could imagine. Complete strangers went out of their way to start conversations, offer advice, tell jokes. Maybe the Italians' friendliness was surprising to me since I'm from the New York metropolitan area where people are much more self-absorbed and insular ... but I am still convinced that most Italians are genetically programmed to be so sociable.

Along with the Italians being completely open and friendly, something about the peoples' attitudes made me feel incredibly safe. People walked everywhere and at all hours. There was always activity and a general feeling of festivity wherever I went.

The Italians I encountered were typically friendly, fun loving and contrary to popular belief, NOT fat. In general, most Italians are thin, fit and healthy; they do not eat never-ending plates of pasta, as the advertisements for popular Italian-American restaurants such as The Olive Garden would suggest. In fact, I joined a local gym and many of the Italian men are just as muscle-conscious as the Gold's Gym-goers of America.

Another illusion of Italian society that is commonly portrayed in films and media is that of the incredibly large Brady Bunch-size family. Although Italians maintain very close ties with family members even through young adulthood (the concept of moving out of your parents' home before marriage is virtually unheard of), most Italian families consist of only one to two children. Interestingly, my host family explained to me that after World War II, most of the country was so devastated and poverty-stricken, that Italians were forced to implement family planning strategies for economic reasons.

Living with a host family was by far the best way to experience Italy. Since the Italians are incredibly family-oriented, I feel it is impossible to understand the country and the culture without knowing about "la famiglia." Every night at the dinner table, my host family came alive like actors on a stage. Often, I had difficulty eating because I would be laughing so hard at the hilarious stories they told, or the impersonations Annalisa, my host sister, enacted for us. Every word spoken during our meal was in Italian; even Sarah and I spoke to each other in Italian. Sometimes, our Nonna would tease us when we couldn't remember a certain expression or word. Nonna would then humor us by repeating all the English words and/or expressions she knew which included "baby yogurt" (I'd love to know where she picked that one up) and "hello" which she pronounced "ello."

Aside from the humorous anecdotes, Nonna also impressed upon us the pride many Italians have for their history. Nonna often told us stories of her youth when her family included figures such as counts, dukes and the like. After the war, however, her family essentially lost all of its money and things have been difficult financially ever since.

What I loved about Italy more than almost anything else was the general non-obsession with money. Of all the conversations I had with Italians of any age, the issue of money was never brought up, which is a sharp contrast to my discussions with Americans who almost always mentioned money at some point (either in reference to having it or not having it).

But in Italy, why waste time dwelling on finances when there is a surplus of non-material wealth at your fingertips? I believe I acquired riches that money could never buy while in Italy. Although I admit the leather and shoes were great, the more important things I took home with me were lessons about Italy's history, culture and language, and even about myself.

While in Italy, I learned that I did not fully appreciate all the options I have as a 21-year-old American woman. I am so fortunate to have been able to even travel to the country while many Italian girls my age that I met had never even been two or more hours from their homes. I learned to respect the trials and challenges that Italians have endured, not just during the World War II era, but also throughout all of their history.

In the art history course I took in Florence, we began the semester by discussing the struggles of the first tribes that settled in Italy over 2,000 years ago. My art history professor also discussed the contributions the early settlers, like the Etruscans and Romans, made to our modern-day society. Along with an impressively original sculptural and painting tradition, the Etruscans established an effective military, as well as systems of commerce and industry. The Romans' achievements are vast and can be exemplified through the magnificent structure of the Colosseum, which I visited not once, not twice, but four times throughout my stay. It is truly breathtaking.

The sculpture, frescoes, marble and extraordinary architecture—not only in museums but in every square mile—heightened my senses and appreciation for a culture that's origins date over 2,000 years. The beauty of Italy is also the pride of Italy. Almost every city home (which is like a small brownstone in New York City) was adorned with flower boxes and lacey-covered windows. The countryside and harbor towns were right out of a postcard. And the food was too good to be true!

I really just can't say enough about Italy and my wonderful experiences there. From Florence to Rome, from Sicily to Sienna and from Capri to Venice, each city contains a wealth of character that is unparalleled. There's really only one thing that's missing in my mind: a return ticket!

University prepares for Halloween

By Alyson Walker
Senior Writer

Have you noticed the spookiness around campus?

No, it's not the mystery meat at the cafeteria or the ghosts of Hunt Hall—it's Halloween.

Multiple groups on campus have been working diligently to offer fine Halloween programs to not only the University but also to the Lewisburg area community.

The women's basketball team will be having a Halloween part for its Lil' Bisonball Kids club members as well as children from the entire community on Saturday, Oct. 27. It will be held from 3 to 5 p.m. in the field house, occupying two courts. The women on the team will be running various activities in booths around the field house.

"It's a way for us to reach out to the children in the area," said Veronica Jutras, assistant women's basketball coach.

The Residence Hall Association (RHA) will also be sponsoring multiple Halloween activities, including ones for the Lewisburg community.

The RHA of the Small Houses will be hosting a Haunted House at Carey House on Tuesday, Oct. 30 from 5:30 to 8:30 p.m. It will include games, scary stories, prizes and trick-or-treating.

RTK's RHA will be holding their annual pumpkin-carving contest on Saturday, Oct. 27 from 3 to 6 p.m. in the Roberts Lobby. There will be prizes for hall and individuals.

A Halloween study break will take place that same night from 6 to 7:30 p.m. in Swartz Hall in the main lounge.

In the New Residence Hall, RHA will be having a Halloween social in the New Residence Hall Formal Lounge with doughnuts and cider. This will take place Wednesday, Oct. 31 and is tentatively scheduled from 7 to 9 p.m.

Vedder Hall's RHA will be hosting a Halloween party, including a hall decorating contest and costume contest on Tuesday, Oct. 30 from 7 to 10 p.m.

Halloween hall decorating contests also will be held in the New Residence Hall, Larison, Harris and Swartz. Judging for the New Residence Hall will be on Monday, Oct. 29, by University President Steffen Rogers and Athena Rogers. Smith Hall will be hosting a door-decorating contest, which will be judged on Monday, Nov. 1 by the RHA officers of Smith. Prizes will be given to the top three winners.

International playground builder located in our own backyard

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Playworld Systems designs, builds and sells is equipment around the world directly from its Lewisburg headquarters.

By Katy Zachary
Senior Writer

"We're not for backyards; we're for parks like in Kidsburg," said Ron Derk, director of sales and marketing for Playworld Systems, the international playground giant whose headquarters are located off of Route 15.

While many in Lewisburg recognize Playworld Systems to provide safe and entertaining community and commercial playground areas, few people are aware of its impressive international status. Fifteen years ago, Playworld Systems expanded internationally, and it is now the sixth largest playground manufacturer in the world and the fifth largest in the United States. Their foreign sales comprise 10 to 12 percent of the company's overall profit, and they have sales offices in both Paris and the United Kingdom. However, their foreign success is by no means concentrated only in Europe.

"We have designed and built the largest playground in the world in Kuala Lumpur (Malaysia)," Derk said.

Playworld Systems has been in existence since 1952 when it was first the manufacturer of precision machine parts. Less than 10 years later, this family-owned company made a name for itself as a supplier of high quality playground equipment. Its reputation for delivering quality and serviceable equipment coupled by an increase in demand for playground parts prompted Playworld Systems to market its own brand of products in 1971. And for the past 20 years, it has been one of the top companies in its industry.

One of the reasons Playworld Systems has attained such success is due to the company's attention to safety. Having won a plethora of safety awards since its existence, this company is extremely conscious of the hazards brought on by children's playground equipment.

According to the Playworld's website (www.playworldsystems.com), the equipment "is backed by the most comprehensive warranties in the industry, attesting to the high-quality standards of the products, the work force and the management." In addition, Playworld Systems provides the most comprehensive Risk Management Program within its industry.

"We belong to the organization International Play Equipment Manufacturers Association, or IPEMA," Derk said. "All equipment is IPEMA certified to national safety standards."

Kidsburg, Lewisburg's largest Playworld Systems playground area, is no exception when it comes to safety standards.

Located on St. Louis Street directly behind Hufnagle Park, Kidsburg is the result of a community-wide effort to raise money and build the town a safe, clean and accessible play area. With its second construction phase having just completed this summer, Kidsburg's equipment is still under the regulation of Playworld Systems.

"We're in the process of doing a preliminary audit for the borough," Derk said. "And then it will be the borough's responsibility to maintain and update the equipment to the national standards. Any customer that buys something from us know it has been approved by the nation's highest safety standards."

Kidsburg, despite its name, is not a haven just for kids. It offers an enjoyable change of environment for parents, pets and even University students. The park contains five contiguous modular play systems that are designed to entertain children up to 12 years old. From rubber basketball hoops positioned at different heights to a zip line that automatically propels the rider forward and backward, as well as traditional swings and picnic areas, Kidsburg has something for all ages.

One of Playworld Systems' distinguishing qualities is that the company manufactures and markets a separate line of playground equipment for children from eight months to six years old. According to the website, these playground products are "designed to enhance developmental skills, both physical and mental, while encouraging active social interaction." Kidsburg has one area of this type of playground equipment, and even though it is geared for younger children, the structures are just as colorful, creative and clean as the rest.

Kidsburg not only exudes a clean and creative feel, but it is fun and challenging. According to Derk, Playworld Systems' most popular playground items are the car-racing panel, the U-bounce, the zip line and any type of slide or swing set.

"They just love swings. Kids like anything that has motion, and they also like to go high," Derk said Derk.

Two Kidsburg visitors who will attest to this statement are nine-year-old Rachel and 10-year-old Sarah. Both girls insist that they like everything.

"I especially like the basketball court and I love the big kids' swings," says Sarah.

"There's always something to do; it's just for kids," explains Rachel.

"It (the playground) used to be mostly wooden," informs Sarah, "And it was all for little kids. But now I like everything. The pirate ship is good for hiding from people, and I also like the castle because it's full of mazes."

In addition to children being excited about Kidsburg, their parents were also enthusiastic.

"We heard about this park and the community effort behind it while at a restaurant," the mother of a toddler and a three year old said. "It's great because there is something for each of the kids to do."

There is no doubt that Kidsburg has enhanced the Lewisburg community. Professor Ghislaine McDayter of the English department, is grateful for this playground and enjoys taking her son there to play.

"He adores it, not simply because of the playground itself, but also because it offers a wonderful place to interact with other children from the neighborhood. It provides a much needed play area in the middle of town," Professor MacDayter said.

Derk is extremely proud of Playworld Systems and what the company has done for the community. In fact, when Kidsburg was built, Playworld Systems reduced the overall cost of the play area by 25 to 30 percent.

"We just wanted to be a part of the community and help with this worthwhile effort," Derk said. "Kidsburg gives us a really beautiful park, it's a place where we can take customers and say 'This is the quality we have, and this is the type of equipment we make.' We are very proud of it."

Professor receives grant for study in Panama

By Sarah Gudnekauf
Staff Writer

Professor Elizabeth Capaldi will have many insightful stories to tell students when she returns to the University next fall. She is an assistant professor of biology and animal behavior and is currently exploring animal behavior issues in Panama. Her area of interest is insect behavior, specifically that of bees.

Capaldi's untenured faculty leave, which is equivalent to a sabbatical, allows her to take advantage of a grant from the Smithsonian Institute for research. Her research will last through May 2002. Upon returning to the University, she will be the director of the animal behavior program.

She is doing her research at the Smithsonian Tropical Research Institute in the Republic of Panama. The main laboratory is at the Tupper center in Panama City. The Tupper center overlooks the Panama Canal and houses a branch of the Smithsonian library. It also houses an insect collection, state of the art laboratories for chemistry, biology, sociology, anthropology and history.

Capaldi is conducting a majority of her research at the Marine biology lab and Tropical Ecology center on Barro Colorado island, located on Lake Gatun, adjacent to the canal. Outside of the lab, Capaldi lives in Gamboa, which is a half hour drive from Panama City.

Capaldi attributes her appreciation of this particular research project to the uniqueness of the facility and the country itself.

"Panama itself is a very diverse country because it is a land bridge between south and North America so the species that have evolved in South America have met the species that have evolved in North America on this land bridge. And because that is all well documented it makes it an interesting place for biodiversity studies," Capaldi said.

Panama's climate makes research very physically demanding. Capaldi routinely works in the forest which can reach temperatures of 90 degrees or higher with 100 percent humidity. To reach the forest from the Barro Colorado Island labs, Capaldi must endure a long walk up a very steep set of stairs.

Although the conditions can be harsh Capaldi truly loves what she is doing. She finds her present research on the nesting variety of different species of bees very interesting.

The goal of her research is to understand how bees socially interact with one another in the nests and to determine if there is a relationship between a bee's brain structure and particular types of exhibited behavior.

Both in Panama and here at the University Capaldi studies neural anatomy in insects with the goal of determining if the environmental pressures that bees faces have sculpted their nervous systems. The neural anatomy of one species to another are compared. A portion of the research that Capaldi is presently doing she also does on honeybees at the University in the temperate zone. Her current research is unique in that few people have ever done so with the particular tropical bees that she is studying now.

Capaldi hopes that she can apply her experiences and her new knowledge to her classes when she returns campus in May. "My research here has a direct impact on my teaching of classes. When professors are good at their scholarship it can only have a direct impact on students scholarship and student's enjoyment and hopefully understanding of their classes," Capaldi said.

Outside of the classroom Capaldi is excited about how her experiences will affect her research at the University. "It solidifies my research program. I know what is going to work and what isn't going to work. It also helps me isolate and more directly attack the questions that I think students will be able to think are interesting and be actually able to get into and complete," Capaldi said.

Capaldi hopes that she is starting a research program that will continue after she returns to the University. She also will be looking for more student involvement in assisting her with laboratory research at the University and through field trips to Panama. Further, she hopes to be able to use techniques that she is developing in her work in Panama on research on bees found in this area.

Capaldi finds that what she has gained from the experience already goes beyond acquiring knowledge from her research.

"My work in Panama has been really eye-opening for me. It is the first time I have lived outside of the country for more than a few weeks. And so it has been really wonderful to get to know how Americans are perceived. It also helps me network and see how University students can get research experience working with other faculty and students I met while I am here."

Next fall Capaldi will be able to put her many experiences to use in class. She will be teaching the first animal behavior course and a course on the biology of social insects. In the spring, as well as teaching general biology, she will continue to further use her new experiences in a tropical ecology course. Her future endeavors include developing two new courses, Neural Ethology and a foundation seminar, "Bugs and People," which will explore the role of insects throughout the history of humanity.

Capaldi's research in Panama will have a positive impact on the biology and animal behavior departments. She will help many students become excited about both insects and neural anatomy, in turn providing a rewarding learning experience for the campus community.

Sara Mastrony receives international education scholarship

By Katie Marston
Senior Writer

The Institute for the International Education of Students (IES) recently awarded Sara Mastrony '03 one of 33 IES Achievement Scholarships for study abroad this fall.

IES is a 50-year old, Chicago based non-profit study abroad organization. Every year, the Institute hosts more than 2,500 students in one of 22 programs in 13 different countries.

The IES financial aid program assigns more than one million dollars for its study abroad programs each year, and $58,000 will be presented as IES Achievement Scholarships this fall. IES, which has programs in Asia, Australia, Europe and South America, received 226 Achievement Scholarship applications from students at colleges and universities all over the nation.

"IES is committed to providing high-quality study abroad programs that allow students to build cross-cultural understanding. Our programs attract many meritorious students, and this is our way to award a select few for their outstanding academic achievements," said Dr. Mary M. Dwyer, president of IES.

In order to apply for this scholarship, students must maintain a GPA of 3.3, write a personal statement about their cross-cultural interests and complete a comparative essay. Some scholarships require the essay to be written in a foreign language, and others ask for an artistic submission, such as a video of a dramatic performance.

Each application is reviewed by a panel of U.S. faculty from prestigious universities, which makes recommendations on the awardees competing for 14 different scholarship categories. These include the International Relations Scholarship, High Academic Achievement Scholarship and Excellence in Foreign Language.

Sara, who is majoring in music and history, won the Fine Arts and Performing Arts Scholarship, and is currently participating in the IES London Program.

Currently, 12 University students are attending IES programs in Madrid, Vienna, Beijing, European Union, London and Milan.

The University is an IES Affiliate, which allows students benefits such as priority admission review of students, increased financial aid opportunities and the ability to directly admit students into IES programs. IES has over 130 Affiliates and Associates, including MIT, Harvard, Cornell and the University of Notre Dame.

University student, Christopher S. McCarry '02 attended IES in La Plata, Argentina, and said, "I was the only foreigner in a class of 20 people and it was a great challenge because of the level of Spanish, the high intellectual atmosphere and the fact that I was an outsider. But I think that class taught me so much and not only am I glad to have taken it, I am also proud."

In wake of the recent events of Sept. 11, IES has ordered program directors to take steps to ensure that students are present, accounted for and reachable in the event of an emergency. As part of a comprehensive plan, students are now required to leave detailed itineraries before departing on trips and to leave their cell phones on around the clock.

"Our American students studying overseas need to be prepared, whether they're in Japan, Europe, Australia or China," Dwyer said. "At the same time, the events of Sept. 11 make it necessary for American students to exercise caution and reassure their parents and home schools that they can be reached easily in case of an emergency."

University continues to "Make a Difference"

By Erin Zsolcsak
Contributing Writer

Saturday, Oct. 27 is "Make a Difference Day," which has become the largest nationwide day devoted to volunteer community service.

Held on the fourth Saturday every October, the day was created by the magazine "USA Weekend." Last October, 2.2 million people volunteered their time to "make a difference," helping 25 million people nationwide. This year, "Make a Difference Day" is expected to have an even larger turnout, aiding more people in need than ever before.

I volunteered every Sunday at a nursing home while I was in high school, wheeling residents to attend Mass and afterwards playing games such as bingo and our own revised version of Wheel of Fortune. I learned so much from the residents there; I couldn't help but fall in love with volunteering!

When I came to the University, I wanted to continue volunteering and was amazed at the many other ways that I could volunteer my time, and most importantly the number of students who were dedicated to volunteerism.

I cannot even begin to estimate the number of people at the University who participate in community service. There are many who are involved specifically in service organizations, organizations that perform community service multiple times throughout each semester, or those who go out into the community individually without affiliation with any group on campus.

These people are making the difference each and every day. It would be a pleasure to acknowledge every group and person who volunteers but I am afraid that I may leave out someone or some group. Instead, I'd like to share some interesting acts of volunteerism that I have recently experienced

This past homecoming weekend, there were two campus-wide community service activities. From 12 a.m. on Friday night to 8 a.m. on Saturday morning, students helped stir apple butter at New Columbia's Apple Butter Festival. Each year the residents of New Columbia make four large kettles of apple butter to be sold the next day at their annual festival. The apple butter must be stirred constantly for twenty-four hours beforehand. University students traditionally go and help the residents keep the apple butter going, staying up until all hours of the night. And this year was no different - organizations and groups of friends volunteered an hour or two to help stir the apple butter, and if they were lucky got to taste a bit of what they were helping to make.

The second community service activity of last weekend was the Children's Festival, held in Hufnagle Park in downtown Lewisburg. Different organizations from campus and groups from the Lewisburg community gathered together on Saturday afternoon to play games and make crafts with children from the local community. All activities for the children were paid for by the participating organizations. Campus organizations that were involved include: Emerging Leaders, Catholic Campus Ministry, Society of Women Engineers, National Society of Black Engineers, Phi Gamma Delta, Alpha Chi Omega, Lambda Chi Alpha, Activities and Campus Events (A.C.E), Class of 2003, Class of 2004 and Delta Upsilon.

Habitat for Humanity is currently involved with an ongoing service project. In addition to their normal community service, the organization is trying to raise $20,000, an amount which will be then matched by the Union-Snyder Chapter of Habitat for Humanity, to build a house in Union-Snyder County. This house will be named "Bucknell House," in honor of the school's involvement.

Last weekend, Habitat for Humanity slept in cardboard boxes on the lawn to promote awareness of the lack of housing for low income and no-income people. The organization also has a number of upcoming trips to Habitat project sites in the Harrisburg and Northumberland areas.

I'd like to encourage everyone to continue the spirit of homecoming and go out and "make a difference" this Saturday. I also want to thank everyone who gave their time so unselfishly to help others. The banner hanging in the LC in honor of all of those participants is well deserved.

"Hard Times" to satire working world

By Hillary DePiano
Staff Writer

"In a utilitarian age it is a matter of grave importance that fairy tales should be respected. A nation without fancy, without some romance, never did, never can, never will, hold a great place under the sun."

Those words, spoken by Charles Dickens, embody the feeling that permeates "Hard Times," a Dickens novel adapted into a play by Stephen Jeffreys which will be produced by the Department of Theater next weekend.

The play, directed by Associate Professor of Theater Bob Gainer, features 14 students playing the 19 roles in Dickens' satire of the working world and those obsessed with facts over fancy.

The characters range from circus folk and the weavers of the working class to upper-class intellectuals, parodied into a system that will not allow imagination or fancy, squashing every human instinct under the hard brand of fact. Gainer first discovered this play in 1989 while he was teaching for the Bucknell in London program. There he took a playwriting workshop with Jeffreys himself. He has since been trying to realize the production, but it was not until this year that the department found the opportunity to perform it.

Courtesy of Professor Robert Gainer
The cast rehearses for their performance.

"Dickens deals with serious topics in fanciful ways and attacks social, economic and humanitarian issues," Gainer said. "In terms of the current national situation, this play resonates all the stronger with me.

The production includes three faculty designers and two graduate-level interns operating as assistant designers. The stage management team is also comprised of three students. With the 14 actors thrown into the mix, Gainer finds this to be a very exciting production.

"I also love doing plays that are rarely done," he said. "This way everyone, students and faculty alike, come at it with no preconceptions. It is all the excitement of a new work."

It was Gainer's decision to increase the cast size to 14 actors. The script calls for four actors, two men and two women, to play all 19 roles. Gainer decided to provide as many opportunities as possible for student actors, and instead cast each role with only some actors playing more than one part. The cast contains six women and eight men.

"What I love most about this cast is that we have such a range," Gainer said. "We have members from each class year, including two freshmen and several talented faculty advisors. It is very rewarding to have so many talents brought to the table."

The show will be performed on Friday, Nov. 2 through Monday, Nov. 5 at 8 p.m. in the Tustin Studio Theatre. Seating is very limited, so if you are interested in attending or receiving more information about the production, please contact Director Bob Gainer (x73498) as soon as possible to reserve a seat. Tickets are $6 for students.

Homecoming ends with faculty recital

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

Homecoming weekend concluded with an intimate evening of music in the Recital Hall of the Siegfried Weis Music Building. Through the music of Robert Muczynski, Donato Lovreglio and Joseph Horovitz, clarinetist Ella Forsyth and piano accompanist Eun Ae Baik-Kim displayed the full range and eloquence of the clarinet as an instrument for solo performance.

The evening commenced with "Time Pieces" by Muczynski. Forsyth chose to open with this modern piece because of its upbeat and dynamic nature and its showcase of the clarinet as a solo instrument.

"Muczynski's music has been described as 'neo-Romantic,' and it is full of athletic and syncopated rhythms," Forsyth said. "He gives two rather long sections to the clarinet alone at the end of the slow movement and at the beginning of the last."

The audience enjoyed this piece because of the attention given to the clarinet and the coordination between the two artists.

"My favorite piece was the 'Time Piece' because it showed the full range of the clarinet well," Michael Bodnyk '05 said. "I also thought that both musicians had an excellent sense of musical phrasing."

Lovreglio composed the second piece of the evening. He based his "Fantasia on La Traviata" on the arias of Verdi's opera "La Traviata." The solo portions of the piece allowed the performers to display the clarinet's ability to mimic the human voice. This aspect of the piece, and the fantastic variation inspired by the familiar tunes, were a pleasure to hear.

Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian
Faculty members perform classical selections.

The most contemporary of all the pieces was the finale, "Sonatina," written by Horovitz. This jazzy composition offers a good representation of his latest pieces.

"Like most of his recent works, [the piece] is melodically and rhythmically influenced by jazz and other popular music," Forsyth said. "It calls for equal virtuosity from both players."

The audience found the speed of the piece exciting.

"I thought this was a very fun and exciting performance," said William Kenny, director of university bands and an associate professor of music at the University. "My favorite was the 'Sonatina' because I love how the piece alternated between the faster but more spirited theme and the slower but more beautiful theme."

A native of Sunbury, Pa., Forsyth received her initial training at Oberlin Conservatory of Music under the direction of George Wain. She holds a masters degree in Music from Mount St. Mary's College in Los Angeles and a masters degree in Library Science from UCLA.

Forsyth's extensive music career has led her across North America. She has been a member of many symphonic organizations, such as the Hollywood Chamber players, the Pasadena Symphony, the Laguna Opera and the Oakland Symphony. She also served as the principal clarinetist with the Mexico City Opera and Ballet Orchestra. Since her return to the east coast, she has performed with the Dickinson College Community Orchestra, the Dickinson College Concert Band, the Harrisburg Concert Band, the West Shore Symphony and the Central Pennsylvania Symphony. She currently serves as the principal clarinet in the Central Pennsylvania Symphony Orchestra.

Her career also extends to music education. While in California, she taught music in private and public Los Angeles schools. She is currently a faculty member in the music department here at the University.

Originally from Korea, Kim's family immigrated to Brazil when she was 11. She began her study of music at the Conservatorio Municipal de Saa Paulo as the youngest student of renowned Brazilian pianist Gilberto Tinetti. Under the tutelage of Harvey Wedeen and Lamber Orkis, she earned her BM and MM degrees in Piano Performance and Accompanying/Chamber Music from Temple University.

She has won the "Concurso para Joven Solistas" and the "Concurso Estadual para Instrumentistas e Cantores" awards. She also gave numerous solo and chamber recitals in Saa Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, including performances with the Saa Paulo Symphony Orchestra. She currently holds the position of staff accompanist and instructor in piano at Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pa.

Sweet Honey inspires Weis Center crowd

By Sarah En Dyke
Staff Writer

Lightning paints the clouds in the distance, silhouetting the giraffes and elephants against the plum and turquoise sky as the savannah grass bends to the moist and soothingly cool winds crossing the scorched plains. Sky, grass and wind come together, dancing, twirling and celebrating on the pristine plains of Africa ending with the song of a single bird. A magnificent image was painted on the blank canvas of my mind as my body rocked to the rhythm of five a capella women working with the paintbrushes of their voices. In the next moment, I was sitting on the steps of a rickety porch in the sweltering heat of Alabama as I listened to the hymns and stories of injustice and the golden rule of love that overrides it all.

"Sweet Honey in the Rock" visited the University on Oct. 19, bringing with them not only music, but understanding, tolerance and truth. "Sweet Honey" is a Grammy Award-winning African-American female a cappella ensemble with deep roots in the sacred music of the black church spirituals, hymns and gospels.

Their versatility extends even into traditional rap, reggae, blues and jazz spheres. Listening to their music, one can see the power and soul of their voices and lyrics joined together in harmony, resurrecting the ghosts of history and injustice, and the continued struggle of working towards "The Golden Rule," while their hand percussion instruments keep rhythm and time.

"Sweet Honey" is comprised of six women—five vocalists and the hands of Shirley Childress Saxton interpreting the beauty and rhythm of the songs through sign language. Their songs range from African birthing songs and African storm songs to the racism and dark history of America. You can see the torment of our planet in an excerpt from their song, "Battered Earth": "If the earth could run away/ Could you see her gathering all the trees and plants/ All the animals/ All the birds and fowl, every creeping thing/ They have never been her foe/ Never harmed her blessed soul/ If she could run away, if she could run away, so far away/ Then she'd be/ Running for her life/ She'd be running for her life/ Running for her very blessed life." Although they point their fingers at certain problems, their praises of love and tolerance encourage and inspire the search of truth and activism.

"Sweet Honey in the Rock" first performed at Howard University in November 1973. Since then, 22 women have participated in this ensemble. Currently, the group consists of Ysaye Maria Barnwell, Nitanju Bolade Casel, Aisha Kahlil, Carol Lynn Maillard, Shirley Childress Saxton and Bernice Johnson Reagon. The founder of the group, Reagon is a historian, scholar and a distinguished professor of history at American University and curator emeritus at the Smithsonian Institution National Museum of American History. She named the group after the title of the first song she taught them—"Sweet Honey in the Rock."

"After they got the chorus harmony just right, I said, 'that's the name of the group,'" Reagon said. "Then I had to call my father, a Baptist minister, and ask him the song's meaning. He told me that it was a sacred parable, and that the parable itself was not found in the Bible, but it told of a land so rich that when you cracked the rocks, honey flowed from them."

For the group, this has come to reflect the legacy of African-American women, struggling for the survival and continuance of their people and cultivating their strength, as well as the sweet and nurturing honey that lies within.

Mary Kokie has a promising design career

The senior has collaborated with professors on many University projects

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Kokie has contributed in many ways to the Theater Department.

Mary Kokie flipped her pen back and forth—maybe habitually, maybe nervously. Either way, Kokie's voice was confident as she explained her long-held aspirations of being a costume designer.

"I consider myself a costume designer," she said. "Design is a language you learn, a language of the senses."

Kokie, a double major in theater and art with a concentration in costume design and studio art, exhibited such confidence even as a freshman. "Merrily We Roll Along," a musical in the spring of 1999, was Kokie's first taste of the University stage. She was stage manager and assisted in costume design. This play was Kokie's first experience working with Gary Grant, now one of her favorite theater professors. In fact, they are working on her Senior Design project together.

"Shakuntala," a play based on a work of Kalidasa, a classical Indian writer, will be the brain child of Kokie, Elaine Williams, and Grant. A fifth-century play, "Shakuntala" is an interesting study of India culture.

In her sophomore year, Kokie stage-managed "Baltimore Waltz" and also designed costumes for "Someone Once Said," one of her favorite designs. Another exciting design was a dance design in her junior year for "Thirty-Three and a Third," a mock ballroom dance choreographed by Sarah Wagner '01.

This semester, Kokie is designing costumes for Ryen Herrmann '02 in her dance company show, the fifth dance design that she has done. In February, Kokie will be the University representative at the United States Institute for Theater and Technology conference held in New Orleans. She is excited to represent the University and show her portfolio to potential employers.

Kokie started working in the costume shop and eventually became the TA. Stemming from her interest in costumes, she developed a desire to explore other aspects of a show, such as makeup, hair and mask design. Working closely with Paula Davis-Larson, professor of costume design, Kokie learned to look at costume designs from a different angle. Davis-Larson stressed the hands-on basics of cutting, draping, and patterning. She enjoys working with Kokie.

"[Mary] is one of those students you dream about and get to meet only once every couple of years," Davis-Larson said. "She is so completely committed to her art, craft and field of study. I often feel more as if I am only pointing the way rather than having to 'teach' her."

A great influence on Kokie, Professor Elaine Williams, head of the theater department and Kokie's advisor, has faith in her.

"[Mary] is one of our most capable and dedicated theater majors. Mary has extraordinary talent as a costume designer ... I'll point out stunning designs for dances choreographed by Wagner and for Jen Schmermund '00, whose dance/theater piece she both designed and built herself," Williams said.

Kokie explained that collaboration is an important part of designing and that she especially enjoyed working with Williams, who agreed that it was a fun experience.

"Mary's pleasant, buoyant personality makes her a pleasure to work with. We are all continually impressed by her professionalism and remarkable collaborative skills," Williams said.

The three professors, Williams, Davis-Larson and Grant, are mentors that have fueled her passion and instilled real life values in her education.

"When I meet a mentor, I know that I was meant to follow them," Kokie said.

Kokie, a native of New Jersey, was first introduced to hand sewing at the age of five, and by the time she reached the fifth grade, she owned her first sewing machine. While she was at Oak Knoll High School, she described herself as "fond" of costume design. Once the theater director found out that she could sew, Kokie was well on her way to being costumer mistress for every single other production the school performed.

Also during high school, Kokie sporadically worked for professional theaters as stage manager, costume designer and prop mistress. She values very much the experience she gained before she ever embarked on higher education. The quality of theater departments was important to Kokie as she searched for a college. Looking back over her years at the University, she does not regret not going to a school with a larger or more prestigious program.

"I was given a broad education that was detailed in every way," Kokie said. "I had more opportunities to design and gain hands-on experiences."

What is Kokie's inspiration to continue in the theater world?

"Live performances are inspiring," she said. "I'm intrigued by the power that art forms have and I've found my role as a costume designer."

Four killed in Tours shooting

Tours is the location of Bucknell en France

By Rachel Laskow
Associate Editor

A masked railroad worker killed four people and injured 10 others during a shooting rampage Tuesday in Tours, France, where 17 University students are participating in the Bucknell en France program.

According to The New York Times, 44-year-old Jean-Pierre Roux-Durrafourt was angry at his employer and fired the shots. The police later captured him in an underground parking garage.

According to Interim Director of the Office of International Education Marianne Torza, as of noon on Tuesday the Office did not receive any calls from students currently in Tours nor from any of their parents.

Although the incident appeared to be a random act of violence and not related to terrorism, safety precautions were still taken.

"As soon as we became aware of the event, the administrative coordinator on campus immediately contacted the coordinator in France and verified that all our students were safe and accounted for," Torza said. "The program coordinator in Tours asked the students to stay home until the perpetrator was arrested and normal life could resume.".

Laura Day '03, who is currently participating in Bucknell en France and walks by the crime scene four or five times a day, was surprised by the violence.

"The shooting in the centre-ville of Tours came as a grave surprise to all city residents. We live in a very safe, relatively quiet community where such events are completely unforeseen," Day said.

Molly Koenig '03 also found the violence very unexpected.

"Well obviously, it was a huge shock that something like that happened in Tours. Although it is a city, it's a very calm city, and everyone who lives here just couldn't believe it," Koenig said.

According to Torza, because of this event and the Sept. 11 attacks, abroad programs are being more closely monitored.

"We always worry about our study abroad students when news of this kind come in from their study abroad locations. Because of the events of Sept. 11, we, like the rest of the country, feel more on edge and are more aware of possible threats against Americans abroad," Torza said. "We monitor State department and consular announcements and the news media closely, as do our program directors and the providers of non-Bucknell study abroad programs to whom we send students. An incident such as this only serves to increase our vigilance."

This event is causing students abroad to be more cautious, but will not hinder their abroad

Borough Candidates discuss issues in forum

Kasdan and Sorber registered candidacy too late to address League's questions

By Meredith Atkinson
Assistant News Editor

The League of Women Voters sponsored a forum Tuesday in which candidates running for Lewisburg Area school directors, Lewisburg Area mayor and Lewisburg Area Council could respond to questions and give brief statements about themselves and issues regarding their candidacies. Only those who declared their candidacy at least 30 days prior were permitted on the panel, resulting in the exclusion of Nate Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03, running for mayor and the two-year ward III Borough Council seat respectively.

Issues ranging from recycling to local finances were discussed, however there was little mention of the University and issues concerning its relationship with the community.

"I was disheartened that Bucknell was not mentioned more," Sorber said. "As for improving relationships between students and residents, there were few inventive new approaches. I was not satisfied."

Running against Sorber for mayor is Lewis L. Hendricks, Jr. and Mike Molesevich. Hendricks has been involved in local politics for the last 30 years and has served as mayor since 1998. He was also the mayor from 1977-1983. He wanted to run again because he "felt obligated to the police chief, police department and community."

As the democratic candidate, Molesevich also seeks the office of mayor. He earned his masters degree at the University in 1979 and has lived in Lewisburg for more than 20 years. He has served as mayor before.

"I would like to return so that I can do the work that I started," Molesevich said.

When asked how the town-gown relations could be improved, the candidates responses varied. Hendricks believes that the police chief should meet regularly with Bucknell Student Government, while Molesevich said that there are currently too many students living downtown and that he would like to work with the administration and consult with other colleges. He noted that maintaining the neighborhood environment was essential.

Borough Council candidates were equally divided about how issues regarding the University should be approached. Steven Beattie (D) observed that the fact that Kasdan was running against him for the two-year ward III seat "opened his eyes." He also recognized that there is a need to work directly with students and suggested implementing activities in the town for students, such as block parties.

Ferraro's first year as dean of students evaluated

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

Richard Ferraro, the University's Dean of Students for 16 months, has had to reconcile and address the campus' most pressing and controversial issues.

"Dean Ferraro was presented with a number of terrifically challenging issues in his first year ... He has shown sensitivity to students, even while making the toughest decisions. He has demonstrated great fairness, even while establishing high expectations," Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

Ferraro and his wife moved from Manhattan to Lewisburg, Pa. about a year and a half ago. His decision to move from his former position at Columbia University has been questioned by some, but he said that he and his wife have always loved small-town life and that he "likes getting up in the morning and going to run in a pretty environment, not having to dodge traffic."

Although Ferraro and his family were attracted to the rural location, his main purpose for coming to Lewisburg was his resolve in the University's potential for becoming one of the best institutions in the country.

Bucknellian

"The faculty cares about its students and really cares about teaching," Ferraro said.

He observed that the faculty at other universities was more focused on research than educating; but here the faculty is devoted to its students and is willing to hold more than just the standard office hours to help the students as much as possible. Not only was he impressed with the faculty, he was also very impressed with the students. He recalled a day in which he worked with students on a painting and service project, observing that the students "are extremely bright, enjoy life and have a lot of optimism for the future."

Once established in his role, Ferraro said he then began facing the University's challenges; the first and still most serious, Ferraro said, is the issue safe alcohol consumption. He said that about two-thirds of the student population has no problem handling alcohol, but that the remaining one-third concerns him.

According to Ferraro, eight people have been hospitalized as a result of alcohol consumption.

Upon arriving at the University, in an effort to fight the abuse of alcohol and combat hypocrisy, Ferraro pledged not to consume alcohol for an

Fraternity and sorority presidents signed a proclamation last Monday pledging to remain substance free during Alcohol Awareness Week, which begins Monday, Nov. 5. In attendance, along with Greek representatives, was University President Steffen Rogers, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and several other administrators. The event is sponsored by the Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Association.

Vietnam Era University President Watts dies at 74

A small crowd gathered at Bucknell Hall last Thursday for a memorial service in celebration of the life of Charles H. Watts II. University President from 1964-1976, Watts guided the University during the difficult Vietnam Era.

Many of the people in attendance had fond memories and thoughts to share about Watts. According to Michael Payne, Professor of English and Chair of the Faculty, Watts' leadership guided the University through the difficult times.

"Charlie's articulate intelligence and compassionate leadership guided us through our deliberations about how to oppose the wars in Southeast Asia without abandoning our academic responsibilities, how to translate the legacy of the Civil Rights Movement into an institutional commitment to diversity, and how to foster the growth of a good small-town college into an excellent university of international prominence," Payne said.

Watts' wife, Patricia, believes Watts was very committed to the University.

"It was clear Bucknell was a major and significant part of his life," wrote Mrs. Watts in a letter to the University.

Watts died at the age of 74 on Sept. 26, 2001 in New Hampshire, and his funeral was held in Boston. He is survived by his wife, Patricia; two daughters, Katharine L. Watts and Caroline W. Collins; a son, Charles H. III and six grandchildren.

Campus Theatre hosts Janet Leigh

By Michelle Dombeck
Staff Writer

Janet Leigh, star of "Psycho," graced the Campus Theatre last Saturday with the presentation of her film "Touch of Evil." The community greeted the 1958 film with much enthusiasm.

"Touch of Evil," was the first film in a two-week series of the Library of Congress' film tour, "A Panorama of American Cinema." The film presentation tour is an effort to show the public films in their original media and form.

About 450 people viewed the screening of "Touch of Evil."

"I think everyone really enjoyed the screening," said Eric Faden, associate professor of English and owner of the Campus Theatre. "In many ways, it represented the culmination of several months of work, planning and construction and I think it paid off."

Leigh, speaking to the audience, talked about the importance of the tour and preservation.

"She's a very exciting and eloquent speaker and she really communicated the importance of preserving film and preserving historic movie theatres," Faden said.

According to the Library of Congress, "The tour ... featuring films from the National Film Registry is bringing important and entertaining motion pictures to the American public in just the way they were meant to be seen: sparkling prints, large screens, full size theaters and attentive audiences."

According to a movie review website at www.filmsite.org, the opening scene is often cited as, "an audacious, incredible, breathtaking, three-minute, uninterrupted crane tracking shot ... the black-and-white visuals emphasize the seedy atmosphere and the moral decadence, decay, and nightmarish dirtiness of the scene." Such an incredible scene can only be enjoyed in a movie theater with a big screen.

Other upcoming films in the tour include Friday's 8 p.m. screening of "Shadow of a Doubt," a 1943 Hitchcock film and next Thursday's 8 p.m. screening of "Easy Rider," a 1969 movie starring Dennis Hopper, Peter Fonda and Jack Nicholson.

Judith Wagner (R) said that, in the past, students have not been invited to participate on any committees that she served on and said that there is no access to students in ward III. While Borough Council members have been allowed to talk to the administration, she said that there must be open dialogue with students and everyone must work together in the future. Julianna Cooper (D) said that the issue is complex and that the administration must play a more active role downtown.

Kasdan was frustrated that he was not allowed to address the audience at Tuesday night's forum.

"I thought that it was really interesting to see all of the candidates, however I just wish that I had the opportunity to speak last night, because I have a lot of new ideas that I could bring to the council and I was not even able to express them," Kasdan said after the debate. "All of the candidates that spoke had one overwhelming thing in common: they all said basically nothing and were not bringing any new ideas."

experience.

"I actually live basically just down the street from where it happened, and the weirdest part is that later that day and that night, it seemed almost as if nothing had happened. There were lot of people out in the streets just carrying on. Everyone is very sad about the city loosing four people, and their thoughts remain with their families and those who were injured too," Koenig said.

Day also hopes to continue her time in Tours in a normal fashion.

"While it is very frightening to realize that it could have been me, a friend or a classmate who fell victim to these attacks, it is also a serious reminder that life is so vulnerable and we must maximize each day," Day said.

"I feel deeply for the victims of these attacks and am so sorry that there are people in this world who must resort to such measures to have their voices heard. I, and the other Bucknellians here, will continue on with our normal routines and lives in Tours. We will learn from this experience, but we will not let it impede our study abroad experience in such a thriving and wonderful place," she continued.

entire year. He made this promise in June of 2000 and did not take his first drink until he was in Rome in June of 2001.

During his first year he was very pleased with the fraternities and the sororities who have met and continue to meet the high standards held by the University. The new, nationally acclaimed plans drawn up by the Greek system are also a source of pride for Ferraro.

He has also been impressed by the Bucknell Student Government, and the way they have handled the issues that have come before it. He also considers the organizations and the people who contribute time to volunteering an asset. He believes that the role of service is something the University should be proud of and something that he hopes will be a greater hallmark of the University in years to come.

Pollock said that he is confident Ferraro will continue his outstanding work with the University.

"Ferraro has to know and be known by Bucknell students and the rest of the Bucknell community," Pollock said. "On many issues, from service learning to residence hall enhancements, I expect continued strong leadership."

Over all, Ferraro said he has enjoyed his first year at the University. As he continues to work with the students, faculty and administration he hopes to enhance life for independent students and improve off-campus living.

Public Safety Log

October 24, 2001

ASSIST LOCAL POLICE DEPARTMENT—East Buffalo Township Police Department requested Public Safety to assist them to locate a student who had attempted to purchase alcohol with false identification. The student was cited for underage consumption and attempting to purchase alcohol with a false ID.

BU PROPERTY DAMAGE—Public Safety responded to Trax Hall for the report of a broken window. No witnesses could be located in a search of the area, but a trail of blood was discovered. The incident is under investigation.

Fourth anthrax death

NEW YORK—A patient in New York's first case of inhalation anthrax died early Wednesday at Lenox Hill Hospital, hospital officials said.

Kathy T. Nguyen, 61, worked in the basement supply room of the Manhattan Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital. Antibiotics are being offered to everyone who has been inside that building since October 11.

Nguyen is the fourth person this month to have died of inhalation anthrax, the most serious form of the disease.

Investigators eyeing home mail

WASHINGTON—Federal investigators are "intensively" considering the possibility of anthrax infection from mail delivered to private homes after a New Jersey woman with no apparent connection to any known anthrax contamination contracted the disease, a top health official has said.

"Up to [Monday], there was no evidence at all that there could be, or is, an individual in which there might be the reasonable question, 'Did they get infected from a piece of mail that went to their home?" said Dr. Anthony Fauci, director of the National Institute for Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the National Institutes of Health. "That is being intensively investigated right now."

A 51-year-old woman who lives near the Hamilton Township, New Jersey mail facility, where traces of anthrax have been found, tested positive for skin anthrax but is doing fine, health officials said Monday. She was released from the hospital Sunday.

Explosions rock Kabul front lines

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan—A large explosion rattled the Taliban stronghold of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan Wednesday as U.S.-led airstrikes reached the midpoint of their fourth week.

At Bagram Air Base, north of Kabul, massive explosions could be seen along front lines between the Taliban and the Northern Alliance as U.S. jets pounded Taliban troop positions. Smoke roiled up along positions extending for miles.

Earlier in the overnight hours, jet fighters could be heard roaring through the skies above Kandahar. Explosions were heard and flashes could be seen on the northern horizon.

FAA restricts flights near nuclear sites, N.Y. World Series

WASHINGTON—The Federal Aviation Administration is temporarily restricting flights near the World Series games in New York and around nuclear sites in the wake of the latest terrorism warning.

The prohibition goes into effect immediately and will remain in place until midnight November 6.

The restrictions over New York City prohibit any aircraft that is operating under visual flight rules from flying within 30 nautical miles of John F. Kennedy International Airport during World Series games, from 6:45 p.m. until 2 a.m. Restrictions were even tighter during President Bush's appearance at Tuesday's game.

The nuclear sites ban, which affects 80 facilities such as power plants and Energy Department areas, restricts aircraft flying below 18,000 feet from coming within a radius of 10 nautical miles of each facility.

Information from Canada helped lead to alert, official says

OTTAWA, Canada—Canada's solicitor general said information from his nation's intelligence agencies helped lead the United States to conclude that another terror attack could be imminent.

U.S. intelligence sources received a credible domestic terrorism threat against the United States, Attorney General John Ashcroft said Monday. Ashcroft told police agencies around the country—for the second time this month—to be on "high alert."

Canadian Solicitor General Lawrence MacAulay said Tuesday that information from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was shared with the FBI and led to the Ashcroft warning.

U.S. Homeland Security chief Tom Ridge said Tuesday that a "confluence" of information from intelligence sources led to the warning. In answer to a question, he said that if intelligence experts did not feel that the information came from suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden or the al Qaeda network, the government would not have "ramped up" on it.

The New York Times reported that the information was an intercept of a message from a bin Laden associate indicating possible attacks.

Northern Alliance: Don't stop war for Ramadan

A spokesman for Afghanistan's opposition Northern Alliance on Wednesday urged the U.S.-led coalition against terrorism not to halt its military campaign for the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

"The Taliban have always violated Ramadan," Haron Amin told the National Press Club in Washington. "This is a month for fasting, not a month where you stop combating terrorism ... we certainly plan to engage (the Taliban) during the month of Ramadan."

U.S. officials have come under pressure from some Muslim and Arab groups to stop the bombing of terrorist targets in Afghanistan during Ramadan, which begins November 17.

Administration officials said Tuesday that President Bush's national security team wants the war to continue during Ramadan.

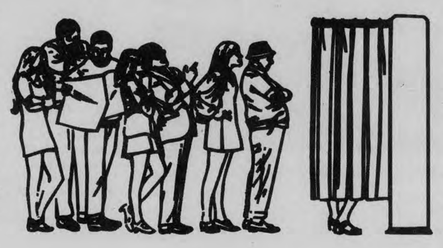
Make yourself heard and go vote

Tuesday, Nov. 6 is Election Day. While voting is a national civic duty, The Bucknellian strongly urges students registered in Lewisburg to voice their support and vote along with other community members. The Bucknell Student Government's voter registration drive was considered a success—now let's make its efforts worthwhile.

While we have endorsed Nate Sorber '02 for the mayor of Lewisburg, we emphasize that students should consider all options on Election Day. With a school referenda and multiple ward candidacies, this election means much more than just a showdown between a student and two adults for the mayor of Lewisburg. This election could be the indicator that shows that students really do care about the welfare of the Borough.



Students living downtown often voice their complaints about the leadership and direction of the Borough Council and Election Day is a time where they can contribute their influence with their vote. Some students also believe that the Borough does not take their opinions seriously and on Nov. 6, Bucknellians can show them the extent of their willingness to help mend relations.

Steven Beattie, running for the two-year ward III seat against Matthew Kasdan '03, stated on Tuesday night that the mere fact that a student is running against him has opened up his eyes to the true commitment of students to help solve town-gown issues.

The last few years have been marked with exhaustive efforts to collectively improve downtown relations. Last year Matthew Cole '01 dedicated himself to try and get a non-voting position for a University student on the Borough Council. While his efforts were futile, he garnered plenty of respect.

With Sorber and Kasdan running this year, Bucknellians have escalated their concern to rectify not only relations with University students but also the overall welfare of the community.

Even if Sorber and Kasdan do not win their respective positions, their efforts should not be deemed unsuccessful. They have truly exhibited maturity, leadership and sincere concern, which should be respected and appropriately termed a success.

Regardless of the outcome, students should show their support of all candidates and residents by heading to the voting booth on Tuesday. The impact of University students showing up to vote should be indicative of the devotion of most students toward the Borough.

Many students feel that Bucknellians are not treated as Lewisburg community members. Voting could be our way to prove that campus members as a whole are committed with action, not words.

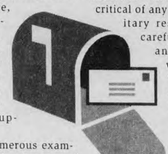
Faculty ought not to parade political ideology in classroom

To the Editor:

Glyne Griffith's response to Tom Elliott's article "Pacifist professors endanger America" misses its real point. In my reading, Elliott is troubled not by true pluralism in the University, but by the stark reality that such a thing arguable does not exist in large part because of the distressingly large number of professors who, confusing their own leftist political ideology with unchallenged truth and moral purity, irresponsibly misuse their positions in failing to recognize the difference between the lectern and the soapbox.

Griffith invokes an image of "numerous [leftist/anti-war] professors ... offering alternative perspectives" on the tragedy.

The reality is that the faculty voice here has been close to monolithic on this, at least in public forums, and the "alternative" Griffith champions is in fact the dominant voice, while other accounts (that is, those that do not emerge from the multicultural left) are the ones in danger of disappearance and suppression.



Elliott cites numerous examples of the dogmatic advocacy of the left political and sometimes even crudely anti-American ideology disguising itself as "education" about Sept. 11.

There are even more amazing such cases.

On the very day of the attacks, University of New Mexico History Professor Richard Berthold told his Western Civilization course that "anyone who can blow up the Pentagon has my vote."

In Sacramento, a sixth-grade teacher burned a flag in front of his class a week after the attacks, informing the youngsters that "Babylon is burning" and referring to the United States as the "United Snakes." The problem is not just about isolate individuals; it extends to institutions.

At a good number of universities (including Marquette, Arizona State, Texas A&M and, close to home, at Lehigh), the banning of student displays of the American flag was justified by administrations claiming, in effect, that displaying the flag demonstrated 'insensitivity' to 'non-American students' and so could not be tolerated.

The dominance of leftist, anti-war and sometimes anti-American faculty responses has also been apparent here at the University.

At the teach-in session I attended, nearly all the faculty participants on the panel and in the audience were overwhelmingly critical of any suggestion of military response, however careful and measured, and many offered versions of the 'chickens have come home to roost' theory to 'explain' the attacks that stemmed directly from a radical left understanding of world affairs (in short, all evil that occurs anywhere in the world is the fault of the United States, and everyone else is a helpless victim of that evil, incapable of acting free or control by the American hegemon-Noam Chomsky provides a kind of 'ideal type' of this skewed perspective).

In discussions I heard across campus, the central issue for many seemed to have to do with a purported 'wave' of 'hate-crimes' against Arab- and Muslim-Americans, evidence of course of what a thoroughly noxious, racist society this really is.

Yet the fact is that such crimes have been very low in number and they have been thoroughly denounced by our political leadership.

More, Muslim leaders in the United States have applauded the American people for their overwhelming willingness to engage in such despicable stupidity.

But for many of my colleagues, even the slightest patriotic sensibilities on the part of the public and the mere suggestion that the perpetrators of the attacks were agents of evil was simply more evidence of the racist war-mongering, intolerance and hatred of Americans.

Apparently, in the contemporary university, tolerance and morally relativist non-judgementalism must be extended even to mass murders.

The point is not that faculty shouldn't be free to hold whatever personal political beliefs they like.

Berthold and the "United Snakes" elementary school teacher have the right to their angry worldview, just as those who believe e.g., that no wars are ever justified and that Hitler might have been turned away by a little human empathy and a greater willingness on America's party to come to terms with our 'inner Nazi' have the right to theirs.

But for a professor to parade political ideology in the classroom and in scholarly work as though it were something other than political ideology is a deliberate rejection of the core responsibilities of an educator and a scholar.

Letters to the editor

Local school referenda on Lewisburg ballot

To the Editor:

On Nov. 6, voters in the Lewisburg Area School District face two referenda about taxes: Act 24 and Act 50. I encourage people to vote "Yes" on Act 24, and "No" on Act 50.

Both Act 24 of 2001 and Act 50 of 1998 would eliminate the occupation tax and raise the earned income tax rate for the School District from 0.5 percent to 1.5 percent. This will improve the fairness of the local tax system because the earned income tax is based more on a person's ability to pay than is the occupation tax.

Some people will pay more and some people will pay less in taxes under Act 24 or Act 50 depending on their income and occupation classification. Even if one's taxes were to go up, however, improving the fairness of the tax system is a reason to vote for either Act 24 or Act 50.

Act 24 is a better way to eliminate the occupation tax. Act 24 is a simple, three-page law. Act 50 is a complicated, 100-plus page law. Neither Act would reduce property taxes in the Lewisburg Area School District. Act 24 is not designed to. Act 50 allows for the possibility of property tax relief through a homestead exemption, but there will not be enough revenue raised from the increase in the earned income tax rate to reduce property taxes in Lewisburg.

Act 50 requires voter approval for property tax increases when the School District's taxes rise faster than wages statewide. Some people find this voter referendum feature attractive, but it is problematic.

Unforeseen circumstances, such as a contractual obligation to raise teachers' pay and benefits coupled with a small increase in statewide wages could force a referendum to approve a tax increase.

If the referendum fails, there is no opportunity to propose a smaller tax increase. Tax rates would remain at the previous year's level. As a result, non-mandatory programs or positions would have to be cut. This possibility creates an incentive for a School Board to raise taxes by an allowable amount each year even if it is not needed in order to avoid a future referendum and to protect valued programs and activities.

A better way to control school taxes is by electing School Board members who share the majority's attitude toward balancing educational opportunities and the cost to the taxpayers.

I was the chairperson of the Local Tax Study Commission that recommended in 1999 the adoption of Act 50. At the time, there was no alternative way to eliminate the occupation tax. The Commission decided that the benefits of eliminating the occupation tax outweighed the potential problems of Act 50. We now have a better alternative—Act 24.

I encourage people to vote for simplicity and fairness in the local tax system. Vote "Yes" on Act 24 and "No" on Act 50.

Locking Horns

Should University paper usage be reduced?

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

Checking my mail here has been for me a cross between ritual and guilty pleasure. My freshman year it was a pre-lunch and pre-dinner event. All my friends and I would form our "freshman herd" and walk over to the Langone Center to eat our meals, but not without first performing the all important checking of the mail. Sometimes I would even check my mail in between these regulated times—just in case. It was, and still sometimes is, a little exhilarating to find an unexpected or eagerly anticipated piece of paper or envelope sitting in my little cubbyhole. Was it a package? Was it a letter from a friend?

Unfortunately, more often than not it was merely another piece of campus junk mail. Junk mail that would immediately join its hundreds of friends in the already overflowing recycling bin. In my fourth year here I have come to realize that this mail really starts to add up.

The University uses massive amounts of paper. While I applaud their efforts to recycle it, I wonder if the paper even needs to be used in the first place.

The University has made efforts in some areas to reduce the amount of paper it stuffs our mailboxes with by moving articles such as "What's Happening" into the realm of e-mail, but I still find the junk mail piling up in the mail room's recycle bin. Institutions, such as universities, rely on paper as an integral part of campus communications.

However, in the age of e-mail and the Internet, paper seems to be archaic. I would venture to say that no one at this school is ignorant when it comes to this technology, so why does the University insist on clogging our boxes with flyers that often get tossed aside without a glance? Our e-mail is so easily accessible that it probably gets checked more often than our actual mailboxes.

I pose this question as well: Why not save copious amounts of paper and put our course registration on the Internet as well? Imagine how much paper could be saved by simply putting a small notice in every student mailbox announcing that course registration is now available online, instead of jamming those books into our cubbies every semester. If we are moving this rapidly towards technology and computer dependency, then why not explore this option.

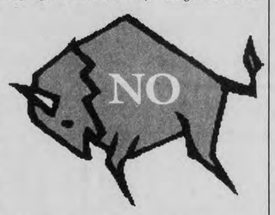
Making a transition to all campus announcements being sent via e-mail rather than campus mail would accomplish several goals. Announcements could be read by those who are interested, and paper does not have to be wasted on all those who are not. No only that, but the University could certainly cut back on their paper expenses as well. All in all it seems as though, on a campus as technologically and even ecologically progressive as ours, the profuse amount of unneeded paper is just outdated.

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

To say that the University uses too much paper is like saying that a chef uses "too much" flour. So what if he uses a lot? It's what he does. Words, and the accompanying paper, are the stock-in-trade of learning. Hopefully no one doubts the need for the use of paper in our educational pursuits. But how much should we cut back in the "other" stuff? How much is truly waste?

I'll bet it's less than we think. It takes an awful lot of paper to effectively communicate amongst thousands of strangers with wildly divergent schedules, interests, and habits. We say we "waste" paper- where? What would we get rid of—where is the University using paper resources where better options exist?

In any event, some perspective is in order. Try to imagine how much paper all of the University goes through in one year. Seem like a lot? Well, stack it up next to how much paper Penn State goes through in a year ... doesn't seem like so much anymore, does it? Now take the amount of paper that the University and Penn State combined go through in a year, and stack it up next to how much paper the government of Pennsylvania goes through in a year. Go further, think of Microsoft, the United Nations, the U.S. government! Just as stealing a stack of paper from the library and tossing it in the river does almost zero harm on a world scale, so would all of our conservation efforts amount to a drop in the proverbial bucket.



And at what cost? So you don't get the "Weekender" anymore, big deal. Imagine, though, that the University stops mailing you your phone bill and puts it on Banner Web instead. Suppose you have a very busy week and forget to check how much you owe or when it's due. Oops. Now you owe a late fee. Not that it isn't your fault for failing to check the due date—of course it is. But it's a headache that could have been avoided had the people responsible for the policy change thought through the costs and (globally, virtually non-existent) benefits of trying to reduce perceived "waste." There are other manifestations of this problem, not necessarily financial. Say the next semester's course catalog is made available only online—now you have to spend hours looking at how courses fit together, whereas before you could simply flip through the book.

Or let's say you get an e-mail for a speaker that looks interesting. You want to see it. But no longer are reminders sent to the entire campus through campus mail, and in trying to conserve paper no one puts up fliers advertising the thing. You forget about the speaker, miss the talk, and again, attempts to conserve paper prove needlessly impoverishing. I know we're supposed to "think globally and act locally." But it is not incompatible with "thinking globally" to humbly acknowledge what a tiny piece of this world we do control and make rational, cost-benefit decisions accordingly.

Besides, anyone else see something wrong with the idea that a $32,000-a-year school ought to start cutting back services? Seems to me that at $32,000, the "Weekender" ought to be delivered to our friggin' doorsteps.

Contributions pay dividends

Congress paying back campaign donors

By Michael Niebauer
Staff Writer

Our loyal and patriotic minded elected officials have, under cover of all the red, white and blue decorations on national display, shown their true colors. Their color of choice is "green" when it comes to paying back all those political-campaign contributors. According to one of the few reliable national newspapers in this country, The New York Times, and economist Paul Krugman, recent actions can and should renew the cries for campaign finance reform from the voters regardless of party affiliation. There is enough political embarrassment to share between both parties since this current season of bipartisanship has gone into extra innings.

Beginning at the top: The president has come out against the federalization of airport security. Securicor, the largest supplier of airport security in the United States, stated it was going to sue if the Feds took over the system. Their threat came even after they were fined for employing convicted felons and neglected to change this practice after Sept. 11, then lied about it to regulators. The president our re-invented (after September 11th) leader caved in to the British based corporation and now advocates for a cheaper system backed by Republicans in the House of Representatives. Was a secure air travel system one of the sacrifices we must endure to insure corporate financial success? Securicor must pay their lobbyists well. Perhaps they should provide them with some frequent flier miles to Afghanistan, one way.

Then there was the Republican controlled House economic stimulus bill that clearly illustrates that in this patriotic time payoffs need not be hidden. The cynical core of this legislation would repeal of the corporate minimum tax retroactive to 1986, which means that selected companies immediately receive lump-sum payments from the government equal to 25 billion with no incentive to invest this windfall at all. The defenders of this bill state that business is not only corporations but "mom and pop" operations as well. Reality is that the tax break goes disproportionately to energy and mining companies because they already get so many breaks that in the absence of the alternative minimum tax they will pay little or no taxes. While the House works to remove the possibility of future taxes they intend to refund any taxes they paid for the last fifteen years. How's that for the good old red, white, blue and green?

Adding to the stench of this Enron Corporation, recently under Security and Exchange Commission scrutiny for questionable accounting practices and suffering from a plummeting stock price, will receive $235 million from this legislation. That is a pretty good return from the one-and-a-half million dollars that Enron gave to the Bush campaign last year. Maybe they should rename Enron Field in Houston, "Lobbyists Are Us Field." It is fitting that the Astros play there since this corporate payback is so astronomically outrageous. The next time the president visits there to catch a few innings will the hot dogs be cheaper? Don't bet on it.

There is more disquieting news for taxpayers. The Bush administration announced on Thursday that the Interior Department would no longer be able to veto mining projects and operations on public land. This is great news for mining interests because this will reinforce the already scandalous practice of extracting minerals from public lands without paying royalties.

The next time the President states that he believes in the values of the American people we will have to read between the lines of his prepared text. It is good to know that even terrorist attacks and anthrax scares cannot keep Congress and the President from taking care of the business for business corporate contributors. Is this what our soldiers are fighting for? Patriotism can be a good cover for some really scandalous operators. If we do not pay closer attention they may just get re-elected and we won't have to involve the Supreme Court to make it legitimate like last time. Don't you just love it when politicians show their true colors confirming their loyalties and purposes? Now is the time for campaign finance reform or we will not be able to accurately tell the difference corporate patriotism and a healthy homeland pride.

Student candidates offer different options

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

As we build our own bridge from our youth to the real world, we cross many pre-existing bridges. Each of these bridges is still under construction, still have some flaws, and the University's bridge is no exception. One of this bridge's major flaws is the incompleteness of its connection with Lewisburg. The last segment of the bridge between these two areas has never been completed, but as featured on the front page of the Oct. 26, 2001 issue of The Bucknellian, two brave students have crossed the unfinished bridge with blue prints to complete the bridge in hand. Like any blue print each has its pros and cons, but in the end only one plan emerges as the best solution.

Matthew Kasdan '03, who is running for the two-year Ward III seat of the Borough Council, brings to the table a solid plan for improving town-gown relations. He proposes student representation to the Borough Council of a town much intertwined with a large institution. Having a student on the Council gives the student residents of the town a voice. There is a person that can serve as a liaison between the two groups and ensure that all decisions are mutually beneficial. More important than just a voice, student residents will have a vote in the affairs of the community. Although a student representative is not an easy fix to town-gown relations, over time the presence of a student on the Council will improve town-gown relations.

Nate Sorber '02, who is running for mayor, prepares a much quicker and more radical solution to bridging the University and the town. But could this radical solution be termed as gown-gown relations? Perhaps. As mayor, a student would have an influential voice over decisions made by the Council. Town-gown problems would be harder for people of the town to resolve because they would have little say over their own affairs. Programs, such as the one Mayor Lewis Hendricks proposes, which call for at least quarterly meetings between the mayor, chief of police and Bucknell Student Government, would be obsolete. Would the needs and the views of the people who have been citizens of Lewisburg for more than four years be met, along with the needs and wants of the students? With a student mayor, would we suddenly live in Bucknellburg, where the focus was more on the students than on the long-term residents? What happens the next election when a non-student is elected to the office? Had all the problems gone away or were they merely swept under the rug as a temporary fix?

You now know the blue print that each candidate has for completing the gap, and now it is up to you, the one with the vote on Nov. 6. Do you vote for a more permanent, deliberate solution, or an easy, temporary fix to the long-standing problem of bridging the University to the real world?

Halloween is no time to be frightened

By Natalie Casp
News Editor

It's Halloween and I'm not scared. I'm not scared of trick-or-treating because I heard some guy of Middle Eastern descent bought over $5,000 of Halloween candy at a New Jersey Costco. I'm not scared of going to the mail on Halloween because I received an email warning me not to; all shopping malls nation-wide risk being bombed. And I'm not scared because the letters in Halloween unscramble to "O, a new Hell!" which some say is all too apropos this terrifying fall.

Why is this Halloween any different? We're always trying to avoid being the victim, but at what cost? Should our community's children not trick-or-treat in fear of consuming anthrax-tainted candy? Should we not visit malls because an unnamed source in an email said so?

No, I'm not trying to downplay the frightening reality of the attacks, the war or the looming sense of more terrorism. I am, however, frustrated with hype, hoaxes and hollow threats.

The more we learn of false alarms, the more skeptical we become. People "cry wolf" too often and we're all starting to chuckle at the suspicious incidents which turn out to be unfounded.

From the emergency landings I've read about in the news to our own Public Safety Log, pranksters are victoriously invading our way of life. But in both cases, it wasn't anthrax, it was food.

If terrorists-domestic or international-want to harm us, they'll find a way. Risk exists in every aspect of life, but we stand up to risk by driving cars, travelling in airplanes and eating in public venues. Why chicken out now?

Concerning Halloween or any other day, we must do what we always do: ignore unjustified rumors and use common sense.

TV's gender battle

By Peter Hackeman
Forum Layout Editor

It was 8 p.m. Tuesday night when the TV lounge was populated entirely by one group of students—men. But there was something else special about this moment—the Yankees, baseball's most followed team, and Michael Jordan, basketball's most loved player, were playing in the World Series and the season opener respectively. Which to watch—what a dilemma?

With very little debate, a sensible solution was reached. We will watch the baseball game and switch to Mike and the "Jordanaires" vs. the Knicks between innings. After rooting for the A's and the Mariner's in the first two rounds, I'm not eager to engage any Yankees fans in debate. Everyone is satisfied and no one feels trampled. I dare say this arrangement is so obvious that it's almost not worth mentioning.

I do mention this only because every Wednesday and Thursday night, that same lounge, like so many others around campus, is filled by large groups of women. The world seems to be put on hold for "Dawson's Creek," "Felicity," "Friends" and "Will & Grace." It doesn't matter if I've been camped out since 4 p.m. to watch Wednesday night hockey night on ESPN. It doesn't matter if the other lounge in Smith has also been taken over and is showing the same programming. Nothing short of a complete monopoly of the television sets is acceptable.

I should clarify that I'm not criticizing these shows or the people who like them. Heck, I wanted to see Ross's reaction to Rachel's pregnancy and the love triangle that is Felicity's life. Woody Harrelson's addition certainly added to the fun of "Will and Grace."

I'm just making an observation about how the two genders handle "must see" TV differently. Who would have thought that the "brutish, football, basketball and baseball watching" guys would be more flexible and agreeable to compromise than our devoted, sit-com addicted females.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

Lockheed Martin wins JSF contract

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

On Friday, Oct. 26, the Pentagon announced the winner of the largest defense contract in America's history. The contract, worth an estimated $200 billion, is for the Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) project. The two competitors for the contract were Lockheed Martin, the nation's largest defense contractor, and Boeing, most notable for their commercial aircraft division.

The contract was awarded to Lockheed for the development of their X-35 multi-role aircraft. Lockheed will produce three separate versions of the jet for the Air Force, Navy, and Marines. The Air Force version will operate like a standard aircraft, taking off and landing from airstrips. The Navy version will be designed to withstand the forces of takeoffs and landings on an aircraft carrier. The marine version will be able to takeoff and land vertically, allowing it to operate from almost anywhere in the world. CNN reported that the Pentagon's general requirements were that the plane be supersonic, stealthy, maneuverable and for the Marine version, have hovering capability.

The planes are expected to enter full production sometime around 2010 when they will replace the Air Force's F-16 and A-10 aircraft as well as earlier versions of the Navy's F/A-18 and AV-8B aircraft. According to the Wall Street Journal, the United States is expected to purchase approximately 2,800 planes with Britain purchasing 150 and another 3,000 expected to go to the international community.

According to The Wall Street Journal, the contract capped an amazing turnaround for the company. Only a few short years ago the company was mired in debt and management problems. By cutting costs, selling non-core business and rebuilding their relationship with the Pentagon, Lockheed managed to turn things around. While the company has emphasized that the contract will not affect earnings until full-scale production begins in 2010, the contract is seen as a major boost for the company. Lockheed estimates that they will hire 5,000 new employees to meet the demand for the new plane.

Lockheed Martin's new X-35 JSF, seen here hovering over the tarmac, beat out Boeing's X-32.

Cost management is essential to the JSF project. According to The Wall Street Journal, each plane is to cost only $35 million dollars, extremely inexpensive by Pentagon standards. If costs begin to rise, the project could come under heavy fire from Congress and the Pentagon. For example, the contract for the F-22 fighter jet, another Lockheed production, began as a $100 billion for 750 planes. The contract now stands at $60 billion with the Pentagon planning to buy less than 300 of the planes.

Although the loss of the JSF project is a huge blow to Boeing, FOX News has reported that the company is better suited to absorb the loss than Lockheed. Despite Boeing competing for defense projects, commercial aircraft still remains the company's largest business despite recent slowdowns in business. Also, Boeing is currently working on defense contracts for items such as unmanned drones, state-of-the-art spy satellites and the Army's RAH-66 Comanche attack helicopter.

The Wall Street Journal has also reported that, though they may have lost the contract, Boeing may still play a major role in the production of the JSF. Congressional representatives from Missouri, headquarters to Boeing's defense division, have already begun drafting legislation that would require the work on the new jet to be split between the two companies. The contract will also benefit suppliers of Lockheed such as Rolls Royce, whose engine powers the Lockheed jet and Raytheon, which provides complex electronic equipment for the cockpit systems.

The Air Force is also in the process of updating part of its fleet of F-15's to the high-tech F-22 Raptor. The goal of the current aircraft replacement program is to retire an aging fleet, and once again place the U.S. Air Force on the cutting edge of aerospace technology, so as to maintain its air superiority.

Conservative Club formed on campus

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

"Free markets, free people, and individual liberty." Such are the principles espoused by the newly formed Conservatives Club, Treasurer Michael Boland '03 said. Formed to present a point of view that otherwise might not be heard on campus, the Club has some ambitious goals.

This semester, the Organization plans to hold weekly meetings, publish a newsletter—"The Counterweight"—and hopes to bring a conservative speaker to campus. Ben Stein's name was the most frequent suggestion at a recent meeting. Members are enthusiastic about publishing their first newsletter before the semester break, planning to include articles of local, national and international importance by both students and established, nationally-known writers.

President Tom Elliot '02, Boland, and member Andrew Findlay '03 all seem to agree on the need for such a club to exist. As Elliot put it the Club would be, "the strongest voice on campus balancing out all the previously unquestioned rhetoric of the faculty and the general conventional wisdom on campus." The Club hopes its speakers will provide a balance with past speakers such as Janet Reno and Ralph Nader. The Club also hopes the departments and organizations that have supported these other speakers will also show support for speakers sponsored primarily by the Conservatives Club. Overall, "the administration has been good" about supporting the Club, says Boland. The members also desire a good working relationship with the departments connected with the Club's areas of interest such as political science, economics and religion.

Though new to the campus, the Organization's members seem well prepared to take on their self-appointed task of bringing diversity to the political thought of the campus. They are eager to publish their newsletter and are excited about the prospect of bringing a speaker to campus. The members face the usual challenges of getting an organization off the ground, but seem dedicated enough to make it work.

The Club is currently recognized by the University, and is in the process of seeking a budget from the appropriations committee. It appears that the Conservatives' Club is already well on their way to "educating the campus from a viewpoint that isn't often taught or expressed" at this University.

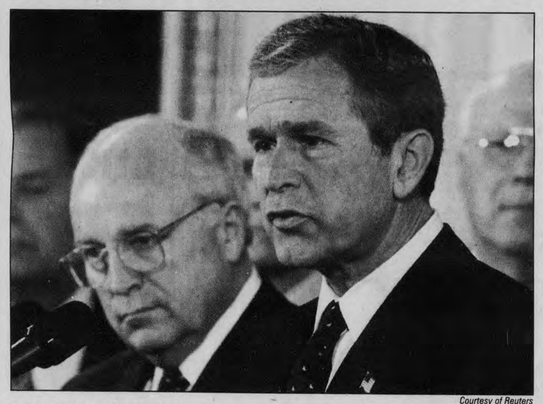
Congress passes anti-terror measures



Courtesy of Reuters

President Bush, flanked by Vice President Cheney, speaks at a ceremony for the signing of anti-terror legislation.

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

In response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Congress has passed one law and is considering another, both of which are intended to prevent future attacks.

The Associated Press has reported that on Friday, President George W. Bush signed H.R. 3162, a sweeping new anti-terrorism bill into law. The law is known as the U.S.A. P.A.T.R.I.O.T. Act, which stands for Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism. It passed in the House of Representatives by a wide margin and in the Senate with only one dissenting vote.

Following Sept. 11, Attorney General John Ashcroft requested the broadening of several government powers that could be used to fight terrorism. The new anti-terrorism legislation expands the FBI's wiretapping and surveillance authority, increases the number of crimes that are considered terrorist acts and the penalties for them and gives police new abilities to secretly search people's homes and business records and to eavesdrop on telephone and computer conversations. It also allows electronic surveillance and search warrants on the Internet. In addition to what the Attorney General asked for, the Senate added provisions related to money laundering.

According to CNN, when word reached the Attorney General that Congress had passed the, he declared that, "A new era in America's fight against terrorism is about to begin," and that he would instruct all law enforcement officers to make use of the new powers as soon as Bush signed the bill.

MSNBC reported that at the bill-signing ceremony, Bush remarked, "Today, we take an essential step in defeating terrorists while protecting the constitutional rights of all Americans." Many critics, however, disagree. Organizations such as the ACLU insists that the new legislation infringes on privacy rights and gives the government a dangerous amount of power. Senator Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), the only Senator to vote against the anti-terror bill, shares those concerns. He said, "This bill does not strike the right balance between empowering law enforcement and protecting civil liberties." Senator Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) disagreed, saying, "I don't know anybody in this country who's afraid of their law enforcement people at this time. They're afraid of terrorism." In response to criticism such as Feingold's, the House included a provision in the anti-terror legislation that makes it expire in four years if Congress does not renew it.

Congress has also been tackling the issue of airline security, according to The Associated Press. On Oct. 11 the Senate passed, by a 100-0 vote, legislation that would put all 28,000 airport screening personnel in the United States on the federal payroll. That measure, S. 1447, is headed for a showdown in the House. There awaits a different bill which has the approval of Bush, House Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Tex.), Secretary of Transportation Norman Y. Mineta and many conservatives. That alternative bill, H.R. 3050, would make supervising screeners a federal responsibility, but would not make the screeners federal employees. According to the alternative bill's proponents, the all-government system of airport screening has not worked in foreign countries such as England and Israel and would not work here.

If the Democratic bill passed by the Senate also passes the House, it will go right to the President's desk. His chief of staff, Andrew Card, has said that while Bush does not like the bill, he will sign it because the present system is "unacceptable." The White House is currently trying to round up support among undecided GOP congressmen for the bill it favors. If the Republican version passes the House, the two bills will be resolved by a Conference Committee, a process which, it appears, would be lengthy.

GM sells Hughes Communications to Echostar for $26B

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

On Sunday night, General Motors (GM) reached a deal to sell their satellite television unit, Hughes Electronics, to Echostar communications. According to CNN, the deal is valued at $26 billion in cash and shares.

Echostar is largely interested in Hughes Direct TV brand name. CNN said that Echostar chief executive Charles Ergen described the deal as "an extremely compelling combination." The deal struck a severe blow to Rupert Murdoch and his goal of making News Corp. a global satellite broadcaster. Murdoch and News Corp. were also engaged in the bidding for the GM subsidiary. The GM board of directors decided to sell the unit to Echostar on Sunday after News Corp. pulled out of the bidding on Saturday.

According to CNN, Murdoch was disappointed that GM could not reach a decision earlier when his was the only offer on the table. However, after reorganizing the financing with UBS Warburg, Echostar was able to ente, a competing bid.

Analysts interviewed by MSNBC also pointed out that the decision to wait was quite a risk for the board to take. If Murdoch withdrew and Echostar could not work out the financing, the company would lose both bidders. Nevertheless, GM President Rick Wagoner chose to wait for the bid from Ergen.

According to CNN, many analysts were surprised that Murdoch would withdraw from a deal a year and a half in the making because he could not wait two days. However, the strategy likely prevented Murdoch and Echostar from being drawn into a bidding war. MSNBC also speculated that the GM decision was at least partially based on a dislike for Murdoch and his business practices.

The announcement of the deal caused News Corp. stock to plummet six percent on the Australian markets. The acquisition of Hughes will increase Echostar's 6.43 million subscribers to more than 16 million. It is expected to produce more than $56 billion in additional revenue and cost savings according to MSNBC.

The deal is likely to face regulatory scrutiny since it will create such a power in the satellite broadcasting industry. Hughes and Echostar executives argue that the real power in video distribution lies with cable companies and that the merger will actually increase competition. If the deal does not make it through the regulatory approval process, News Corp. could reassert itself as a potential bidder for the company.

Rowers complete races over weekend in Philly

By Maggie Cook
Staff Writer

The crew team traveled Saturday to Philadelphia to compete in the "Head of the Schuylkill" Regatta. Despite the cold and breezy weather, the sun came out and the atmosphere remained full of excitement as multitudes of crews from across the east-coast gathered to race the 2.6-mile course.

This regatta was a terrific opportunity for the novice rowers to gain a full appreciation for the racing experience, as it was their first competition off.

"The Head of the Schuylkill" is one of the most significant races of the fall racing season and the Bison were very well represented.

Not only did eight boats participate in six different events, but also racing in Saturday's regatta were various Bison alumni who have joined community rowing clubs in the Boston and Philadelphia areas.

Head Coach Derek Updegraff competed in the Men's Championship Single with a time of 17:48 and former crew coach Ann Shapiro competed in the Women's Masters Single with a time of 21:34.

Rowing in the Men's Double event, Michael Brooks-Williams '03 and Jeff Dasch '03 finished ninth out of the 13 crews in their category, making their finishing strokes at Boathouse Row with a time of 17:15.

In the Men's Varsity Eight, the Bison finished 24th out of 41 crews with a time of 15:04. In Men's Novice Nine, the freshmen rowers finished 30th out of 46, with a time of 15:46. Paulo Paligod coxed the all-freshman boat of Andrew Maddux, Ilya Bondarenko, Steven Patak, Michael Mathes, Daniel Foster, Chad Weidemann, Robert Bentinck-Smith and Joseph Tucci.

The Bison had three boats competing in the 48 boat field in the Women's Novice Eight event. The top two Bison boats of freshman women raced very closely down the 2.6 mile course, with the first boat finishing in 20th place with a time of 18:09 and the second Novice Eight just behind in 30th place with a time of 18:11. For its first major collegiate regatta, the third Novice Women's Eight posted strong results finishing 41st in the event with a time of 18:46.

The varsity women competed in the Women's Four event and the Women's Lightweight Eight event. The Women's Four of rowers Rebecca Newman '04, Lynn Hootman '04, Joan Wendler '04, Katharine Boschen '04 and coxswain Cristina Meng '04 placed 16th out of 37 teams with a time of 18:02. The Women's Lightweight Eight had some harrowing adventures making it to the starting line on time, but made it to the race and finished the course in a time of 17:07.

The Women's Lightweight Eight is led by sophomore coxswain Nicole Tomlin as well as sophomores Jill Harrington and Captain Emily Smith '02.

Saturday and Sunday the inaugural Puddle-Jumper Regatta will be hosted by the crew team, an inter-team challenge presented to the men's and women's varsity and novice squads to encourage team bonding and a little friendly rivalry.

Nov. 10 and 11 the men's and women's crew teams will conclude their fall facing season as they travel to Philadelphia to compete in the Philadelphia Frostbite Regatta and the Bill Braxton Memorial Regatta.

Holy Cross prevails in OT to end Bison playoff hopes

1-0 defeat eliminates Bison but team defeats Binghamton 4-0

By Tara Uchtel
Staff Writer

Patriot League foe Holy Cross scored a goal 4:20 into overtime to defeat the Bison 1-0 Sunday, eliminating the team from playoff contention.

"It was a good battle. It was anyone's game. We just had one lapse and they capitalized," Andy Aurand '02 said.

"I thought the HC game was basically a stalemate," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "Neither team really had many chances to score."

On a more positive note, the Bison defeated Binghamton 4-0 Saturday.

Aurand scored his first two goals of the season to start the Bison's scoring frenzy. His first goal came at 21:38 into the game off a cross from senior teammate Nate Hopfinger. Seven minutes later Aurand rifled a direct kick passed Holy Cross' keeper.

The Bison refused to settle for just two goals. Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 earned his third goal of the season 2:44, with Dennis Deluca '05 and Brian Johnson '03 picking up the assists. The second half was dominated by play from Bison non-traditional starters, as freshman John Hemmert scored the first goal of his career to put the Bison ahead 4-0.

"Against Binghamton, our starters played 25 minutes," Nash said. "We needed to rest them for the PL game. I asked the bench to carry us through Saturday and they did a great job picking up the 4-0 victory. It was a good chance for some players who have played very few minutes to get their chance. They all did well."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Mark Mascarenhas '04 fends of his opponent.

"Everyone showed up to play on Saturday and the guys who logged a lot of minutes did a great job. They got the job done for us," Aurand said.

The Bison had been playing a zone defense for the past few weeks opposed to a man-to-man defense. According to Nash, this is the reason why the team has not been scoring often.

"Both games were the type of efforts we needed in September. Since we have moved to a zone defense we have given up very few goals. When you go zone you are more defensive minded. Therefore, it puts more of a burden on the forwards to create chances and finish the few chances you can create. We have not done a very good job of creating or finishing our chances," he said.

The men fell to 5-9-1 overall and 0-4-1 in the league. Mathematically, it is impossible for them to advance to postseason play. But even though the playoffs are out of the picture, the Bison still have more big games remaining on their schedule.

"We're playing for pride now. We're looking to end the season on positive note by winning our last three games," Aurand said.

"The week ended our chances of the League tournament, but we still have quite a bit to play for. Pittsburgh is a Big East team and they beat us 5-1 last year. I would think the guys are looking for a little payback. Navy is still trying to get into the playoffs, so we can play the spoiler over the weekend. We also need to think about the future of the program and keep working for the winning mentality," Nash said.

The Bison traveled to Pittsburgh for a Halloween night game Wednesday and compete against Navy and Army the first week of November.

Field hockey seniors bid farewell to playing days as season closes

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer.

Someone once said, "Snowflakes are one of nature's most fragile things, but just look what they can do when they stick together." No remark portrays the members of the senior class field hockey team better. For four years, these women have dedicated themselves to their sport and their team.

"When this group first came to our program in the fall of 1998, I clearly remember my upperclassmen at the time commenting on how 'intense' they were ... how they just loved to compete and get after it," Coach Heather Lewis said. "This class, as a whole, redefined our expectations of 'work ethic' and elevated our annual goals and expectations. They were winners and that's what they wanted; the fact that they'll leave this program as its most successful class ever is indicative of their determination and commitment."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Freshman Meiko Boynton (6) and other underclassmen will be without the 10 departing seniors after this season's closing match versus American.

Tri-Captain Lauren Campbell '02, can be labeled as the prime example of a selfless team player. She will leave the Bison program as one of the premier defenders in Bucknell history.

She is a fierce competitor and sets a high standard for herself and her teammates. She truly leads by example.

"If she has left an ounce of her competitive fire with the underclassmen then this program will continue to prosper for years to come," Lewis said.

Larissa Carso '02 is the face of determination and commitment. She is a hard worker and is constantly pushing to improve herself. According to Lewis, "Larissa is a competitor and faces adversity with such class and courage."

Tri-Captain Dena Ebert '02, will leave the school as one of the most productive offensive players that it has ever had. Dena ranks fifth in overall career best points (72) and fourth in career goals (32).

"She has been so passionate and committed to excellence not only for herself but for the entire program. It will be quite some time before another athlete comes through this program with the commitment that Dena has displayed," Lewis said.

Meghan Hopping '02 has been the emotional "rock" of the field hockey program. She has made it her mission to make sure that her teammates are mentally and emotionally charged for each game. Her innate sense of humor always appears when the team needs it the most.

Tri-Captain Annie Hunsicker '02 has been a steady and consistent player for the Bison over the past four years. She is known to take advantage of the opportunities presented to her.

"I think the conclusion of Saturday's game, when Annie knocked in the game-winning goal with 21 seconds remaining epitomizes Annie as an athlete," Lewis said. To watch her score that goal and to go out the way she did is a very fitting and well deserved ending to her four-year career."

Known as "M" to her coach and her teammates, Melissa Maher '02 is probably one of the purest goal-scorers to ever play for the Bison. Whether it was sacrificing her body or laying out on the ground to knock in a deflection, Melissa was able to get the ball in the goal. She leaves the team ranked in the top 10 for career points (59) and ranked seventh for career goals (25).

Monica McCorry '02 has started every game in her four-year career.

"She is the purest, most natural defender I have ever coached and is certainly deserving of all post-season honors she has received. For four seasons I haven't had to worry about who's going to anchor the defensive unit ... it's always been Monica. It won't be until next August when we start pre-season that I'll truly appreciate how much I took her for granted," Lewis said.

When asked about Erin Plasteras '02, Lewis could only describe her as "a coach's dream."

"Without a doubt, whenever someone needed a listening ear, helpful advice or a shoulder to lean on, Erin was there. It was never about Erin ... it was about what Erin could do for her teammates," Lewis said.

Mel Rhoads '02 is looked to by her teammates as an example of courage and selflessness. She has been a valuable mentor to her teammates, especially to fellow goalie Sonja Wettergreen.

"What I'll always remember about Mel," Lewis said, "is that every single

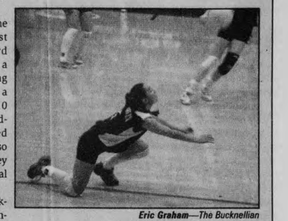
American and Navy defeat volleyball team

By Patrick Evans
Senior Writer

The advantage of playing in Davis Gym was not enough to end the Bison's recent losing skid. Saturday, Navy used a strong blocking scheme to knock off the Orange and Blue 3-1 (30-23, 10-30, 30-28, 30-28). The following day, League favorite American dominated throughout, sweeping the Bison 3-0 (30-18, 30-16, 30-22).

After losing the first set against Navy, the Herd came back with a vengeance, taking the second with a convincing 30-10 win. But the Midshipmen proved that they were also resilient when they took the two final and deciding sets.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Brandi Trapasso '04 stretches to return a shot.

Shannon Walker '02 tallied match-highs 14 kills and four blocks in the loss.

"We wanted it, but we weren't able to produce that on the court, and that was the problem," Walker said.

For Brandi Trapasso '04 it was another consistent performance. In her ninth "double-double" of the season she recorded 10 kills and 13 digs in the loss.

"We could see that we were the better team with the way we played the second set," Trapasso said. "But at the end we just couldn't put it together."

The Midshipmen's success was in part due to their ability to put a damper on the Bison's strong offensive attack. With their strongest hitters being denied in crucial points in the game, the Bison were forced to answer and couldn't.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Home court advantage wasn't enough to help the Bison sink American and Navy.

"They did an excellent job blocking us, and I think that may have frustrated us," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said.

The Bison would be forced to deal with an even stronger all-around team when playing American. The Eagles came into Davis Gym with 13 straight wins under their belt and an undefeated Patriot League record.

"They're bigger girls with a lot more experience, but we matched up pretty well," Trapasso said. "I think it may have been a mental thing."

If nothing else the match served as a good learning experience for the Bison who still have a good chance of making the League playoffs where they will have to face American again.

"I think we've picked up on their weaknesses and we've learned that they're beatable," Walker said. "We just need to play our best and we can do it."

The Bison have been put in a position where they'll have to change some of their original goals in order to be successful. The defending Patriot League champions wanted to play the tournament at home like they were able to last year, but American already took that away from them by clinching it early in the season. Now the Bison will have to win at least two of the remaining three League games if they want a chance at making the playoffs and taking down the host of this year's tournament.

"We can't lose any, or we'll be out of it," Trapasso said. "We just want to make the top four so that we'll have a shot in the playoffs."

The American loss dropped the Bison's record to 10-9 overall and 6-5 in League play. Holy Cross, a team that was able to give the Bison their first home loss earlier in the season, is the next challenge. But Opalski isn't so much concerned with who the team is playing as much as its own development.

"Right now we just need to eliminate our own mistakes and unforced errors," she said. "If we can do that, we'll be able to get our momentum back."

The older players on the Bison are certainly familiar with having to win when it counts. Last year they won all of their remaining League games to ensure home court advantage throughout the tournament. While the objective has changed, the Bison believe that their attitude has not.

"Our goal is to get in and ultimately to win it," Walker said. "We know that if we focus we can win the remaining games and get it done.

'86 World Series still a classic baseball moment

By Cecily Cairns
Staff Writer

I've often heard people claim that baseball is a boring sport. It's too slow—it takes forever, they claim. What they fail to understand is that the beauty of baseball lies in its apparent endlessness. You can never run out of time in a baseball game—you can only run out of chances. As long as there's one out left, as long as there's one strike left in the count, there still remains a miniscule inkling of hope, a prayer for salvation.

Fifteen years ago, that one strike was profound enough to define an entire postseason. The playoffs were never so intense, so unpredictable and so resonant as they were in 1986.

The aftermath ran the whole spectrum of emotion, from Donnie Moore's agony to New York's elation. The range of that spectrum was epitomized by a single pitch, a single play in Game Six of the World Series, which would end up being the culmination of a postseason loaded with drama. It would also personify two teams.

For the Boston Red Sox and the New York Mets, it was just another moment on the brink. In the grand tradition of Red Sox history, Boston was on the brink of reaching what had for so long been an unattainable grail. One pitch could erase, or at least weaken the scars left behind from Johnny Pesky's lethargic throw, from an Impossible Dream that turned out to be a bit too impossible, from nearly 70 years of not quite being able to close the deal.

Bill Buckner makes the now-infamous game-losing error for the Red Sox in Game Six of the 1986 World Series.

A charter American League team with a glorious history, the lovable Red Sox became synonymous with futility.

The Mets, true to their perpetual overachieving character, were on the brink of elimination, yet still clinging to some remnant of hope, waiting for a miracle to sweep by and carry them to the top. Born into the shadow of the domineering New York Yankees, the Mets had to find a way into the spotlight in a less traditional manner, and they had to do it with a lot of tenacity.

In 1962, they debuted with a big splash, losing an astounding 120 games in one season. Richie Ashburn subsequently retired, citing that he would rather not play at all than play for a team like the Mets. But the rest of the franchise wasn't fazed. As history would later reveal, it would take a lot more than that to discourage the Mets.

The team would become historically synonymous with fortitude as well as flamboyance. From Jimmy Piersall's backwards home run trot to screwballer Tug McGraw's oft-quoted declaration "You gotta believe," the Mets never needed a star-studded roster to make headlines and win over hearts.

They earned the tag "Miracle Mets" in 1969, when they shocked the heavily-favored Baltimore Orioles to win a World Series Championship. They backed it up in 1973 by coming within a game of slaying the three-peating Athletics. And in 1986, they put an exclamation point on it.

The NLCS pitted them against an Astros team that included Cy Young winner Mike Scott, who would render the Mets helpless. The Mets, of course, didn't let it discourage them; in between the games Scott pitched, they managed to gain a 3-2 advantage in the Series. Scott was scheduled to pin them down again in the seventh game, and that became more likely when the Mets fell behind 3-0 in Game Six. But the New Yorkers weren't finished yet. They weren't anywhere near finished. Sixteen innings later, Jesse Orosco struck out Kevin Bass, and the Mets didn't have to worry about facing Mike Scott again—they were headed to the World Series.

There they'd meet the Red Sox, who won an equally miraculous ALCS over the cursed California Angels. Boston had already been on the brink of postseason extinction when Donnie Moore got within a strike of ending a Series-decided Game Five. Moore slung a forkball over the plate with his aching, Cortisone-loaded shoulder and watched it disappear into the left field stands. That home run knocked the wind out of the Angels and they never caught their breath.

And so the script was cast for the 1986 World Series. The indefatigable underdogs versus the hard luck underachievers. One would expect it to be anticlimactic, but it was only a continuation of the tumultuous nature of the LCS.

Twice in '86, a groundball was as good as a home run. The first one worked against the Mets, costing them Game One by a score of 1-0. Game Two wasn't quite so tight, as the Red Sox blew away the Mets, heading back to Boston with a two-games-to-zip lead over the Mets.

It looked like curtains for the Miracle Mets, but Tug McGraw's manifesto must have been sifting around on the Fenway winds, because the Mets came to life in the next two games, thumping the Red Sox 7-1 and 6-2, respectively.

The Red Sox answered with a four-run onslaught on Doc Gooden in Game Five, and took command again in Game Six.

Trailing 5-3 in the ninth, the Mets looked helpless again. Two outs later, it looked even worse. The scoreboard even declared the Red Sox World Champions. With a strike left, they scratched out one run off of Ray Knight's 0-2 single. After a pitching change, they found themselves one strike from elimination again. One wild pitch later, they had it tied, and were only one strike away from extra innings.

For the Red Sox, it was just another rendezvous on heaven's doorstep. The Mets never did succumb to that last strike.

Bill Buckner, of course, would commit the most infamous blooper in sports history, Ray Knight would bounce over home plate and just like that, the Mets had done it again.

Just as Dave Henderson's homer had knocked the wind out of the Angels, Mookie Wilson's lucky bouncer down the first base line simply disheartened the Red Sox. The Mets romped in Game Seven, closing the book on a Series that was clearly scripted by fate.

Fifteen years later, it's still just as hard to fathom. The always-unwavering Red Sox fans don't want to believe it. Mike Scott is still waiting to pitch that seventh game. Donnie Moore committed suicide twelve years ago. Bill Buckner wishes he wasn't a household name.

And the Miracle Mets, well, they still live by three simple words:

"You gotta believe".

Damn straight, Tug.

NBA rookies taking form

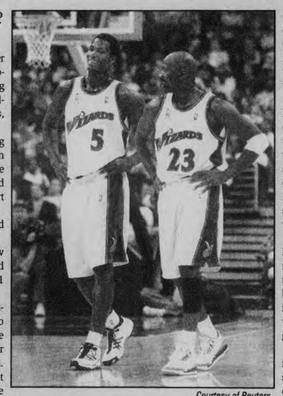
By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

The NBA is now younger than ever and this fact is supported by this year's incoming rookie class. The draft included five high school phenoms, a modern-day record.

With the NBA depending on guessing talent rather than picking proven collegians, the sport only gets younger and younger and luck is now part of the process.

So who will be a stud and who will be a dud?

These rankings show which 20 rookies one should keep an eye on during the 2001 NBA campaign:



Courtesy of Reuters

Wizards rookie Kwame Brown and Michael Jordan should make a formidable duo in years to come.

1. Kwame Brown, Wizards—A 6'11" man child who is as smooth as they come. He owns a nice mid range jumper and can handle the ball well. Playing alongside MJ won't hurt either. He'll share the power forward spot with Christian Laettner for the time being but he'll be a regular in no time. A future star.

2. Eddie Griffin, Rockets —A load of potential that fits nicely into Houston's scheme. Could dispell the often injured Maurice Taylor at PF and get good playing time. A very athletic rebounder who can also score and block. A potential franchise player.

3. Jason Richardson, Warriors—The team moved Larry Hughes to point guard so he could play. "Hops" is one word to describe his game. His jumper is rapidly improving as well. He'll play a lot this year. Watch out.

4. Shane Battier, Grizzlies —Four years of college experience gives him a ticket to start for Memphis. He should play lots of minutes at SF. No flash but gets the job done. Consummate team player and a very hard worker.

5. Joe Johnson, Celtics—Will be sandwiched between Antoine Walker and Paul Pierce. Is athletic and can do a little bit of everything. Could be a really good one.

6. Eddy Curry, Bulls—Chicago center of the future. "Baby Shaq" won't dominate this year, but will get lots of playing time. Will learn this year but will become one of better centers in the league in the near future.

7. Rodney White, Pistons—A scorer who'll get his chances this year while sharing the SF spot with Corliss Williamson. Must improve his defense but will develop into a nice player for Detroit. Might be the biggest draft night steal.

8. Richard Jefferson, Nets—Impressed coaches during preseason. Athletic small forward and is an excellent defender. Will get his minutes.

9. Jamaal Tinsley, Pacers—Indiana starter after being 27th player chosen in the draft. Will get a lot of point guard minutes for Coach Isiah Thomas. Excellent distributor and defender will help team's improvement.

10. Pau Gasol, Grizzlies—Third player chosen will be given some playing time. Can score and hit shots but is lacking in bulk. Will probably struggle this year but should be solid down the road.

11. Troy Murphy, Warriors—Sound power forward will get his points when he's in there. Can play inside or outside. Defense is the key though.

12. Kedrick Brown, Celtics—Highest junior college player ever drafted, has some ability. Game is compared to teammate Walker and could factor in this year. Potential is there.

13. Tyson Chandler, Bulls— Would be a lot higher but is destined to struggle this year. Needs to add bulk to skinny frame. Awesome shot-blocker who will be one of the best in the future. Not much this year but in some time, never drive in when he's there.

14. Michael Bradley, Raptors —Might not play much with Antonio Davis at the four-spot but will put the ball in the hoop. Led nation in FG percentage at Villanova. Dependable shot will give him playing time.

15. Vladimir Radmanovic, Sonics—This kid can shoot. Not too much muscle on his body so he might struggle. Performed well during preseason camps and games. Give him an open shot and it's automatic.

16. Zach Randolph, Blazers—Big man likely won't play much in talented rich Portland but will produce when asked. Can be a very solid pro once he plays regularly.

17. Loren Woods, Timberwolves—Picked very low in the draft after a lackluster senior year. Once was the best big man in college. Could help bolster the frontcourt and center position with Dean Garrett and Radoslav Nesterovic not always being dependable. Tremendous shot blocker.

19. Brendan Haywood, Wizards—Will start on the injured list but will contribute once he plays. Huge body.

20. DeSagana Diop, Cavaliers—HUGE teenager will play once he gets healthy. Eighteen year-old is 7'0", 315 lbs. Key is staying healthy.

'Canes storm to top of BCS

By Rob Schmicker
Staff Writer

It didn't take long for the Bowl Championship Series to be turned upside down. A week after the first standings were released, college football had its finest weekend of the year as six games featured two nationally ranked opponents. The biggest game of the day saw No. 1 Oklahoma face off against No. 2 Nebraska in an epic clash of the titans. If their rivalry wasn't big enough to begin with, the two schools now had even more on the line as someone was going to be knocked out of the national title picture.

As defending National Champions, Oklahoma has had a bulls-eye on its back all year. Repeating would be tough—repeating with a new quarterback would be even tougher. While Nate Hybl is no Josh Heipel, he did lead the Sooners to a 6-0 start before being benched in favor of sophomore Jason White. Against Nebraska, both White and Hybl saw action, and neither was impressive. In fact, both quarterbacks were knocked out of the game, and yet the Sooners were tied 10-10 at halftime thanks to a gritty defensive performance led by Rocky Calmus.

But down 13-10 in the fourth quarter, the daunted Oklahoma defense committed a rare mistake. After stopping QB Eric Crouch on third and two, it seemed as if Oklahoma would get the ball back. But a face mask penalty gave Nebraska new life and a first down. A few plays later, Nebraska used some trickery resulting in a 63-yard touchdown pass to Crouch. The play started with Crouch handing the ball to wingback Thunder Collins, who was in motion from the left. Collins then pitched the ball to Mark Stuntz, who was running a reverse. Instead of turning upfield, Stuntz threw the ball to a wide open Crouch for the decisive touchdown.

As defending National Champions, Oklahoma has had a bulls-eye on its back all year.

With the win, Nebraska is now the frontrunner for a Rose Bowl birth, but will have Oklahoma wanting revenge in the Big 12 Championship Game. With the Oklahoma loss, No. 3 UCLA looked to move up in the rankings against the suddenly hot Stanford Cardinal. But it was not the Bruins day as Stanford jumped out early and never looked back, in a 38-28 upset win. Oregon then avenged its loss to Stanford with a 24-17 victory over previously undefeated Washington State. The Ducks were not impressed by the Pac-10's Cinderella story, as Heismann candidate Joey Harrington had an easy day thanks to RB Onterro Smith, who rushed for 285 yards in the win.

Stanford's win wasn't only good news for Miami (who beat West Virginia 45-3 Thursday night), but for several other teams as well. But before they could celebrate, all were in danger of joining Oklahoma and UCLA in the loss column.

The upset bug first appeared in Blacksburg, Va., where No. 5 Virginia Tech lost to Syracuse. Whether it was the snow or just the Orangemen, the Hokies looked flat all day in a 20-14 loss. We should have all seen this coming though, as Virginia Tech first loss Michael Vick to the NFL and then All-American RB Lee Suggs to a knee injury. No team, no matter how talented they are, can overcome the loss of two key players like Vick and Suggs and it finally caught up to Virginia Tech.

In the Big Ten, Michigan fought off Iowa 32-26 to move up to fourth in the standings. And in the ACC, Florida State scored 21 straight second quarter points to knock previously undefeated Maryland out of the title picture.

And if this wasn't enough excitement, the SEC also had two huge games. Coming into the day, the SEC East had a four-way tie for first place. But after the day was done with, only two teams remained on top. In the early game, No. 15

Baltimore (4-3) at Pittsburgh (5-1)

Pittsburgh hasn't played this well since the '70s, and they are one of the hottest teams in the league right now. They have won five in a row and I would just like to say to all the Stewart doubters, "I told you so!" Granted, he isn't putting up Montana-like numbers, but the Steelers don't need that from him; they just need him to avoid making turnovers. Baltimore, on the other hand, barely snuck by its other division rival, Jacksonville, winning by a single point. They won't have such luck against the Steelers in the 'Burgh. Steelers win this match up of the top two defenses in the NFL.

Denver (4-3) at Oakland (5-1)

This is one of the best rivalries in the AFC. Griese and the Broncos have been disappointing this year. This game is a must win for them, they cannot afford to fall that far back behind the division-leading Raiders. Oakland has a fairly competent defense, which compliments Gannon and the offense. In the end, Oakland will go as far as the underrated Gannon can carry them. Oakland wins, and by doing so all but knocks the Broncos out of contention to win the division.

New York Jets (4-3) at New Orleans (4-2)

The Saints are coming off their biggest win of the season and look to carry that momentum into next week. Both teams depend on the run to win, and the Jets right now have the top rusher in the NFL in Curtis Martin. Martin will be running against the second best run-defense in the NFC, however. The AFC East is wide open right now, but if the Jets hope to make a move, Testaverde needs to step it up. The Saints.

Cleveland (4-2) at Chicago (5-1)

These two teams were expected to be two of the worst when the season began. But Chicago has one of the top defenses in the league, something especially important with starting QB Jim Miller unable to play. The Browns will win as many games as Tim Couch can win for them. The key for Cleveland will be to protect Couch from a dominating defense. Chicago gets the win, because the kid across the hall from me is a Bears fan ... and he is a lot bigger than I am.

Tampa Bay (3-3) at Green Bay (4-2)

Tampa Bay is coming off a huge win over Minnesota that basically kept their season alive. Best of all for the Bucs, their offense made their presence felt, to go along with their overpowering defense. The bad news for the Bucs is that Warrick Dunn (RB), Jacquez Green (WR) and Keyshawn Johnson (WR) are all questionable for the game. If the Bucs are fully recovered then they'll win. Otherwise, give Favre the benefit of the doubt. Packers in a nail-biter.

Baltimore (4-3) at Pittsburgh (5-1)

I rooted against the Steelers last week and I got burnt. Burnt bad. So as they say, once bitten twice shy. I bow before the awesome might that is "The Bus." And Kordell ... well, I rank you among the greats: Charlie Batch, Tony Banks and Ryan Leaf. You and quarterbacks like you are those kids that sit next to us in our classes who don't do any work in the class and still get straight As. You certainly aren't a good quarterback, yet for some reason you're getting paid a lot of money. I could dress a tackling dummy up in a uniform and he'd still be better than you.

Denver (4-3) at Oakland (5-1)

Rich Gannon is the most overrated underrated quarterback. If he is so underrated then why is it that every week I hear people singing his praises? Sounds to me like he's evening out on the ole rating scale. Besides, it's not difficult to throw passes to Jerry Rice and Tim Brown. If the ball doesn't get caught in their wrinkles, they can always have their orderlies catch the ball, peel off the skin, mash the ball up into a pasty goo and spoon feed them.

New York Jets (4-3) at New Orleans (4-2)

I'm a Jets fan, but this team hasn't been the same since Bill Parcells left. Remember Parcells? He was like Santa Claus on Peyote. That guy made Marilyn Manson look like Greg Brady. But New Orleans has Ricky Williams, the "Rastafarian Wonder." What's with the dread locks? Maybe this is just yuppy white boy talking, but if you're not Bob Marley or a pasty white skateboarder with no future, then you shouldn't be wearing dreads.

Cleveland (4-2) at Chicago (5-1)

Tim Couch has to be Peyton Manning's identical brother. Have you ever seen a picture of these guys standing next to each other? Frightening. Maybe that's why Cleveland is doing so well and the Colts are stinking it up, Tim Couch and Peytom Manning traded places and both had concussions and now they don't realize they're playing for the wrong teams. But Tim Couch is doing things no one thought possible ... making beautiful mashed potato sculptures. Last week he completed his work on a project he called "Gravy Bunny." It can be seen in the Museum of Modern Art in New York.

Tampa Bay (3-3) at Green Bay (4-2)

Ha, I just thought of a really crappy pun. Are you ready? Tampa Bay and Green Bay play a game of "Bays"-ball. Haha. And for all those who want to punch me right now, don't worry, I just did. Oh wait, I just thought of another one. A football is made of Pigskin, so if you wanted to, you could consider this game the "Bay of Pigskin." Oh man, where's J.F.K. when you need him. I gotta stop.

Athlete of the Week: Jess Brinson

Running back Jess Brinson '04

Take the word Bison. Add a couple letters and you get Brinson. Take the amount of yards that running back Jess Brinson '04 rushed for against Georgetown. Add 13 and you get his rushing total for last year.

Last year as a freshman Brinson didn't see much of the field. Despite earning a varsity letter, the strong running backs ahead of him prevented him from proving what he was capable of in game situations. The Georgetown game gave him that opportunity and he took full advantage of it.

Brinson was a huge factor in the Orange and Blue's 34-0 destruction of the Hoyas in Christy-Mathewson Memorial Stadium on Homecoming Day. He ran for 164 yards, scored a touchdown and caught a 21-yard pass.

The improved sophomore gave credit to his line, which enabled him to run for over 100 yards for the first time in his career.

"Last year the Georgetown players had some things to say to the line," he said. "This year they took it personally."

With 8:17 left in the second quarter, Brinson put the final dagger in the Hoyas' hearts with a 53-yard sprint around left end for the score.

"I like when there's a crowd," he said. "It gets me up for the game when I can play to them."

Brinson was playing in place of Jabu Powell '02 who was out with hurt ribs.

On hand were 8,050 fans to see that the Bison would continue to have a solid run game even without their starter.

The team is now 5-2 overall and 3-1 in Patriot League play. Head Coach Tom Gadd is pleased with how Brinson and the squad have started off.

"We think we have a good chance to be in the hunt for the Patriot League title at the end of the season," Gadd said. "The next couple weeks are going to be critical as we try to place ourselves into a position to win a championship."

Last week, the Bison faced Fordham in hopes of repeating their peak performance on Homecoming Day. The Herd fell 17-12 despite having almost twice the amount of total yards than the Rams. Brinson caught four passes for 49 yards in the game.

"We came out flat," he said. "So the focus of this week is finishing the game, and playing harder and faster from the start."

Brinson and the Bison take on Holy Cross this Saturday in Christy-Mathewson at 12:30 p.m.

Men's polo goes 1-3 at ECAC

By Scott Kloss
Staff Writer

On the road again this past weekend, the men's water polo team traveled to Harvard to compete in the ECAC tournament Oct. 28-29.

The squad took on No. 13 UMass to open the weekend. Despite strong defensive play, including eight steals, the Bison fell 12-4.

Dan Lonnerdale '03 and James Danforth '05 each put two goals in the cage and Danforth added an assist. Goalie Ernest Martin '05, who played the last three minutes of the game, accounted for three steals as well as three saves.

Taking on Brown in the second game of the day, the Bison fell 8-3. Scoring for the Orange and Blue were Ryan McCarty '02, Adam Yerkes '03 and Scott Afzal '04, with one goal each. Goalie Dave Kennedy '02 played the entire game and made 12 saves.

"It has been an up and down couple of weeks with the team," Head Coach John Zeigler said. "We've been struggling to find the consistency necessary to win the games we should and to challenge to win the games where we are the underdogs."

The Bison faced George Washington on Sunday morning. A loss would mean elimination from the tournament, and the squad rallied to defeat GW 10-5.

Jamie Saettele '04 and Chris Saxton '03 each posted three goals with Saettele also handing out two assists and going 4-4 in the sprinting category.

"I am optimistic that as we prepare for the Southern Championships we are in a position to challenge for the top finish."
—Head Coach John Zeigler

Eliot Benoist '05 and Danforth also played solid games for the Orange and Blue. Benoist added a goal and contributed four assists while Danforth had a goal and a team-high six steals. In goal, Kennedy made 11 saves and three steals.

"We rebounded a bit on Sunday against GW and were happy with that game," Benoist said. "The last two times we've played them it has been a one-goal game, but we came out and really put the game away in the first half."

Playing for seventh place in the tournament, the Bison faced a familiar foe in Johns Hopkins Sunday afternoon. The squad struggled offensively in the first half, missing 12 shots and only putting one in the cage. Despite a three-goal fourth quarter performance by Benoist, the Orange and Blue fell 11-6. Also scoring for the Bison were McCarty with two goals and freshman Aaron Platshon with one.

"The team was tired after such a long weekend and we played like it against Hopkins," Benoist said. "We were also struggling defensively without one of our best defenders, Dan Lonnerdal." Lonnerdale was out with a knee injury after the first game.

Despite a tough weekend, both Zeigler and his players remain positive about what they can do in the coming weeks.

"I am optimistic that as we prepare for the Southern Championships we are in a position to challenge for the top finish," Zeigler said. "We need to step it up offensively and play consistent defense to compete the way we should at the Championships."

The team's record stands at 9-14 overall and they will compete next in the Southern Division Championship on Nov. 2-4 at the Naval Academy.

Mundine stuns America with offensive Sept. 11 comments

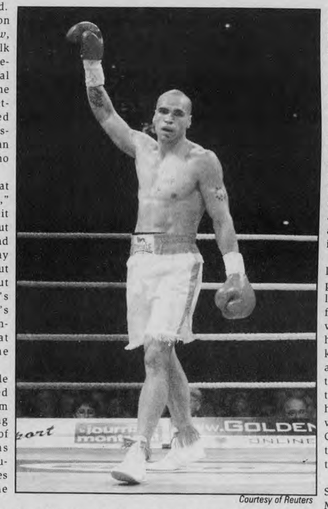
By Scott Kloss
Senior Writer

Ever heard of an Aussie boxer by the name of Anthony Mundine? Neither did I until a week ago, when he made the biggest mistake of his professional career on Oct. 22. And no, I don't mean he missed a "jab" or showed up late for a bout—I mean he shocked the world.

In an interview on The Ray Martin Show, a popular daytime talk show, Tony made a series of controversial remarks regarding the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the United States and what Australia should do in an effort to aid those who suffered.

"I really feel that it's not our problem," he said. "They call it an act of terrorism but if you can understand religion and our way of life, it's not about terrorism. It's about fighting for God's laws, and America's brought it upon themselves [for] what they've done in the history of time."

Those unbelievable words have sparked international alarm and sent the boxing world into a whirl of disbelief. Reactions were strong and voluminous as the quotes filtered down to the general public.



Courtesy of Reuters

Australian boxer Anthony Mundine outraged much of the world with several controversial comments issued on an Australian talk show concerning the Sept. 11 attacks.

World Boxing Council (WBC) and World Boxing Association Junior Welterweight Champion Kostya Tszyu spoke out angrily against countryman Anthony "The Man" Mundine's comments.

"What he said was wrong." This was not just a terrorist act against America but all human beings. What Anthony Mundine said was wrong, completely wrong. It is beyond understanding how he could say these things. This was a tragedy for all people of all nationalities. Nationalities mean nothing at all. Look at us sitting here in this group. How many different nationalities are sitting right here and we're talking and we're not having any problems," said Tszyu.

Even Mundine's father, legendary Australian boxer Tony Mundine (who still holds the country's record for 66 knockout wins in a 96 bout career), has joined the fray since his son's disastrous comments live on national television Monday.

"My son has a bloody big mouth," Mundine said. "He has had a terrific career which he has quite possibly ruined by saying the things he did. He apologized but he will be forever associated with saying these things. He should never have said them and I am furious he would even think this way. I have told him so, too."

World Boxing Council was next in its criticism, denouncing the action of one of its boxers.

"The World Boxing Council read with stupefaction the statements made recently by Anthony Mundine justifying the terrorist attacks and the consequen; deaths of so many innocent victims that occurred on 11 September in New York. The WBC will not tolerate the utilization of a position in boxing to make such absurd and denigrating public statements," said WBC President Jose Sulaiman.

As a result, WBC has stripped the ranking of the Australian middleweight (he was ranked 26 in the super middleweight division). It cited the organization's constitution, which allows fighters to be penalized for any act that "tends to bring disrepute upon the WBC, its officers or the sport of boxing as its basis for action."

On the other hand, Mundine is currently still ranked 14th by the International Boxing Federation (IBF) and is scheduled to fight for the IBF title Dec. 1 against Sven Ottke. IBF president Marian Muhammad said her organization would not take action against Mundine, at least for the time being.

Mundine, an Australian Aborigine who reportedly became a Muslim to model himself on former World Heavyweight Champion Muhammad Ali, was known as a professional rugby player in Australia before switching to boxing. In the ring, he has a record of 10-0 with eight knockouts. Only one of his bouts took place outside Australia.

The day after his Sept. 11 comments, Mundine issued a response to the public's uneasiness.

"I condemn killings on any side and all acts of terrorism. I am against any form or any shape of violence or killing. My heart and soul goes out to those families who lost loved ones in New York.

But is this the real Mundine, or just a politically correct plea? No one except Mundine knows for certain.

Mundine is scheduled to fight the IBF Super-Middleweight Champion Sven Ottke at Dortmund, in Germany, on Dec. 1.

IBF officials said that title fight would go ahead as scheduled, but they reserved the right to strip Mundine of the title at a later date, should he win it, if he repeated his controversial statements.

When I was 12, way back in '93, I went out to Chicago to see my relatives. It was June. The Bulls were in the finals, for the third straight year. Michael Jordan kept millions of fans on the edge of their seats and the country was merely a year away from O.J. Simpson's fated car chase.

My cousins, 6'0" 14-year-old Stephen and Heather, a munchkin like myself, were out in the backyard playing basketball. I would finesse them, show off my crossover maneuver that had one of two effects: bouncing off my foot and out of bounds, or hitting me in my "special place," causing temporary paralysis.

After futilely crying about my cousin being too tall and the repercussions of continually hitting myself with the ball, we headed inside for glasses of lemonade, dinner and the end of game six of the NBA Finals. Chicago was matched up against the Phoenix Suns, leading them 3-2 in the series. I don't remember much of the game, just that Stephen kept beating us in five-card draw and I lost a lot of pennies and two nickels.

Even then I knew that a basketball game is played entirely in the last two minutes. It went back and forth and the beauty and majesty that is the game of basketball dazzled our prepubescent retinas. In the final moments of the game, Phoenix was on top 98-96 and my family had resigned itself to watch game seven two nights later.

But with those remaining seconds in between hands of poker, I couldn't explain to you the beauty of Horace Grant's pass to John Paxson. Or the feeling when Paxson pulled up and sunk the three pointer with 3.9 seconds left to give the Bulls their first "three-peat." Or how my cousins and I rushed out of the house onto the streets of Chicago and screamed at the top of our lungs as doors flung open up and down the block with neighbors laughing and shouting. We ran around for hours, exchanging stories with locals about "where we were when it happened."

I couldn't explain to you that excitement ... the thrill ... the rally the next day where I sat 200 yards from Michael Jordan and Scottie Pippen. Being in their presence. Feeling the positive energy that only a million Chicagoan grins could bring.

And that was just me. A 12-year-old geek with a jump shot that resembled a Joe Montana "Hail Mary" lob. I wonder if Paxson was able to put that feeling to words. Or Jordan.

Jordan retired a month after I "saw" him. They say it was because his father had died and he didn't feel he could devote the intensity he felt the game deserved. But I'm pretty sure it was because he knew I was a New Yorker and he wanted to give the Knicks a chance.

He's been back since then ... twice to be precise. Jordan pulls more pump fakes about retirement than he does on the court. It's funny to watch him now. It's like slow motion, but everyone else is moving at regular speed. They say the first step is the most important one, but for Jordan the first step is the only one he can muster without getting winded.

In his heyday, Jordan averaged over 30 points a game. I'll be surprised if Jordan can do 30 sit-ups at this point. But of course, I kid because I love. This man is the greatest in the history of the sport. But unlike Colonial Williamsburg, it's not always fun to see history come alive.

It resembles a crappy virtual reality game where you go head to head against legends, only the program has glitches, is really slow and adds 20 pounds. Maybe 40.

If he has anything in his favor this year against the younger talent, it's that the noises his muscles and bones make must sound remarkably similar to the squeaking wheels of a "Radio Flyer" wagon, deafening his opponents out of the paint.

Rick Reilly of Sports Illustrated put it best when asked about whether Jordan will be able to take the Wizards to another level, to which he responded: "Yes, unfortunately that level will be Dreadful, just up from Suck."

Jordan will still make his assists ... well, if anyone else on the team ever sinks a basket. And he'll rebound—just that chances are it will be from hip surgery rather than picking a ball off the rim.

At 38 Jordan is obviously not as good as he used to be. But if Patrick Ewing has taught us anything, it's that the older you get, the more of a waste of space you become. Bad example. Alright, Tim Hardaway ... No, that's a bad one too. Karl Malone? Never mind.

But if anyone is going to break this trend, it's going to be Jordan. With his own line of shoes and easy to manage hairstyle, there is no one else better suited to retire, return, retire again and return again.

Despite what obnoxious journalists and fans may say, it's not because he wants his stock in the Wizards to skyrocket (he had to sell those before he joined the team), it's not for the glory (even with Jordan, the Wizards still aren't contenders, and six championship rings says enough) and it's not for the attention (no retired player of any sport gets as much fanfare as Jordan). No, it's an entirely different reason.

It is because of that feeling. It is because of that pass to John Paxson with 3.9 seconds left and the deafening aftermath. It is for that day in the park when thousands chanted his name. It is because of his own steal and game-winning fade away jumper in game six against Utah in 1998 securing his second three-peat. It is, as Kevin Costner and my friend Greg put it, for the love of the game.

He will never be the Jordan of the past. He's not expecting to, and neither should you. But his leadership and heart helped the Bulls to another three championships when he returned the first time. And although he may not lead the Wizards to the finals, you can at least empathize with his desire to feel that joy again.

I would have suggested watching the Iron Chef on The Cooking Channel, but maybe I'm just a different breed of cat.

Bison clinch playoff berth

Women's soccer secures PL tournament spot with defeat of Lafayette and Lehigh

Kate Cramer '03 heads the ball away from a Lafayette forward in the 3-0 Bison win.

In three and a half minutes Saturday at Lafayette, the women's soccer team provided enough offense to secure a victory over the Leopards, take sole possession of second place in the Patriot League and clinch a spot in the Patriot League Tournament.

Ashley Dincher '05 scored her first two goals of the season, leading the Bison to victory. Dincher hit a low shot off a corner kick to give the Orange and Blue a 1-0 advantage 21 minutes into the game. Just over a minute later sophomore forward Savannah Rennels converted another corner with a header into the upper left corner of the net for her team-leading ninth goal of the year. The Leopards barely got back on their feet when, two minutes later, Dincher slotted home her second goal of the contest by knocking in a dropped ball by Lafayette's keeper. The Bison out-shot their opponents 7-4 and with one save, goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 earned the shutout.

"This was the most crucial game in the League all weekend. Us, Lafayette and American were all tied for second place. American tied earlier in the day so the winner of our game would be in second place alone," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said. "We scored two goals off of corner kicks and that is something we have been working on all year. They were great kicks by Emily Keber '03."

"We stepped on Lafayette's field Saturday night not only ready to play but ready to win. We showed them who the better team was in the first half by scoring three goals on them," Senior Tri-Captain Ali Chandler said.

"The whole team played really well. We were very compact defensively all over the field and did not allow them to transition," Findlay said.

The Orange and Blue got the week off to a good start by defeating Lehigh 2-0 on the road last Wednesday night.

Team of the Week

Meghan Farrell '05 scored her team-leading third game-winning goal of the season when she found the back of the net 17 minutes into the contest off a pass from Lauren Schwarz '03. Rennels added an insurance goal for the Bison with 16 minutes left in the second half. Michelle Santonacita '05 registered her second assist of the year on the goal. Purse had four saves between the pipes for the Orange and Blue.

"It was great going up a goal relatively early. It is our key to success. We have won all of our games when we have been able to get the first one," Findlay said. "Meghan scored within 20 seconds of entering the game. She has developed into a real playmaker for us."

Santoncita said, "During our game against Lehigh, we wanted to send a message and I think we did just that. Even though we didn't have home field advantage, we took it to them until we put one in the goal. After that, we played tough and made sure nothing got behind us."

"During the first half we were having trouble in the center of the field but Lauren Schwarz picked up her play in the second half and became the dominating player on the field. Also, Kate Cramer '03 came off the bench and provided aggressive play as always and Ali Chandler provided composure in the second half," Findlay said.

After having difficulties this season falling behind early in contests, the Bison have turned things around, netting the first goal in three out of their last four Patriot League victories. Findlay said she stressed the concept of time in practice to help her team realize how crucial it is to get that first goal.

"We turned on the clock during practice and put restrictions on them to give them a sense of urgency to score that first goal," she said.

The Orange and Blue finish Patriot League play this Saturday at home at 1 p.m. against first-place Navy in one of their most important matches of the season. If the Bison win they will host the Patriot League tournament the following weekend.

"I am so excited about being in the Patriot League Tournament and putting ourselves in the position to be able to host it with a win on Saturday," Lindsay Slomer '02 said.

Offense silenced in 17-12 loss to Fordham

Football yields 78-yard punt-return for TD and drops first decision in last six games

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bison winning streak came to a halt Saturday in the Bronx after a tough 17-12 loss to Fordham University. After out scoring their previous five opponents by a combined score of 163-52, Bucknell could only muster one offensive touchdown en route to falling to 5-2 on the season.

Both teams had trouble moving the ball with any regularity in the first quarter, but the Bison moved the ball into field goal position at the end of the quarter. Junior Chris Lundberg's 47-yard field goal attempt was blocked by the Rams and recovered on the Bison 43 yard line. On the ensuing drive Fordham moved the ball into the Bison red zone, and capped off a 23-yard scoring drive with a 37-yard field goal to take the lead 3-0 two minutes into the second quarter.

Throughout the remainder of the first half the Bison moved the ball relatively well, sustaining some longer drives, but were unable to score any points.

"I thought we played really well, but once we got the ball down close [to the end zone] we couldn't get it in," quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 said.

The Bison received the ball first in the second half, but could not put together a scoring drive. Dan McGrath returned the Bison punt 78 yards for a touchdown to put the Rams up 10-0.

"The punt return was the play of the game," Head Coach Tom Gadd said.

At the end of the third quarter, the Rams put together another scoring drive consisting of two big passes, the second of which went 47 yards for a touchdown to make the score 17-0 in favor of Fordham.

On the following drive, Wenrich engineered the Bison to their first scoring drive of the game. Taking four minutes off the clock, the drive went 82 yards in 13 plays. Wenrich ran the ball in from six yards out for the touchdown to make the score 17-6 Rams.

After the defense forced Fordham into a three and out, the Bison began to move the ball well again. On a second and goal play from the Fordham four-yard line Wenrich was intercepted at the one-yard line, but the Rams were unable to return the ball at all. On the next play from scrimmage the Rams fumbled the ball in the end zone and Mark Tallman '02 recovered the ball for the second Bison touchdown of the game to make the score 17-12. The Bison went for the two point conversion and failed, thus yielding the final score of the game.

"We were moving the ball well [for most of the game], and then there would be one play that stopped us," running back Jabu Powell '02 said. "We really didn't capitalize on the opportunities we had."

The Bison defense played yet another strong game, holding their opponent to under 20 points for the fifth straight game.

"We know that if we play well together as a team we can stop any team in the [Patriot] League," linebacker Stephane Pluviose '04 said.

"The defense continues to play well, and we just need to produce like we have in the past two games," Gadd added.

The Bison host high powered Holy Cross this Saturday at home.

Georgia squared off against No. 6 Florida in the World's Largest Outdoor Cocktail Party. Georgia, led by new Head Coach Mark Richt, took it to Florida all day, but a few bad decisions ultimately doomed the Dawgs as they lost 24-10. In the other game, No. 9 Tennessee defeated No. 14 South Carolina 17-10. The Volunteers combined 120 yards from RB Travis Stephens, 211 yards passing from quarterback Casey Clausen and a solid defensive effort to pick up the win. They now have Florida in their sights, as the two powerhouses are scheduled to make up their Sept. 15 game on Dec. 1.

Let's not get ahead of ourselves—there is a lot of football to be played between now and January. But this weekend should go a long way in determining who will still be around come bowl time. Oklahoma only dropped to second in the BCS, meaning that Miami is once again on the outside looking in. Things should get better for the Hurricanes, who still have to play Syracuse and Virginia Tech this year. If they can run the tabie, then the BCS will become even more interesting. But as this weekend has showed, Miami should take nothing for granted.

Suzanne Schaubert '02 can without a doubt be labeled the most improved player in the Class of 2002.

"She probably doesn't recognize all the subtle contributions she's made to the program, to her teammates and to me personally," Lewis said. "I'm proud to say that she's an alumnus of our field hockey program, for she has represented herself, her teammates and the team with class and commitment."

"Personally, they'll always hold a special place in my heart as they are the reason I chose to stay in coaching," Lewis said. "Certainly the program as a whole drew me to coaching, but I remember thinking back a year ago that I couldn't leave this class and walk away from coaching. They were in my life at the absolute right time and I won't forget that. What's wonderful about this class, as a whole, is that they've all brought a little something different to practices and games and that's been refreshing."

Robots aid in recovery mission

Seventeen robots navigate unstable surfaces of World Trade Center wreckage

By Jennifer Bunch
Staff Writer

For the first time in history, robots were used to aid the search and rescue mission after the World Trade Center attacks.

Robin Murphy, a robotics expert at the University of South Florida, packed up six robots, along with several graduate students and began the 18-hour drive as soon as she heard about the attacks.

Murphy began developing the robots after the Oklahoma City bombings. Her crew consists of Jenn Casper, Mark Micire, Brian Minten and former student, John Blitch. Blitch controls the Center for Robot-Assisted Search and Rescue (CRASAR), located in Colorado.

At the same time that Murphy's crew was driving to New York from Florida, Blitch packed his car full of robots and drove from Washington, D.C. Working together, the two teams placed approximately 17 robots to use and searched through three buildings.

The robots have many capabilities. They can detect body heat and bright colors that stand out from the gray rubble. The robots are also equipped with two-way radios and, in the future, will be equipped with emergency supplies that can be used by the victim until rescue crews can get there. They have "robot-eyes" that help them see through the darkness and move on large treads. They could be likened to tiny army tanks.

Over time, while most hope for finding survivors was lost, the robots did find five bodies and one set of remains.

The robots were useful in the World Trade Center situation because glass and unstable surfaces made it impossible for people and rescue dogs to search many places. Despite the danger of losing or damaging the expensive robots, Murphy and her crew sent them in whenever and wherever they were asked. As a result, the robots entered the rubble 11 times. The robots range in size from a flattened shoebox to a medium-sized suitcase and cost anywhere from $10,000 to $40,000.

Often referred to as marsupials, the larger robots, or mother robots, carry several smaller daughter robots in a small pouch. Once the larger robot gets to a place it cannot fit into, the smaller robots are dispatched.

One of the biggest obstacles met by the robot teams was approval. Many people felt that the robots would only get in the way, but after several instructional sessions, the robots were utilized successfully. In the case of the World Trade Center attacks, most of the larger robots could not be used, but the smaller ones were carried in by backpack and dispatched on their own.

Robots, used to search through the rubble of the World Trade Center, were able to speed up the rescue process, as well as explore otherwise hard to reach areas.

Many scientists want to stress that the robots can never replace human searchers. They cannot offer the psychological aid or the warm touch that a human can, but they can help rescuers find victims faster. As robots are used more frequently, they will be able to speed up the rescue process.

The robots are powered and controlled in different ways depending on their size. The larger robots can be self powered and controlled by a wireless source because they can carry a power pack.

In contrast, the smaller robots must be powered by a tether of wires. The tethers are up to 100 feet long, much longer than the seven-foot camera wands previously used by the fire department. Usually robots were lowered by their tethers into the rubble cracks.

While the technology is not yet complete, search and rescue robots will be able to aid rescuers and speed up any efforts to improve the chances of finding survivors in any future accidents. The robot experts all expressed extreme sorrow that their robots had to be used for such an unfortunate reason, but were happy that they were available.

Cesario amuses and relativity amazes

By Nate Ivanick
Staff Writer

The universe we live in is very interesting, and it has nothing to do with comedian Jeff Cesario. Years before Cesario, Albert Einstein won the Nobel Peace Prize for his creation of the Special Theory of Relativity. Unlike the classical theory of the universe, published by Sir Isaac Newton, the special and general theories of relativity dealt with objects traveling close to the speed of light.

The general theory of relativity contains two basic principles. One is that the laws of physics are the same for all observers, regardless of where they are. This makes sense. If different laws of physics existed at different places, they would be rather useless. The second is that the speed of light in a vacuum is the same for all observers. This also makes sense as the speed of light is constant no matter who sees it.

So, having accepted these two principles, we find we are caught accepting much more. The first of these is the theory of time dilation. Say for instance that Cesario was in a spaceship traveling close to the speed of light. Cesario's mission is to fly to Alpha Centauri and back. Alpha Centauri is the closest star besides the sun to the earth. It is a distance of four light-years from earth, meaning that light that shines on earth today from Alpha Centauri is four years old.

Cesario decides that he will make this trip traveling at eight-tenths the speed of light, and then return home. For people on earth, this whole ordeal will take 10 years. For Cesario however, it will only take six years. This means Cesario's watch will read six years, and he will actually have aged only six years while the rest of us have aged 10. The implications of this are mind boggling.

This means that in the future, we may be able to send people to distant galaxies in their lifetimes, but if we delay, we will be long dead before they are able to reach them. It has been proven with stationary and mobile atomic clocks. In fact, the GPS satellite must continually update its clocks because it is orbiting earth, while GPSs on the earth are stationary. Therefore, the former clocks are several fractions of a second slower than the clocks on earth.

The second aspect of relativity that we must accept is that the distance is not an absolute quantity. In fact, while the distance to Alpha Centauri from Earth is four light years, the distance for Cesario will have shrunk to 2.4 light years. This is truly amazing. It implies that the shortest distance between two points is not a straight line, it's a straight line moving at incredibly fast speeds. This applies to humans as well. If you were to run at an extraordinary speed, your entire body would actually shrink in the direction of motion—you would be thinner. This is conclusive evidence that running can make you thinner, you just have to do it very quickly.

So what does this say about our universe? Nothing, not time, not distance, not mass is ever absolute. Anything and everything changes depending on the speeds you move at. While Cesario does help to make the universe a little more interesting with his comedic antics, life is already amazing. If you want to learn more about relativity, take Physics 211. Or, if you want a simplified explanation of relativity, covering everything from black holes, to time travel, read "A Brief History of Time" by Stephen Hawking.

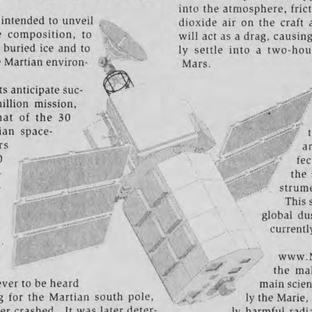
Odyssey arrives at Mars

American spacecraft lands after a seven month journey

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

The American robotic spacecraft Mars Odyssey, launched April 7, arrived at Mars on Tuesday. It was sent to explore the planet's geological and biological history.

The spacecraft is intended to unveil the planet's surface composition, to search for water and buried ice and to study radiation in the Martian environment.



Although scientists anticipate success for this $300 million mission, the fact remains that of the 30 American and Russian spacecrafts sent to Mars over the past 40 years, less than one-third have been effective, according to www.NASA.gov.

According to The New York Times, the Mars Climate Orbiter disappeared in 1999, never to be heard from again. Heading for the Martian south pole, the Mars Polar Lander crashed. It was later determined that this was due to inadequate management design and testing of the spacecraft.

This year, NASA canceled its plans for a repeat landing mission and focused mainly on ensuring the safety of the Mars Odyssey before its launching this April.

If the 1,671-pound Odyssey succeeds it will loop around Mars once every 17 to 19 hours, in an orbit as close as about 200 miles and as far as 17,000 miles, according to The New York Times. Eventually the Odyssey will use thruster jets to reduce the time of its orbit to 11 hours.

Within a week, through a technique called aerobraking, the spacecraft will impact with the upper edges of the Martian atmosphere to lower and stabilize its orbit.

As the spacecraft approaches Mars, and dips into the atmosphere, friction from the thin carbon-dioxide air on the craft and its solar-power array will act as a drag, causing the Odyssey to eventually settle into a two-hour orbit 249 miles above Mars.

According to The New York Times, by February, the Odyssey should be in full operation. However, scientists are worried about the effects of Martian weather on the spacecraft's scientific instruments.

This summer there was a violent global dust storm and Mars is still currently in its stormy season.

According to www.NASA.gov, scientists fear the malfunctioning of the three main scientific instruments, especially the Marie, which measures potentially harmful radiation near Mars. Other instruments include the thermal emission imaging system, used to identify minerals below ground level as well as temperature differences in the surface, and the gamma ray spectrometer, which measures the amount of hydrogen in the upper three feet of soil and searches for water and ice deposits.

Success of the Odyssey would open many doors to the future of NASA, as well as answer many questions as to the potential origin of life and its possible existence on Mars.

This February could be an unforgettable month.

An abroad perspective: exploring Japan

Graduating from Nanzan University with fellow IES students.

I have never in my life been as scared as I was the day that I arrived at Nagoya Airport for my semester abroad in Japan.

When I left home, everyone looked like me and spoke like me, but when I arrived, I felt like the lone streak of color in an otherwise uniform painting of black hair and dark eyes. The language on the signs had changed, I couldn't understand what people around me were saying, and I had no idea where I was going. I went to gather my bags, trying not to let it show that inside I was trembling with fear.

Just outside the doors of the airport, I noticed a complete stranger holding up a small piece of white paper with my name carefully printed on it. Through a valiant attempt at introductions, I learned that the man would be my host father for the next six months.

I also learned that my three semesters of studying Japanese were pathetically inadequate to converse with a native person. I could hardly understand the words that came out of his mouth, much less respond. We entered a game where he would spout out what was to him a simple question, but to me sounded as complex as heat-mass transfer. All I could muster for a response was a polite smile and laugh, desperately trying to make him think I understood. My confidence level plummeted and I was sure that the next six months would never end, being spent in helpless misery and loneliness.

We loaded the bags into the trunk of his car and started the drive home. The game continued, him posing simple questions and me smiling politely, until the CD player finally broke the awkwardness between us. As Led Zeppelin played through the speakers I could feel all of my anxiety begin to disappear.

Immediately I showered my host father with questions about the band and found out that he was a bigger fan than I was. He was even lucky enough to have seen the band in concert during their 1972 world tour. Suddenly, as we sped down the highway with Led Zeppelin blaring, it became clear that we would become very close and that by the time I had to go back home I would be begging to stay another semester.

My experiences in Japan only got better from that point. Through The Institute for the International Education of Students (IES), I enrolled as a full-time student at Nanzan University. There, I learned about Japanese language, literature, and culture with about 100 other "foreigners" amidst thousands of Japanese students.

Aside from the language courses, classes were not overly strenuous and the abundance of time off allowed for travel throughout the country. Although narrowing the choices down is nearly impossible, Kyoto and Hiroshima remain two of the most memorable.

Speeding along at almost 150 mph on the bullet train, the hour-long trip to Kyoto seemed to fly by as fast as the scenery. Upon arriving in the ultra-modern Kyoto station, one cannot help but think that the guidebooks citing the city to be Japan's most traditional and historic are hopelessly misleading. But under the skin of modernity lies the heart of ancient Japan.

More than 1,000 temples and shrines lie within the city limits, each unique in its own right. Sanjusangendo stands out in my mind as the most stunning of all. Erected in 1,164, the 1,001 statues of the goddess Kannon housed within the shrine make it the longest building in Japan. Each one is carved by hand and exactly the same, stacked side by side, row upon row, for nearly 200 yards.

Strolling the incense filled hallway constantly under the careful scrutiny of the shimmering Kannon is a humbling and inspiring experience. Never before have I seen such a powerful manifestation of devotion or been struck by such a sheer sense of awe.

Hiroshima is traditionally remembered for its unfortunate role in World War II, but for me it exists as something completely different. Although I had little to do with the atomic bomb that decimated the city, words cannot describe the feeling of grief and guilt that overcame me as I entered the peace park erected in memory of the event.

Despite being in the center of a bustling metropolis, a thick, eerie calm rules over the park. No matter where you go you cannot escape it, whether at the Memorial Mound, encasing the remains of nearly 70,000 people, or the eternal flame, forever burning until nuclear weapons are banned from our planet.

As you stroll the grounds, chains of paper cranes adorn every monument, up to four feet deep in places. Each chain is a collection of 10,000 origami cranes, individually folded by hand in memory of the tragedy. Seeing that they come from Japan, Korea, Australia, Europe and even the United States, it is hard not to be humbled by these small tokens of love for humankind and disdain for war.

And yet the Japanese do not hate Americans for what was done to their city. Never once as I circled the grounds did I receive a menacing glance or hateful words, but rather, I was greeted with laughter and smiles. To me, this exemplified the true meaning of the park: it stands not only in remembrance of what happened, but also in honor of the Japanese spirit—one of endurance, dedication, and love.

I consider myself very fortunate to have experienced these things while spending my semester abroad in Japan. I have learned, seen and felt things that the majority of Americans would have trouble even perceiving.

Undoubtedly these experiences have led me to an understanding of Japanese culture that is far more profound than anything that can be read in a book. But for as much as I learned about Japanese culture, I feel that I learned even more about my own culture.

Seeing the United States through the eyes of another society has taught me more in six months than I could have ever realized in a lifetime. Some of what I learned made me proud, much of it made me ashamed, but the lessons gained through this changed my life forever.

Much has changed within me from the day that I arrived at Nagoya Airport. Through trial and error, success and failure, I have discovered what it means to be truly happy, overwhelmingly discouraged, and utterly alone. Each instance, whether joyful or painful, has taught me what it is to be human. Moreover, it has shown me that humans everywhere are essentially the same and are only differentiated by the petty labels and stereotypes we apply to things that are foreign to us.

With this in mind, I sit and wait, yearning for the day I can return to Japan and the wonders that I left behind.

Nationally acclaimed poet visits University

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

This past weekend marked the visit of Maxine Kumin, this year's Sojka Poetry Series visiting poet. Kumin, a distinguished American poet, filled Bucknell Hall to capacity Sunday evening for her hour-long poetry reading. She is one of seven nationally acclaimed poets to have been extended this University distinction within the last seven years.

Former president of the University from 1985 to 1995 and current professor of biology Gary Sojka, and his wife, Sandra, began the Sojka Visiting Poetry Series in 1995.

"Sandy and I both enjoy poetry very much, and the University seemed a particularly receptive place for poetry programs of various kinds. This looked like a chance for us to help out in an area where the University was already strong and building an outstanding reputation," Sojka said.

During each poet's visit, he or she conducts a poetry reading, visits a poetry workshop and engages in discussions with interested members of the campus community. Kumin's informal poetry conversation discussion took place on Monday afternoon, when she, again, drew an impressive crowd.

Drawing a audience of enthusiasts is not new to Kumin. As a history and literature graduate from Radcliffe College (now Harvard University), Kumin began writing poetry as early as she began to read.

As the author of over 20 children's books, five collections of essays, five novels and 11 books of poetry, she has received numerous awards and honors. A Pulitzer Prize winner for her novel, "Up Country: Poems of New England in 1972," the recipient of an Academy of American Poets fellowship, a poetry consultant to the Library of Congress in 1982 and a poet-in-residence at the University are just some of Kumin's impressive accolades.

Courtesy of Peter Shulman

Kumin first visited the University in 1983 as a Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellow. For six weeks, she conducted writing workshops and interacted with the students. In addition to the University, she has taught at Princeton University, Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Columbia University, Brandeis University and Tufts University.

Currently serving as New Hampshire's Poet Laureate, Kumin feels strongly that poetry readings are crucial to understanding a poem.

"It's extremely important to hear poetry in the poet's voice. It brings the poem off the page," she said in a 1979 interview.

"I try to begin with a crowd pleaser," Kumin said at the lunch interview. "I have to know where I'm going in a reading. I don't start with a heavy poem."

Commencing her Sunday night reading was a light and comical poem entitled "The Bear," which she found in a nature pamphlet. This poem not only evoked laughs from the crowd, but it established a good rapport between Kumin and the audience that continued throughout the reading.

Several members of the audience detected this connection between the poet and her listeners.

"She has an engaging manner and interacts well with an audience," Sojka said.

In addition, Steve Stasson '02 noticed a comfortable atmosphere throughout the reading.

"It was pretty relaxed, and it was obvious that she wanted to make it informal," Stasson said.

Kumin read many poems illustrating rural landscape and animals; these two ideas are prevalent throughout most of her poetry. Another common theme is unfavorable weather.

"A reason for multiple rain and mud poems is because it prevents me from going outside and doing farm chores, so I go to my desk and write," Kumin said.

Kumin likes to write in the morning, considering herself a lark.

"I think the world is divided into larks and owls. I like to work in the morning; that's just my best time," Kumin said.

And it is during this time when Kumin employs her unique and distinctive writing style. Known to favor traditional poetic structures, she uses form as "a tool of liberation."

"Free verse is scary," Kumin said. "You don't know where to break the line."

"My touchstone for a poem is chronology, geography and furniture," she continued. "I want to know what time this poem is taking place and where the poem is happening. The furniture is the language of the poem; it's the image," Kumin said.

Kumin's balanced style is the one aspect many of her fans find most appealing about her work.

"Her poetry, though formal in style, is extremely accessible to modern audiences. Her desire to work within established forms and her exceedingly careful use of language make her work distinctive," Sojka said.

With her latest book of poetry, "The Long Marriage," just recently available in paperback, Kumin is content.

"I'm awfully happy to have this new book out," Kumin said.

As a distinguished American female poet who employs a unique, yet highly successful form of writing, Kumin deserves her happiness. The University should be honored to have hosted such an accomplished writer.

Northern Ireland study now offered

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Features Editor

The New York Times quoted a citizen of Belfast in April of 1970 saying, "Anyone who isn't confused here doesn't really understand what is going on." The confusion that this citizen speaks of is the sectarian conflict in Northern Ireland, a subject so significant that over thirty years later, the implications of this continuing conflict is the subject of study for the University's newest summer study abroad program.

Established by Professor Bill Flack, assistant professor in the department of Psychology, and Professor Carl Milofsky, chair of the department of Sociology and Anthropology, this program examines the characteristics and consequences of the sectarian conflict in Northern Ireland.

Having recently received administrative approval, Flack and Milofsky are now actively recruiting students for the inaugural summer 2002 session, which will take place from May 20 through June 9. The participant cap is set at 20 students.

Participating students will live near McGee College, the Derry campus of the University of Ulster. There, a core seminar course will be held three times each week, in which Flack, Milofsky and guest lecturers from the University of Ulster will present various psychological and sociological aspects of the conflicts between Irish Catholics and Protestants.

A second course will require student involvement in various organizations in Northern Ireland that aim to address the sectarian conflict at a local level. Students will observe and participate in efforts to help Catholics and Protestants communicate, in the attempt to illustrate conflict resolution on a more personal, as opposed to political, level.

"One of the things that is happening at the University is growing emphasis on service learning," Milofsky said.

Students will also journey to various politically, culturally and geographically significant sites in Northern Ireland two days each week. Possible cities include Armagh, Belfast and Coleraine. Other trips are planned to places such as Dunluce Castle and the Giant's Causeway, both on the northern coast of County Antrim, but just a short drive from Derry.

Evenings and weekends are free for students to do their own exploring either in the museums, theatres and other sites in Derry, or outside the city.

Violence due to the sectarian conflict is an obvious concern for both students and parents. Derry, where the program will be based was at one time a central point in the conflict. In 1973, British soldiers killed 13 unarmed Catholics who were protesting against violations of their civil rights, on a day that is now known as Bloody Sunday.

Flack and Milofsky both emphasize that the violence is extremely localized and, for the most part, limited to small residential areas of Belfast. The most recent conflict involved a group a Protestant parents terrorizing Catholic schoolgirls walking to school. Again, these incidents were concentrated in an area that encompassed only a few city blocks of Belfast.

The day trips planned are subject to change if a violent situation should occur. "Obviously we wouldn't be taking students anywhere where there'd be risk of anyone in the program coming to harm," Flack said.

Flack cited data gathered by a study conducted by the United Nations that compared relative percentages of citizens directly affected by violence in the United States, England, France and Ireland. The study indicated that risk was no greater in one country than in any other. Also, unlike other countries experiencing civil conflict, such as those in the Middle East, Flack noted that the people involved in the violence have no interest in attacking non-nationals, nor are the majority of citizens involved.

Flack recalls a recent trip to Northern Ireland in which he spoke to both Catholics and Protestants on an individual basis about the conflict. "The first reaction from most people over there is extreme embarrassment. For the majority of people in Northern Ireland they really want the conflict to be over and done. They are sick of it. They are sick of the violence. Everyone over there has lost a family member or friend," Flack said.

Flack and Milofsky became involved in establishing this program to satisfy both personal and academic interests. Both acknowledge their Irish heritages as the initial factor in their interest in Ireland.

Flack's professional research involves the micro sociological study on people who are suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). He is collaborating on a new project when individual Catholics and Protestants are brought together to talk about the conflict. Flack plans to involve University students in this project, with the ultimate goal of developing a detailed description of the problems that occur at the individual level during a conflict.

Milofsky emphasizes the need to bring the knowledge gained from an abroad experience back to the University for further study and research, an increasingly prevalent goal that his department has undertaken.

"We have a departmental interest in trying to figure out how we can set up a program where students would go someplace where we would know the place, know some people there, know the setting and be able to get them plugged into some kind of experiential learning or research experiment that they could continue at the University," Milofsky said.

Flack and Milofsky are looking forward to the success of this initial program as a jumping off point for many further extensions of study at the University. Although it encompasses a sociological and psychological issue, both highlight the connections that can be made with other majors, such as political science and international relations emphasizing the overall experience that the program advocates.

"I think it is going to be a really educationally and personally rich experience for people to have. They are going to experience Northern Irish culture and various aspects of peoples' attempts to resolve the conflicts up close but in a safe way," Flack said.

Information sessions are planned for Nov. 13 and Nov. 29 from 7 to 8 p.m. in Coleman 251 for students interested in learning more about the program and applying to it. A webpage has been created for the program and will appear on the University website www.departments.bucknell.edu/bu_northernireland. Students and parents with additional questions are encouraged to contact Professor Flack (wflack@bucknell.edu, 577-1131) or Professor Milofsky (milofsky@bucknell.edu, 577-3468).

Much to be learned at this semester's Leadership Conference

By Julia Woodward
Staff Writer

Stretch. Sigh. Peaceful yawn. Another beautiful morning in The Bubble, another day to conquer, another 350 e-mails to sort through. Like every other day, I sit down in front of my computer, enter my password, and wait for my new messages to arrive.

Normally, when I get mass campus e-mails I'm quick to delete them, but something about this one caught my eye. Maybe it was the flashy text, maybe it was some sick subconscious desire for power or maybe it was just the third time I had received it that day. Whatever it was, it got me up before noon last Saturday for the University's Student Leadership Conference.

I've been told if you want to get somewhere in life you've got to be a leader. Being that I'm no Nate Sorber, I figured it was high time to get my act in gear and go learn how to be a leader. So, I paid my $5, turned in my registration form a day late (so typical of us novice leaders), and woke up bright and early with pen and paper ready to go conquer the world.

The festivities began at 10 a.m. with registration where I received a T-shirt, my schedule and a ticket to enter in the door prize drawing. There was a quick continental breakfast and introduction and then we got right down to business.

Being how efficient and on top of things us leaders are, prior to the conference each leader signed up for three of nine possible programs each focusing on improving leadership skills.

For my first session I choose a program, led by. Joseph Murray, associate professor of Education, entitled Group Dynamics, which focused on the relationships and roles of the members of a group .

My second session, Inter-Organizational Conflict, was taught by University chaplain Ian Oliver. It focused on recognizing and solving conflicts within groups.

Creative Recruitment was my third session. It was taught by Assistant Director of Housing and Residential Life, Nicole Loyd and focused on new recruitment strategies to help draw members to a group.

Each program ran about 45 minutes in length and snacks were offered during the breaks. The sessions were interactive, well organized and informative.

After two and a half hours of intense leadership training lunch was served and David Flinchbaugh, director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers gave an inspirational and entertaining speech. I must say the lunch was one of the best I've had here at the University and Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal and her crew did a great job running a successful conference, even though I didn't win one of the door prizes.

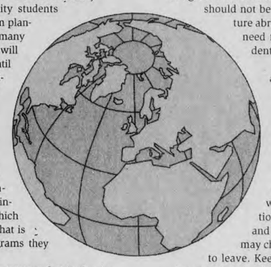
Students prepare to travel abroad

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Staff Writer

For many students the time to think about studying abroad is rapidly approaching. Students are encompassed by the excitement of deciding which country to visit, which programs to apply to, how long to stay and what to study—decisions of which are of imminent importance. Unfortunately, in light of recent terrorist events, the excitement is tempered by concern.

The question of how new international tension will affect studying abroad is on the minds of many students and parents. Should students not travel abroad at this time? If they do go abroad should they limit their choices to only certain countries? Do students need to be more cautious about traveling outside of the United States than before?

Emily Ostrom '04 retains a view about study abroad that many University students share. "As of right now, I am planning on going abroad to Germany for my entire junior year. I will continue with these plans until I am told that I am not allowed to go or the intuition leads me to change my mind. By backing down, I am assisting terrorism. I will continue with my future as planned, only with more caution," Ostrum said.



Students are still concerned about the potential instability of the nation in which they chose to study, a fear that is certainly affecting the programs they chose.

"I would want to be in a country that is closely aligned with the United States just in case the current situation escalates," David Meilleur '04 said. "I also worry a little bit about traveling. I do not want to be stranded and unable to return to the United States if international flights become a problem."

Emily Thede '04 believes that students should not give up on studying abroad simply because of safety issues and politics.

"I think that the decision to study abroad is definitely something that you need to think about seriously. Especially when it comes to choosing where you want to study. But at the same time I wouldn't give up this opportunity and you can never insure your safety no matter where you are," Thede said.

Although many students seem to be interested in studying abroad, some parents are more reluctant.

"We have found out that no one is safe from terrorism ... be it abroad or at home. There is a small part of me that thinks Meghann should stay at Bucknell and not leave the country," said Debbie Peace, mother of Meghann Peace '04.

But realizing the opportunities that lie ahead for their sons and daughters, parents are overcoming their skepticism.

"Meghann's love of Spanish and its culture makes me realize that this is a wonderful opportunity for her. Once students graduate and begin working, they may never have the opportunity to spend 3 months immersing themselves in a different culture," Peace said.

Dr. N. Ramakrishna, father of Ashwin Ramakrishna '04 agrees that traveling abroad is an opportunity that should not be wasted, and as a parent of future abroad student, he emphasizes the need for practicality, both from students and parents.

"Studying abroad will be an advantage in that one gets to mingle with students in a foreign land and this will no doubt broaden one's views and perspectives," Ramakrishna said. "Anytime your son or daughter ventures far it is a matter of concern. At present these concerns will be heightened. My suggestion would be for you to go ahead and make your plans; many things may change by the time you are ready to leave. Keep that in mind and be flexible in your planning."

Peace echoed this need for increased consciousness on the part of the student.

"My daughter will need to be aware of what is going on around her while she is in Spain. It all comes down to the fact that you need to use common sense ... whether you are at home in the USA or abroad," Peace said.

Although students may have to be more careful and more aware of their own surroundings as well as international political affairs while they are abroad, the general attitude of University students is one of persistence. They are not willing to let anything stop them from gaining what may be one of the more unique experiences of their lives.

SASA provides "a taste of Asia"

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

Members of South Asian Students Association (SASA) brought cultures from distant countries to the University and the local community. Through a combination of food and entertainment, crowds gathered at Larison Dining Hall for the annual SASA dinner last Saturday.

This year, the members of SASA represented the countries of Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka. The evening alternated between a feast catered by the India Pavilion located in State College, Pa. and the exotic dances exemplifying the unity and diversity of countries in South Asia.

The banquet started with an appetizer of vegetable Samosa, a crispy turnover stuffed with potatoes, peas and spiced herbs. The light curry flavor prepared the guests' palates and appetites for the entrees following this first course.

Four entrees were offered for the evening, each complementing the plain long grain basmati rice. The first entree, Chana Masala, consisted of Garbanzo beans cooked with herbs and spices. Chicken Mahkni was a second dish of boneless tandoori chicken cooked in a thick creamy tomato sauce with a touch of cream and herbs. Navarthma Kurma was an assortment of fresh vegetables cooked with mild spices, nuts and raisins. The final dish was the traditional Tandoori chicken. The term Tandoori comes from the red color that is produced by a light marinate and the cooking of the chicken in a clay oven with special herbs and freshly ground spices. A treat of Naan bread added to the authenticity of the Indian feast.

Rae Purcell—The Bucknellian
Sophia Abraham '02 and Yamini Laks '03 in traditional Indian costume.

The students at the University enjoyed the cornucopia of South Asian Cuisine. "This is my first time having Indian food and I am definitely enjoying my meal tonight," Julia Woodard '05 said as she went for seconds of Naan bread.

Food was not the only form of entertainment for the evening. Throughout the course of the meal, members of SASA performed both traditional and modern varieties of South Asian dancing. Sophia Abraham '02 choreographed almost all of the dances. The guests of the dinner were mesmerized by the grace of the female dancers and the power of the male dancers.

"I have always enjoyed fine Indian cuisine, but the extraordinary dances performed by the members of SASA really added to the atmosphere of tonight's dinner," Wes Wellington '05 said.

From the enjoyment expressed by the guests, it seems that the University benefited from this peek into the culture and traditions of South Asia.

Art exhibit features prison works

By Melissa Farrar
Staff Writer

The Samek Art Gallery has two new exhibits, both featuring works by prison inmates. Embodying a number of fascinating issues in a unique manner, "Cellblock Visions" and "Portraits of Life-Sentenced Women" will be on display from Oct. 29 to Dec. 9.

The "Cellblock Visions" exhibit displays artwork created behind bars from 1982 to 2001 by prisoners serving time in county jails, high security penitentiaries and on death row. The artists have been or are currently incarcerated in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Illinois and California.

Art serves as a powerful counteraction to the dehumanization of prison inmates. Conventional art materials are often impossible to get, so convicts express their talent by using whatever resources available. Some examples include cigarette wrappers recycled into devotional frames and purses or toilet paper squished and molded into figures. For the most part, this art has been created for art's own sake but also as a form of solace and spiritual survival for the inmates.

The "Cellblock Visions" exhibit is marked by a lack of pretense or self-consciousness with a great emphasis on spontaneity. This collection of works makes that possible and provides some insight into the human condition. One of its artists, Charles Mosby, said he wants his art to reflect his humanity.

"I showed the world how evil I can be and now I want to show the goodness in me," he said in "Cellblock Visions 2001: Art from American Prisons."

There are approximately 138,000 incarcerated women in the United States, with jails often unprepared to meet their gender-specific needs. The Samek Gallery's other exhibit titled "Portraits of Life-Sentenced Women" by Mary DeWitt explores another aspect of life behind bars.

Her work focuses on the stories of a few life-sentenced women in the Pennsylvania State Correctional Institution at Muncy and was funded through the State Corrections Inmate General Welfare Fund, the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts.

DeWitt's first experience at SCI Muncy began in 1988, teaching art to the general prison community. She soon realized that the "lifers" (the women serving life-sentences) were her best and most enjoyable students.

In 1990, the SCI Muncy Staff and Administration implemented a project created especially for life-sentenced women. The program was designed to bring visibility to these inmates by using portraiture and narrative. Most of the paintings from this collection were rendered over a period of nearly a decade during the 1990s and were completed inside the institution. Instead of attempting to create a likeness of the sitter, as is the goal of most portrait artists, DeWitt's objective is more parallel to that of a documentarian, including narrative text with some of her images.

DeWitt's work in this exhibition falls under two categories: those combining the painting with the found object (most often old window panes) and those using traditional means such as paint and canvas.

"Viewing these portraits helps us understand the lives of women whose individuality has too often been hidden from us by incarceration and isolation," said Cynthia Peltier, curator of the gallery. "Though we know one exhibition cannot comprehensively address all the issues salient to such a discussion, we nonetheless hope this exhibition inspires urgently-needed dialogue on incarcerated women in particular, and on our justice system in general."

Olson performs in University bands

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Layout Editor

Senior Curt Olson has been part of every instrumental ensemble on campus throughout his career at the University. He plays the trumpet in the University band, orchestra and jazz band, as well as in several individual and departmental recitals. Olson is currently preparing for his upcoming senior recital in February.

"I will be playing a trumpet concerto by Hummel as well as one by Torelli," Olson said. "I will also be performing a jazz bass piece, a brass trio by Poulenc and a turn of the century cornet solo."

Olson's love of music began at an early age. After playing the violin for three years in elementary school, he switched to the trumpet in fifth grade. He hasn't stopped since.

"I thought it would be cool," Olson said. "There was no reason to it, I just picked the trumpet."

When Olson came to the University, he did not intend to continue his music.

"I was interested in physics or math," he said. "But then I got to know the music department and the students in the music program, and I became a music education major."

Olson's plans for the future include graduate school, though perhaps not immediately after graduation.

"I may teach for a year first, preferably at the high school level," Olson said. "I just want to keep on playing the trumpet."

Olson has worked closely with several faculty members in the music department during his four years at the University, including Associate Professor Bill Kenny, director of bands.

Chris Olson '02 performs with campus musical groups.

"He's really helped me along the way," Olson said. "I've learned a lot from everyone in the music department. They've given me a lot of individual attention."

Kenny has enjoyed working with Olson over the past four years.

"Curt is an exceptional music student," Kenny said. "He possesses a wide range of musical skills rarely seen in undergraduate music students—he is among the finest trumpet players I have encountered in my 12 years at Bucknell."

Kenny also commends Olson on his future aspirations in the music field.

"His compositions show great promise," he said. "In addition to his musical skills he continually demonstrates a great attitude and a thirst for learning."

Olson's talents will be on display tonight at 8 p.m. at the University Jazz Band concert, where he will be a featured soloist.

Theater classes to hold Cocktail auditions

Short plays provide dramatic experience for interested students

By Matthew Griffin
Staff Writer

It's time once again for a University theater tradition: The Cocktail Theater Series. A product of the semester-long directing class THEA 240, the Cocktails provide excellent opportunities for actors who are just getting their feet wet or are looking to gain some additional experience in University theater.

Fashioned after the vision of Harvey Powers the director's role in the production of a play. Students in the class choose and analyze short play scripts, developing their skills as interpreters of a playwright's dramatic purpose.

The students are then responsible for every aspect of the production of their chosen play, from the audition process and casting to set design and working with actors. Bob Gainer, associate professor of theater and class instructor, described the students' goal in directing Cocktails as learning to work with actors in order to tell a story.

The individual productions are a bare-bones affair with no elaborate costumes or complex sets. The students' main goal is to concentrate on what they've learned from their own acting experience, and take it one step further. Communication of purpose and clarity of vision are essentials in working with the actors to present the plays.

This year's series of seven short plays will kick off at 5 p.m. on Nov. 28 in Tustin Studio Theater. The plays performed this year will be "Eye to Eye," "The Boor," "Token to the Moon," "Brother," "The Problem," "Linette at 3 a.m." and "Courting Prometheus."

Auditions for these productions will be held from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m. on Tuesday, Nov. 6 on the second floor of Coleman Hall. All the plays are of a realistic style and are suitable for actors of all levels of experience. There are a total of 10 roles for men and seven roles for women available. Anyone interested in auditioning is encouraged to peruse the scripts on reserve in the library under THEA 240. Each student director will select a short scene from their respective play for the audition.

"Phantom" still a Broadway hit

Show enhances N.Y. experience

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Okay, so standing in the back of Broadway's Majestic Theater while looking upside down through an elderly couple's shoulders is not the best way to see a Broadway show. However, when you're a poor college student spending the day in New York City and you happen to walk into the theater and discover that you can see "The Phantom of the Opera" for $20, standing in the back sounds more appealing than it would otherwise.

In fact, I would not have wished to see the show from any other spot. Why? Because I stood right by the sound technician. Every sound was perfectly mixed, every tone was pure and best of all, the sound technician knew all of the words to the songs. He felt comfortable enough to make directing motions when the orchestra played, and even added elements of dramatic flair when he mouthed the words to "The Music of the Night."

The plot, a classic theme of good versus evil, was portrayed through a setting in Victorian-era France. True love, as seen in the passionate song "All I Ask of You," the conniving mentality of "The Point of No Return" and the beauty of "Beyond the Lake" each added their own element of emotion and twists to the plot.

Though parts of the set were hidden by the overhanging balcony, the brilliance of it was visible. It wasn't gaudy and overdone, but was instead smartly subtle. The use of lighting effects for the illusion of space and depth was incredible. A gorgeous chandelier was hoisted up to the middle of the theater and literally swung over the audience.

A remarkable cast led by Howard McGillan (Phantom), Sarah Pfisterer (Christine) and Jim Weitzer (Raoul) captivated the audience with beautiful voices singing songs of tragic dark and pure love. Both Pfisterer and Weitzer previously played these roles at the Majestic before the show left to tour the United States.

From costume design to sound, from set design to acting, "The Phantom of the Opera" was incredible. I felt the chill in my spine, the tears in my eyes and the joy in my heart. The show was everything a magical Broadway show should be and I became freshly aware of why I am so enamored of the stage. My New York experience would have fallen drastically short of my expectations if I hadn't succumbed to the crazy whim of standing in the back of the theater.

Power of one: Kasdan loses by one vote

One vote prevents Kasdan from obtaining a Council seat while Sorber captures 16 percent of the Borough mayoral race

Despite strong efforts with the voter registration drive, intense campaigning and 13 hours of standing in the cold on Election Day, write-in candidates Nathan Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03 lost the election for mayor and the two-year ward III Borough Council seat, respectively.

In what proved to be a close election, Kasdan lost to Republican Peter Bergonia by only one vote. Bergonia won with 95 votes and Kasdan received 94. Democrat Steven Beattie had 53 votes.

"Obviously, Matthew Kasdan received the student vote and I received the vote of the permanent residents of ward III," Bergonia said.

As of yesterday, Kasdan had not decided whether or not he will ask for a recount of the votes.

According to Kasdan, a little over a hundred students came to vote in ward III. However, approximately 20 were not able to vote due to paperwork problems.

"I was disappointed that more students didn't come out to vote, especially because it was so close," Kasdan said.

Sorber feels Kasdan's close election will serve as a lesson to students.

"I can't imagine a more educational lesson to our students that every vote counts. It is really important that if you believe in something, you should vote," Sorber said.

Although a few more votes could have given Kasdan the win, he still appreciates the students' support.

"The most enjoyable part of this process was seeing the united support of the student body as a whole behind my candidacy," Kasdan said.

Despite Kasdan's loss, he feels that it was a good learning experience.

"I am glad that I went throughout the process. I still feel that I would have been instrumental in office because I would have built bridges between the campus, administration and community as a whole," Kasdan said.

Kasdan also believes the election taught him a lot about politics.

"I learned the importance of having a strong front and not to back down from any of your issues that you're standing behind," Kasdan said.

After talking with candidates throughout the week and especially on Election Day, Kasdan was also able to get a sense of Lewisburg politics.

"It was really interesting to see how small town politics work with how vindictive people are," Kasdan said.

Republican Judy Wagner, the winner of the four-year ward III seat, believes that she benefited from speaking with Kasdan on Tuesday.

"I really enjoyed dealing with Matthew [Tuesday] and I got to know him. It helped to open communication with students. I always think we have a start, now we should keep going. I am developing some ideas for more organized dialogue," Wagner said.

Kasdan also anticipates that this election will be a start to improve the relationship between students and the town.

"The election showed that students aren't apathetic and that we really do care about the town. We want to increase student involvement and we want to improve town relations," Kasdan said.

Even though Kasdan did not win the seat, he expects the election will allow him to play a more integral role in town-gown relations.

"I think my role with town-gown relations will be a lot stronger with all of the connections with the Borough Council," Kasdan said. "They voiced to me that they want me to be involved with relations. By me running, it shows that I'm really passionate about this and that I will give my all to improve relations."

BSG addresses all student concerns

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

Students often complain that they are not given enough opportunities to voice their opinions and concerns about University life. The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) hopes to remedy this situation with their newest campus project, aimed at providing students with a chance to speak out.

The current BSG project is an attempt to find out what issues are most important to students. By compiling a list of student concerns, and giving everyone a chance to voice their opinion.

The list of concerns is being compiled from several sources. Large graffiti boards asking students to write down their concerns were posted in the academic buildings and the LC, and smaller boards were posted in dorms. Members of BSG also spent time in the LC during prime meal hours, interviewing random students about their concerns. BSG also contacted the Office of Housing and Residential Life and arranged for resident assistants to meet with students to discuss issues and report back to BSG.

The list compiled is very large and includes a variety of concerns. The issues most frequently brought up were cable, dining service issues like pricing and availability of meal credit, public safety, on-campus parking and the elimination of the wrestling program.

The goal of the project is to identify the issues, large and small, that students really want addressed, rather than focusing on one or two large issues that the majority of the student body may not truly be concerned with. BSG also hopes to establish a lasting record of the issues students want addressed which will not be affected as positions change, students graduate and new students arrive on campus.

All members of BSG, including several different subcommittees, have worked on this project. Both the Public Affairs Committee and the Student Affairs Committee have "taken the initiative to actively enforce this project," according to Jessica Briski '04, a BSG representative. Katie Kohn '03, chair of the Public Affairs Committee who has been involved primarily with the graffiti boards, stresses that BSG President Nate Sorber '02 also played an important role in initiating the project.

Kohn says she hopes that this effort to reach out to students will help BSG to pursue more of the issues that students believe are important. "I feel like this will open up BSG to work on different sorts of projects and to close the gap between the student body and our organization," she says.

Briski says she sees the new project as creating a system of "checks and balances" where BSG can go back to the original document, see what it has done and see what still needs to be addressed.

"Students see this project as positive because they get to express themselves," Briski said.

According to Kerry O'Donnell '04, chair of the Student Affairs Committee who is responsible for addressing all of the listed concerns, BSG is currently working on many of the issues that have been brought up. She believes that students feel that their individual concerns are being taken seriously.

"We hope to make the campus a place where students are happy to reside," O'Donnell said. "Often the administration gets caught up in the big picture. That's when it's BSG's job to step in and address the smaller, equally important issues of students' everyday lives."

DeCerchio elected new Township supervisor

By Meredith Atkinson

Director of Public Safety DeCerchio is the supervisor-elect of East Buffalo Township.

Vince DeCerchio (R), Director of Public Safety, ran virtually unopposed for East Buffalo Town Supervisor in last Tuesday's election. His opponent, James Deiffenderfer, did not declare his candidacy for the position until a week before the election, while DeCerchio's decision to run had been known since April.

The East Buffalo Town Supervisor's Board consists of three elected officials. The other two supervisors are Lawson Fetterman and Henry Baylor. DeCerchio will be replacing Morris Herman, who did not seek re-election.

DeCerchio explained that the responsibility of the town supervisor is to "operate the municipality like a manager, and supervise every aspect such as roads, zoning, maintenance, law enforcement and every aspect of governing a small community."

"I am not running because I see a need for radical changes, but rather because I can provide a vision for the community," DeCerchio said. "This region needs to remain economically viable, kept environmentally sound; we want to preserve rural and agricultural character and control sprawl."

The newly elected Supervisor continued that there is a need for "an intelligent 20 year development plan" and said "some communities lose character by not effectively dealing with sprawl."

DeCerchio moved to Lewisburg from outside Philadelphia 12 years ago. "The opportunity to participate in local government is exciting," he said. "It's like being part of our nation 200 years ago. You don't have this type of opportunity in a big city."

Dean Badal looks to inspire emerging leaders on campus

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

If vision, determination and dedication are words to describe one of the University's finest, most would agree they describe Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal. As the newest member of the Dean of Students staff, Badal has already proven that she is a success. Through her active participation as the first-year students' class advisor, the coordinator of an unprecedented campus leadership conference and the advisor to the University's leadership group Emerging Leaders, Badal has demonstrated to faculty, staff and students that she is serious about what she came here to do.

Her position as an assistant dean was specifically designed for her to work with students in the areas of leadership, community service and first-year orientation. In addition, Badal will assume even more community service and orientation responsibilities when Ruth Burnham, fellow assistant dean of students, retires next year.

"The assistant dean of students position interested me because it was an opportunity to work with a variety of areas, and each of these areas involves a high level of student contact," she said. "It is the interaction with students that I enjoy most."

Formerly at the University of Georgia in the Office of Greek Life, Badal most notably created a leadership program that served over also views the election as step toward better relations.

"There are things going on that have motivated students to become involved in the democratic process," Krohn said.

"I absolutely think it's appropriate for students to be involved in that way. Now that the election is over, I hope students understand that they don't have to come to the Borough Council meetings to be heard. Four out of eight Borough Council members live in wards with significant student populations. I'm one of them and I welcome students contacting me with concerns," she continued.

Mayor Lewis Hendricks hopes to amend town-gown relations by holding meetings with the Bucknell Student Government.

"My door is always open to Bucknell. We aren't going to hurt students who are good. We are going to come down on the bad ones," Hendricks said.

Bergonia also is willing to serve his constituents.

"It is always a privilege to observe democracy in action. It is unfortunate that Bucknell students feel they do not receive equal representation. I am always willing to hear from the people I represent and would certainly bring their concerns to the board," Bergonia said.

According to Stacy Hinck, winner of the ward I Council seat, it would have been interesting to have Kasdan and Sorber on Council.

"I was impressed with Matthew and Nate. I was impressed with how organized they were [Tuesday] at the polls. They really did their homework and they were well informed," Hinck said.

This organization helped Sorber to garner the ward III vote against Hendricks and former Mayor Mike Molesevich. Sorber captured 95 votes, while Hendricks and Molesevich received 83 and 64 votes respectively.

Sorber gained 18 votes in ward I, 40 in ward II and 24 in ward IV.

Hendricks commends Sorber for his race.

"He had a good showing. He was running against me, an incumbent, and Molesevich, who was mayor for four years. I think he did excellent," Hendricks said.

"I knew we had an uphill battle," Sorber said.

Despite his and Kasdan's loss, Sorber still sees a positive side.

"From my end and Matthew's end, we ran a positive campaign," Sorber said.

Kasdan praises Sorber's dedication and campaign efforts.

"I really look up to Nate with how he devoted himself to his cause for the candidacy for mayor. His incredible commitment from initiating the voter registration drive to being the driver of the shuttle to take students to the voting polls on Election Day was quite remarkable. Nate along with the team of students working on his campaign have poured themselves into his campaign for mayor, which really would have done so much to improve relations between the university community and the town," Kasdan said.

Like Kasdan and many of the Council members, Sorber believes this election is a start to a good future.

"I see the future of where we are going the right way. We need to keep students politically involved in Lewisburg," Sorber said.

Residents elect new and old faces on Borough government

By Rachel Laskow
Associate Editor

After waiting longer than usual Tuesday evening because of numerous write-in candidates, the winners of the mayoral and Borough Council elections were announced.

Incumbent Mayor Lewis Hendricks (R) won the mayoral election with 531 votes against Democrat Mike Molesevich and write-in Nathan Sorber '02. Molesevich garnered 422 votes, while Sorber received 177 votes.

"It was the most exciting race in my 30 years as a public official. It was the best one I've ever had. It was a good win," Hendricks said.

In ward I, Democrat Stacy Hinck beat Republican Ronald Kerstetter with 135 votes. Kerstetter had 83 votes.

Declared write-in candidate Yvonne Morgan (R) lost the ward II seat to Republican Michael Moore, with 77 votes and 134 votes respectively. Their other competitor, Democrat Richard Smith, received 67 votes.

The two-year ward III seat proved to be an exciting race with Republican Peter Bergonia beating write-in Matthew Kasdan '03 by only one vote. Bergonia got 95 votes. The other candidate, Democrat Steven Beattie, received 53 votes.

> "There are many issues facing the council ... my main goal is to promote unity in our neighborhood.
> —Peter Bergonia (R), ward III councilman

Bergonia anticipates continuing the work he began when he was appointed to the Council. This work includes overseeing streets, sidewalks and lighting in the Borough.

"There are many issues facing the council. I have had the privilege of working with dedicated individuals who come together for the common good of the community. My main goal is to promote unity in our neighborhoods," Bergonia said.

Receiving almost 72 percent of the vote, Republican Judy Wagner won the four-year ward III Council seat. She obtained 118 votes, while Democrat Julianna Cooper had 46 votes.

"I'm very pleased that I will work for all of the residents of ward three," Wagner said.

Democrat Swan Stull ran unopposed for the ward IV, gaining 236 votes.

The results are unofficial and will be certified later today.

Alcohol awareness inspires campus

By Michelle Dombeck
Staff Writer

Alcohol Awareness Week concludes today, after having a successful program. This week-long program, which ran from Monday through Friday, was to encourage people to be mature with their management of alcohol.

Roy Baker, associate dean of Students, feels that this week represents something larger than what it may originally seem.

"There are very few opportunities, at Bucknell or any other institution, where the Interfraternity Council (IFC) and Panhellenic Council vote unanimously to do something of this magnitude," Baker said.

Because this national event fell during Fall Break, Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol (GAMMA) decided to hold its own week.

"National Alcohol Education week normally is observed in October, so the IFC and Panhellenic decided to have our own alcohol week," Baker said. "They did something extraordinary. They pledged to not drink this week, attend or host an event where alcohol was being served. This has probably never happened before."

> "Hopefully this week will help everyone realize what alcohol management is about.
> —Julia Woodard '05

Baker feels that the University's Greek system will take this pledge seriously.

"Based on the discussion that I have witnessed in IFC and the Panhellenic Association, each president made the agreement on behalf of his or her fraternity or sorority," Baker said. "It's their job to make sure that their members abide by this agreement, but if IFC or Panhellenic learn that any organization, or any members, violate this agreement, they will hold that organization responsible."

One of the more touching events during this week happened as representatives from each fraternity and sorority chapter dressed in all black. Each person participating in this Black-Out Day represented someone who died last year due to alcohol-related events.

People in the University, Greek and non-Greek alike, can view this as a symbol of what alcohol could stand for. Julia Woodard '05, even though not involved in the Greek system, feels that this week can apply to the entire University community.

"Both Greeks and non-Greeks should realize the importance of this event. People who aren't in fraternities and sororities do drink, and they need to manage their alcohol consumption as well," said Woodard. "Hopefully this week will help everyone realize what alcohol management is about."

Baker hopes that what people will take from this week is that alcohol is a drug and has the potential to do harm.

"One of the goals of this week was to raise people's awareness. It's not about not drinking—it's about drinking responsibly," Baker said. "Alcohol is a drug and, if not managed properly, has the potential to kill."

Badal encourages leadership opportunities

500 Greek students as well as developed and advised eight different leadership programs. With a background in Communications as an undergraduate student, her masters in College Student Personnel Services, and lastly, a Ph.D. in Counseling and Student Personnel Services, Badal brings impressive expertise to her field. Over the years, she has demonstrated her passion for leadership through coordinating conferences and teaching leadership classes to overseeing and advising a plethora of student groups.

"Bucknell has an incredible staff of deans, and Dean Badal is no exception," said Jennifer Butler '03, who has worked with Badal on various leadership projects. "She has served only to strengthen the already well-respected dean staff. She was hired to do what she does best: inspire greatness in others."

Badal's extensive experience with leadership programs is apparent to students. "Even in the few months that she has been assistant dean of students, Dean Badal has brought initiative and progress to the leadership efforts on campus," Danielle Hykes '02 said.

Hykes, a college leader within the Emerging Leaders program, sees Badal's goal as getting as many students as possible involved in leadership opportunities.

"My goals for students who participate in the programs are to help them gain confidence, teach them valuable leadership skills and encourage them to get involved in other activities on campus," Badal said. "I have found the students to be extremely considerate, respectful and very receptive to the new initiatives I have implemented."

One of the programs she has restructured is Emerging Leaders. This an eight-week instructive course is designed to improve students' personal growth and leadership development. Those interested must make the commitment to attend all eight sessions, two of which include a retreat and a closing banquet. This program has proven very successful, especially among first-year students.

"My hope is that when students complete the program they have a deeper sense of self and an increased understanding of who they are as leaders," Badal said.

Jackie Kordiak '02, who has worked with Badal, agrees that the leadership program has helped University students.

"Emerging Leaders offers students lifelong skills that will only serve to benefit them in their future endeavors. Programs that are geared toward the incoming class are a great way to encourage those students to accept leadership roles during their time here at Bucknell," Kordiak said.

The Student Leadership Conference, held last month, was another leadership opportunity that emerged from Badal's office. With over 60 students in attendance, this conference focused on time-management, leadership styles, group dynamics and more.

"Her Student Leadership Conference was a great success. Dean Badal has made leaps and bounds in terms of increasing our awareness of the importance of leadership and service in our college community," Hykes said.

In addition to leadership initiatives, Badal has made strides regarding student involvement within the local community. Part of her job is to inform the campus of local needs as well as to facilitate students and student groups in taking part in service opportunities.

"My hope is to encourage more students to get involved in volunteerism, " she said. "It is important for all students to realize the importance of serving others and giving back to the communities of which they are a part."

Hykes believes Badal's interest in leadership and service will be beneficial for the University.

"Dean Badal's passion for leadership and service is evident in everything she does," Hykes said. "And this passion will invigorate others to get involved. Dean Badal will surely do great things for Bucknell's leadership over the next few years."

Though she is relatively new to her position, the University and its environment, Badal seems to be adjusting well. Her positive impact on the students is apparent in just her first few months on campus, and she has established herself as an effective assistant dean.

Pete Van Emburgh
Editor-in-Chief

After more than a year as editor-in-chief, I am now facing the end of my tenure leading The Bucknellian. As the newspaper reaches newsstands today, I feel both a strong sense of relief along with nostalgia.

As the most educational experience of my life, the past year has been far from uneventful.

The 27 issues that I have guided have provided me with plenty of highs and lows as the editor-in-chief. After only my second week as co-editor-in-chief, The Bucknellian was dealt an embarrassing blow to its integrity.

On Nov. 2, 2000, we inadvertently printed the infamous and extremely offensive "Proof of Gas Chambers?" also commonly referred to as the "Holocaust Denial" advertisement.

Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

While it may have been the most stressful time as editor, I can now look back at the experience in a positive light. It was an awful oversight by the staff and myself, but with the hard work of my former Co-Editor-in-Chief Heather Napolitano '01 and our Adviser Jim Lee, we acted swiftly and responsibly to the criticism.

Our response to the scandal actually ended up garnering national recognition and respect, notably from the Anti-Defamation League. The experiences I underwent personally taught me a lot about crisis management and I will never forget the lessons I learned about social responsibility. Regardless, the strength and maturity demonstrated by the Editorial Board made me proud to be associated with The Bucknellian.

On a lighter note,I made a conscious effort to continually work to improve all aspects of our publication. Last December, the 105-year-old Bucknellian was delivered to the newsracks in color for the first time. The application of color was a significant achievement that was assisted by the research and hard work of many former Bucknellian editors.

Arriving back to Lewisburg in January, we made the decision to investigate a more reliable and professional printing facility—so we turned to The Daily Item located in Sunbury. I cannot express enough gratitude to the patience of the staff at the Item—I believe we have truly forged a strong relationship between the two organizations that often goes overlooked. The Bucknellian would not have reached the present level of stylistic quality without their assistance.

The Bucknellian has reached even higher heights of quality not only stylistically but also in the content over the past year. The growth of the paper has mirrored my own personal growth working on the newspaper. I will always remember the pressure of deadlines, the late hours, the conflict resolution sagas, goal-setting and most importantly, the elite group of people I've had the opportunity to work with.

The highlight of my career has been display of professionalism by my staff the day of the horrific Sept. 11 attacks. While everyone was trying to cope with the terror of the events, my staff quickly impressed me. The news section immediately scrapped its agenda in order to cover all angles of the incidents.

Writers and editors together composed thoughtful articles and produced an inspiring issue. I will never forget the rapid response of my colleagues, including that of past editors-in-chief, and I only wish that the campus community had recognized their tremendous endeavor.

Even though the position has taken away from my normal life, I thank all of you that have provided me with the support necessary to continue working with this establishment. I extend my gratitude to the entire campus community for all of the criticisms, comments and praise over the past year. Thanks to the campus community for constantly challenging me to do my best.

Most of all, I give thanks to the people that have helped the paper a success over the course of the year: my predecessor, Brian Watson '01, who served as a tremendous mentor in my transition from news editor to editor-in-chief. His guidance and valued advice was an invaluable asset to my own personal success throughout the entire year.

Rachel Laskow '03 has demonstrated enormous talent and dedication this semester in the new position of associate editor—I could not have dreamed of anyone more effective in this capacity.

Jim Leahy '03 has served as an instrumental utility of the technological advancements of The Bucknellian the past two semesters and I admire his will to constantly look toward improvements. Maureen Oscadal '03 has also served as a key asset as co-managing editor with her patient demeanor and persistent assistance to the needs of the paper.

Last, but certainly not least, The Bucknellian Adviser Jim Lee has provided colossal guidance as a supporter and friend. I truly admire his wit, intelligence and enormous dedication during even the hardest of times for The Bucknellian. His efforts often go unnoticed, but I am certainly grateful for what he has helped me become as a worker, manager and individual.

The credit of The Bucknellian's success, however, relies on the exemplary devotion of the many editors, writers, photographers and production staff that make each issue a learning experience for us all.

It's strange to think that I will no longer have the responsibility of the student-run campus newspaper resting on my shoulders. I will always look back on my effort with absolute pride—this position was the most challenging task I have ever undertaken in my life and at the same time, the most fulfilling.

Construction progresses

Construction continues on the O'Leary Psychology and Geology Center which will house the departments currently spread across campus. The building is planned to be completed in the fall of 2002.

DeCerchio was also on the Advisory Board for Riverwoods and the Sun Area Career and Technical Center. East Buffalo Township Supervisor is DeCerchio's first publicly elected position.

DeCerchio received 590 votes.

"My knowledge about Bucknell would certainly help the supervisors in making decisions, "DeCerchio said. "I don't want my work here to conflict with or bias my decisions."

Because the University is split—part of it is in East Buffalo Township, while the other part is in Lewisburg—DeCerchio recognized that conflict of interest issues might arise.

"I hope that we will operate in an efficient fashion so that all of the constituents are well represented, including those living on campus."

Public Safety Log

October 31, 2001

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—Public Safety observed a female student carrying a can of beer at the entrance to Sigma Chi. The student was determined to be under the age of 21. A citation was issued for underage consumption.

November 1, 2001

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE ACT 64—Public Safety responded to the New Residence Hall for the report of a drug violation. Upon investigation, the officers determined the report to be unfounded. A University road sign was located in the elevator of the building. No witnesses could be located in a search of the area.

November 2, 2001

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) had painted an obscene object on the interior stairwell of Hunt Hall. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION—Public Safety responded to Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity (SPE) for the report of an altercation with Sigma Chi brothers over property that did not belong to the house. One student claimed that he was punched in the face, but refused medical treatment. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded to SPE and determined that the individuals involved in the incident were not present. The group dispersed and university officials were notified. Charges are pending.

November 3, 2001

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—UCC requested Public Safety to assist Lewisburg Police Department on S. Seventh Street at Smith Hall with two students who admitted to consuming alcohol although under the age of 21. The students were charged with underage consumption.

ACT 64 / MARIJUANA—An R & P Officer, while conducting a routine "pat down" search at the front entrance to the Fieldhouse for the Live Concert, found a small glass bottle containing what appeared to be marijuana in the pocket of a student. The student acknowledged the contents as marijuana. East Buffalo Township Police Department notified. Criminal charges are pending. Public Safety issued a citation.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—Public Safety at the Live Concert stage area of the Fieldhouse escorted a male that was body surfing outside to obtain identification. The male attempted to run away, but was apprehended after wrestling with the Public Safety officer. Upon investigation, the male was found to be a student. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified. The student was charged with disorderly conduct.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—Public Safety who was monitoring the Live Concert observed a visitor fighting with the crowd. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded and charged the male with disorderly conduct.

INFORMATION—Public Safety responded to the Fieldhouse to assist with a visitor who was reported to be groping a female at the concert. The female did not wish to file charges and the visitor was escorted by Public Safety off campus.

ACT 64 / MARIJUANA—Public Safety found two plastic bags, a plastic film canister, both containing a small amount of a green leafy material, and a metal smoking pipe on the floor of the front lobby of the Fieldhouse where the "pat-down" search for the Live concert was conducted. The identity of the responsible person(s) are unknown. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified. The incident is under investigation.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) dented the trunk of her vehicle at two different times between 11/2/01 and 11/4/01 while parked in the Sigma Alpha Mu Fraternity parking lot. Lewisburg Police Department was notified. The incident is under investigation.

November 5, 2001

INFORMATION / SUSPICIOUS MAIL—Public Safety reported to Dana Engineering for the report of suspicious looking mail. The mail was opened in a controlled setting and determined to be safe. The owner of the mail instructed Public Safety to destroy the letters.

Online course registration process urged

With the first week of course registration week coming to a close, students are once again frustrated with the long lines in Marts Hall, closed classes and overall, the stressful process.

Despite being ranked 18 on Yahoo's Most Wired Colleges list, The Bucknellian urges the University to explore the option of online registration.

We recognized the achievements of the online Capstone pre-registration process and we hope that the Registrar's Office will soon implement a more efficient, online registration process. The ease of this process should serve as a benchmark for future registration improvements.

With the online Capstone pre-registration process, seniors had the opportunity to go online and rank the classes in order of preference for next semester. Fast and efficient, the process was applauded by most seniors who got one of their top choices.

The regular course registration process is more complex and involved, but we feel that the University should make an online implementation a priority for the future.

The Editorial Board foresees an online process that could still be structured around the existing framework.

For example, only students scheduled in the particular time slot can log on to sign up for classes. Students can view their schedule immediately, switch classes instantaneously if a class has been closed and the process could be done in the privacy of one's room or in a computer lab.

There would not be lines stretching from one end of Marts Hall to the other and far less students would be overwhelmed with the frustration of the inefficient registration procedure.

We recognize, however, the many potential downfalls and challenges that would need to be addressed. First, the University would need a powerful and fast computer system to complement the process.

It seems obvious that if a student's time slot were from 1-1:30 p.m. to sign up, every student within the same time slot would be trying to register at 1:01 p.m. This could cause enormous online traffic congestion or problems.

Even worse, the process would be in total jeopardy if there were a computer glitch that could harm many possibilities. Also, the Registrar's Office would need to devise a procedure for how students would obtain permission for certain courses or how students will display their academic adviser's approval.

While our biggest fear is the potential for a massive computer glitch, it is important to note that the process is computerized. The sense of fear is understandable because the results of a glitch could cause a nightmare for many campus community members. However, the chance of a serious glitch has already existed with our present system.

The University needs to investigate how many other schools across the nation utilize an online registration process. Most colleges and universities that have implemented an online process are substantial in student body size, but we feel that the efficiency of the process would be a significant advancement in the operations of the University.

Championship results omitted

To the Editor:

I was surprised and disturbed upon opening the "Sports" section in last week's edition, as there seemed to be a glaring omission. Apparently, the attention given to winning the coveted "President's Cup" of the Patriot League does not extend to one of the programs that has accounted for many of the points accumulated to win honor.

Maybe it was a case of foregone conclusion, as the women's cross country team managed to win their fourth straight Patriot League championship two weeks ago, not to mention having their top runner, Becki Marshall, claim her third consecutive individual crown. Also of note, the women's team managed to take the top three spots in their race, as Chris Crowe (second) and Theresa Dennis (third) managed to garner all-conference honors for the second year, and Kelly McConnell gave the women four of the top 10 with her eighth place finish.

The men's program, while finishing a disappointing second (how many programs here would consider second a disappointment), still had two all-conference runners (first selection Brian Jonhston finishing fifth and second selection Greg Costello finishing seventh).

While cross country may not be the most exciting, spectator-friendly sporting event for the casual fan, one would expect that a school that puts so much emphasis on winning the "All-Sports" trophy would acknowledge those programs that aid in that endeavor. Surely, there would be no such editorial to write if the football or basketball teams were to win the Patriot League.

Not meant as an insult, but few programs at Bucknell can claim to have the success that these teams have had since the start of the Patriot League (or prior, for that matter). With the exception on one season (finishing third), these teams have finished no worse than second in the conference.

Administratively, I find it somewhat ironic that, throughout the university, there have been great measures taken to ensure equity of opportunity for women; however, when something as simple as granting paper space to women presents itself, the ball is dropped.

Kevin Weatherill

Cross Country deserves attention

To the Editor:

The University has enjoyed the success and acclaim of its cross country program for decades. As a matter of fact, this group of talented athletes and exceptional students has always brought the University a great deal of pride, often without asking much in return. After all, running is not a great spectator sport, and cross country meets will almost never draw a comparable crowd to football, soccer and basketball unless one were to factor in the parents of those participating. That being said, I am not going to ask for our own Midnight Madness. It would be kind of nice, however, if our results were reported in your paper when we have a women's team that won the Patriot League title by a ridiculous amount, and a men's team that finished second. As a student newspaper, it is your job to report all of the school sports results, regardless of whether or not they win Patriot League titles. When you leave anyone particularly in spite of their success, it is insulting. Furthermore, you are not publishing for profit or doing in-depth coverage of national news. You report the sports results. You cover the basics. Rather, you are supposed to cover the basics. I do not care about Bill Buckner or some kid's false prediction on the outcome of the Steelers-Ravens game, but I would be pleased to see our results, and maybe (if you would indulge me) some brief commentary or a picture in place of or in addition to the front page photo and article about the team that lost. In short, please just write it up when we compete in a League championship. Otherwise, if there is indeed a concern about the University using too much paper, just scrap The Bucknellian.

LGBT board responses

To the Editor:

Recently there were graffiti boards up on campus, some relating to LGBT (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender) issues and human rights. They were posted by the members of FLAGBT (Friends of Lesbians and Gays, Bisexual, Transgender) before National Coming Out Week to help promote awareness on these issues. Here's some of what you had to say (last years responses are bolded to compare):

Did you choose your sexuality?
"I still have not chosen."
"Everybody chooses, even if they choose not to tell, everybody."
"I'm gay but I did not choose to be so. Believe me, life would be a lot easier if I could have chosen to be heterosexual!"
"It's natural to be gay."
"It's natural but you can choose."
"Why is homosexuality an issue? Get over yourselves. We all have different choices, accept them."
"No, God did! Praise him!"

What were you taught about heterosexuality and homosexuality?
"A lot more than the rest of the kids here."
"Well according to 'Will and Grace' all homosexuals are good-looking, rich, successful, shameless nymphomaniacs"—"As a stark contrast to, oh, I don't know, 'Sex in the City'"
"Both are good and tolerable. They are a fact of life."
"It's their right."
"God made Adam and Eve not Adam and Steve!"

When did you realize you were straight?
"I haven't."
"When I was born."

How is Bucknell as a campus tolerant of LGBT students?
"What is LGBT?"
"LGBT = Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, students."
"Um ... we have an office!"
"LGBT students are not something to 'tolerate' ... to me they are my family, friends, and peers :)"
"We're so tolerant it's sick"
"People don't care anymore, it's the 21st Century!"

How do you think your parents would react if you came out to them?
"They would disown me!"
"OK"
"They would try their best to make me straight. Jesus knows being gay is a sin and all gays will go to hell if they don't become normal again."

What would your reaction be if your sibling told you he/she was in a same-sex relationship?
"Rad."
"Good for them but its not my cup of tea."
"I'd beat his ass."
"I would be grateful that they had enough balls to come out and support them."

We thought the responses were quite positive despite some disheartening remarks. Unfortunately, there appears to have been more positive response from last year (all of which are not listed), that were supportive towards LGBT people.

The full story on women and alcohol

The effect and many risks of alcohol abuse for women differ from those for men

By Jessica Friedman
Contributing Writer

Why is it that like so many other current health issues today, most of the important information about alcohol consumption is based on men and its effects on the male body despite the crucial differences in the way it affects males and females? There are many misconceptions about these differences, and at the root of this problem may be nothing more than simple ignorance. However, ignorance becomes especially dangerous at a university like ours, where binge drinking is increasingly prevalent among both men and women.

Many students are willing to acknowledge that there is a problem with alcohol on our campus, but there is a general lack of desire to take individual responsibility for their actions. It seems ridiculous to blame drinking on hard classes or the fact that University "is in the middle of nowhere ... what else are we supposed to do?"

The Women's Resource Center recently conducted a graffiti board campaign that gathered responses and opinions on women's alcohol consumption, binge-drinking and other issues surrounding alcohol use on our campus. The campaign was prompted by the apparent failure to realize that drinking among women represents a different kind of problem than drinking among men. Drinking affects women's bodies differently than men's bodies, and at the same time, women become more vulnerable to sexual assault and negative stereotyping when consuming alcohol.

Despite the fact that drinking, and especially binge-drinking, in social situations may indeed put women at risk, why are University women still sacrificing their health and well-being to drink? It probably has to do with an "it won't happen to me" kind of mindset. Women on their way to a party on Friday night do not expect to end up in a situation that puts their health or safety at risk, yet many women are finding themselves in compromised circumstances.

Peer pressure appears to be a large contributing factor, as evidenced by comments on the graffiti boards like, "Every chic knows if you want to be cool, you drink," and "they do it to fit in with everyone else." Freshmen women are especially vulnerable to peer pressure, since they are being exposed for the first time to the pressures of college life and wanting to make friends and "be cool."

Along with consideration of many of the issues related specifically to women's alcohol consumption, we also have to face the problem of binge-drinking in general on our campus. What are some of the factors that put University students at risk for this type of alcohol abuse? First of all, many students do not know what binge drinking actually is. It is defined, for women, as being the consumption of four or more alcoholic drinks in a row at least once in a two-week period, and six drinks in a row for men. One drink means 12 ounces of beer (one can), five ounces of wine (just over a half cup) or 11/2 ounces of hard liquor, none of which are easy to estimate because most alcohol is served in miscellaneous containers, like those infamous red plastic cups.

Many students are willing to acknowledge that there is a problem with alcohol on our campus, but there is a general lack of desire to take individual responsibility for their actions. It seems ridiculous to blame drinking on hard classes or the fact that University "is in the middle of nowhere ... what else are we supposed to do?" How many students honestly came to the University expecting the academics to be a cakewalk? Hopefully students are here to learn and challenge their minds, not to numb their brains with intoxicating substances. Most students realized when they came here that the University was not in a metropolitan area. Comments like "I can't be social without it," "it's forbidden, [therefore] we do it," and "it's not a drinking problem, it's a drinking solution," do not represent viable excuses for drinking irresponsibly. In fact, these comments reflect a passive attitude and a refusal to take responsibility for one's actions or feelings.

Why is there special concern for women and alcohol? Many women may be unaware of how the female body reacts to and processes alcohol. For the most part, women tend to get drunk more easily and a lot faster than men, even given comparable body weight or size, due to the physiological differences in how men and women metabolize alcohol. One of the reasons for this is that the male body is composed of a higher percentage of water (due to a naturally higher muscle mass), which causes the alcohol to become more diluted in the bloodstream. Therefore, if women have a higher concentration of alcohol in their blood, it will reach the brain faster and have more profound effects, resulting in intoxication at lower doses.

Alcohol consumption is a problem for both men and women on this campus, but there needs to be an increased awareness of the dangers that alcohol use poses for women in particular.

Recent research has revealed that the enzyme present in the stomach, alcohol dehydrogenase, which breaks down the toxic ethanol into a less harmful substance, is 70-80 percent less effective in women than in men. The result of this is that a woman will absorb about 30 percent more alcohol into her blood than a man of the same weight. Since the female body takes longer to process a given amount of alcohol than the male body, the effects of alcohol on women will also be longer lasting. As if this isn't enough, a woman's ability to metabolize alcohol is affected by her menstrual cycle, such that intoxication will occur more rapidly than usual right before her period.

What about the more serious long-term risks of alcohol use? Besides the obvious dangers of excessive drinking such as alcohol poisoning and blackouts, there are additional health risks that are unique to women. Many emotional issues are also bound up in one's decision to use alcohol. Feelings of depression often precede alcohol use, which is often used as a temporary escape. Combining alcohol with prescription drugs is also 50 percent more common in women, and can result in serious dangers such as impairment of mental or motor activities that are more severe than those caused by alcohol use alone. Alcohol use also seriously compromises the body's ability to use vitamins and calcium, and long-term use can lead to dull skin and hair, and a greater risk for osteoporosis.

Most individuals who choose to use alcohol realize that alcohol, which is almost completely sugar, is not a nutritious substance let alone a healthy alternative to a meal. Sadly, though, many women skip meals before partying to make up for the empty calories they will be consuming later. This can make them even more susceptible to the dangers that alcohol impairment can cause.

Women are at increased risk for sexually transmitted diseases, unwanted sexual activity and unplanned pregnancies when their drinking is out of control. Because alcohol impairs one's judgment and motor skills, women who are intoxicated are less likely to make good decisions, use appropriate contraceptives and resist unwelcome sexual advances.

Alcohol consumption is a problem for both men and women on this campus, but there needs to be an increased awareness of the dangers that alcohol use poses for women in particular.

Student voters fail to support University

By Jason Rubinstein
News Editor

I spent most of my day Tuesday at Lewisburg High School helping Matthew Kasdan's efforts in winning a seat on the Borough Council. In fact, I was one of the few students who chose to help in the unprecedented campaign. The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) registered hundreds of students last month to vote in this week's election. For the first time there was a good chance of success if there were to be a fair turnout of students.

Throughout the day, I had the privilege to observe many residents, including the election volunteers. One in particular ranked as the bitterest old woman I have ever met in my entire life. She was extremely rude each time a shuttle of students came to vote, acting as if they did not belong there. When I tried to speak to her, she would blatantly ignore me. Of course I can understand her stereotype of University students, as we all have our own stereotypes of townfolk. A new goal for the election became for Kasdan to succeed simply to piss her off.

In the weeks approaching the election, there was a lot of skepticism regarding the chance of either student winning. There were even many students against Kasdan or Sorber holding positions on the borough government.

My simple argument was "why shouldn't they?" The influence and numbers that the University has on Lewisburg is reason alone for students to have a political representation. This is why I decided to dedicate my time to the campaign.

As Election Day progressed, the student turnout looked disappointing. I decided to start going door-to-door at the downhill dorms. I found about 25 students who registered but had not voted. It was 7 p.m. and the polls closed at 8. At this point I was begging students to vote, but received responses like "I don't know the issues."

Why should a student care about the town issues in the Lewisburg election? Townfolk are casting their votes, and they certainly don't know our issues. But considering it may be wrong to retaliate in that matter—two wrongs do not make a right—I offered literature to students on each candidate, not only the student candidates. Yet some still refused to even take a look at it. Just save me time and say, "I don't have time."

How could someone not have ten minutes to cast a vote that could make University history? No University student has ever served on Borough Council.

On a more encouraging note, I had the opportunity of meeting several borough councilors, and hearing their point of view on the poor town-gown relations. There seemed to be a lot of inspiration for opening the lines of communication between the town and the University, but this is of course no guarantee of taking action. The fact of a student on the council would automatically initiate better communication. Without student representation on the Council, there is no guarantee of increased communication and cooperation.

Kasdan ended up losing by one vote; I was telling the truth when I told everyone that his or her vote really did count.

Having a single student on the council is in no way taking over the town. BSG wishes to have a non-voting seat on the council, and students seem to show support for this. To have a student on a voting seat really does not change much. The thousands of University students deserve at least one vote on the council.

It is upsetting that the campus could not unite over such a simple idea. Some voted out of ignorance, but most voted to support their best interests. Some did not vote because they felt ignorant, but most didn't vote because they didn't care enough. In the end, I realized I was naïve. I was wrong in thinking that more students would take as much pride in the University as I do.

I hate to admit that the least upsetting outcome of Election Day was that the bitter old volunteer lady won.

Conservative Club offers new perspective

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

The University prides itself on the diversity of both people and thought on campus. Until recently, there was no prominent conservative voice on campus. Instead, the campus was almost completely dominated by liberal political thought. The new Conservative's Club will hopefully bring a balance to the political thought presented to the campus community. As club president Tom Elliot '03 explains, "Any university is lacking without this diversity of intellect."

By bringing conservative speakers to campus and publishing a newsletter, the club will provide a much-needed outlet for questioning the liberal rhetoric that all too often permeates the course material and activities on the campus.

The ideas of free markets and freedom from an intrusive government are ideals that are often neglected in American Universities, specifically liberal arts schools, and the Conservatives' Club will serve to bring these values back to the University. By forcing these ideas back to the surface of the university consciousness, this club can incite new rounds of healthy political debate on campus, which is never a bad thing. Hopefully, it will compel students and faculty to reexamine their political beliefs and possibly even view certain subjects in a new light

By bringing speakers to campus and publishing a newsletter, the club will also serve to dispel some of the myths about conservatives.

The club also supports those conservatives on campus who often feel alienated due to the different political beliefs that they hold. Prior to the formation of the club, conservatives on campus were forced to defend their political ideologies largely on an individual basis. However, with the establishment of the new club, the liberal philosophies presented on campus will be challenged with much more effectiveness.

Finally, the club is important because it can help to further develop students interest in the political affairs, and allow them to maintain contact with the world outside of the "Bucknell Bubble."

Falwell revealed as a reactionary

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

There appears to be a contradiction in the points made by most conservatives regarding Jerry Falwell's comments from the World Trade Center attacks. On the one hand they say that liberals can't condemn his beliefs, but should engage him in a lively debate. Yet, how can a serious debate ever take place without somehow discrediting the opinions of the opposing viewpoint? Should we be asked to continually give attention to a man who has consistently remarked on issues with retroactive propaganda, only to later retract his statements? Can we as educated citizens be allowed to discern from voices that are consistently reactionary and instead focus more attention on the more progressive, and positive parts of our society?

The only real debate is whether we can identify Falwell as a consistently reactionary voice. By looking at the history of this man it is clear that this is the case. Falwell has had a long history of statements and opinions that have raised such an outcry as to cause him to later retract his statements. He praised the apartheid government of South Africa as a bulwark against communism, and called the African National Congress a communist front organization. He deemed Nelsons Mandela, the leader of the organization, to be a Communist sympathizer.

Also, In the late '60s, when Falwell first rose to prominence, he established a private school in response to the Supreme Court's decision to further integrate public schools. In his school, teachers were to swear an oath of "conformity to Biblical inerrancy" which justified his belief that blacks should not go to school with whites because they were sinful and righteous white people should remain separate from them (according to the Bible the story of Noah says that blacks were descendants of Ham and marked for his sins). These were just some of many statements he later retracted, just as he retracted his most recent statement on the World Trade Center attacks.

During the interim I would pose the question of who is responsible for the zealot fundamentalists who take his words to heart. The reason Falwell has not already been tu'ned off in the hearts and minds of most people is that he is a mainstream voice for Protestants in America. Many of his own followers equate him with a prophet of God. But did Moses ever retract his statement that, "Thou shalt not kill," and if he did would it not suggest that Moses rather than God was dictating that commandment.

If some zealots believe that his are the words of God rather than man what will happen when they act on his words and decide to bomb abortion clinics in order to "protect America" from future terrorist attacks? Don't think abortion clinic bombings are a thing of the past, the National Abortion Federation reported that just this past June another abortion clinic in Washington was bombed although it yielded little publicity. The fact that our media reports so little abortion clinic violence doesn't mean it has disappeared. An FBI report from October of last year showed that anti-homosexual hate crimes were on the rise and that every day in America at least three gays and lesbians are targeted for a crime solely due to their sexual orientation. Do not fall under the misconception that just because he retracted his statements he has learned from his mistakes. As of Nov. 6, on his official website (www.falwell.com), he blames a syphilis outbreak on the homosexual activity of the homosexual community there. He has yet to address the fact that heterosexual sex can also lead to the spread of syphilis.

Falwell's statements are fodder for religious fundamentalist bigots, and what's worse is that he has had a record of apologizing for statements steeped in religious intolerance after such statements have already been made, already having persuaded his followers to more bigotry. He must realize that his statements are wrong if he is willing to apologize for the, so then why does he continue to make new ones. Thus, I come back to my conservative colleagues who point out that Falwell should not be condemned, but that his views should be appreciated for arising from a different ethical standard (the Bible). However, John Shelby Spong, who visited the University this past Tuesday, is also a Christian who has devoted numerous years of study to the Bible and thinks what he was offensive.

Even if it were possible to convince Falwell that these statements, which inspire hatred and fear, are immoral to say it wouldn't be worth it because he would just promote another radical message steeped in more hatred. Men like Falwell don't change. I don't suggest that as a society we should silence him, yet I do think we should individually choose to walk away from his hatred. Let's ignore the hate in society and promote the love. Let Falwell make his prattles and let us stand as one country under God, the Goddess, our gods, our goddesses or the absence of God.

U.S. steps up campaign against terrorism

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

It has been one month since Operation Enduring Freedom began, and progress is being made on all fronts of America's new war. From military to diplomatic and financial concerns, the alliance against terrorism continues to hold up. This week advances have been made on all fronts, especially militarily. The increase in the number of special forces soldiers on the ground in Afghanistan has improved the coordination between the Northern Alliance and American forces. These soldiers have also improved the quality of targeting information for American aircraft, allowing for more effective strikes.

Also, NATO is beginning to uphold its pledge to help the United States combat terrorism, as more of its members pledge ground troops for the campaign. Britain has aided the United States since the very beginning of the operations and France pledged troops early into the campaign as well. This week Germany and Italy have pledged a total of 5,600 troops to aid the coalition's efforts in Afghanistan. These commitments fulfill the pledge made by NATO when it invoked Article 5 of the its charter shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11. Under the treaty, "The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all," and shows true solidarity among the member nations in defeating terrorism. Christian Democrat leader, Friedrich Merz said, "It's now about putting solidarity with the Americans into practice," according to washingtonpost.com.

With the help of its allies, the United States has increased the military campaign against the Taliban.

A number of actions have recently been taken both in the United States and abroad to freeze terrorist assets.

According to CNN, President Bush, attending a summit with Eastern European leaders, warned of al-Qaeda's attempts to purchase or manufacture nuclear weaponry in addition to chemical and biological substances. The Washington Times reported that Bush compared the Taliban and Al Qaeda to successors of the Nazi party stating, "We see the same intolerance of dissent, the same mad, global ambitions, the same brutal determination to control every life and all of life," as was seen in Hitler's Germany.

According to CNN, Bush seeks to revitalize the international coalition against terrorism, as support wanes over what is becoming a lengthy bombing campaign by the United States and its allies who have been striking Afghanistan since the Oct. 7.

In addition to the increase in international troops prepared to enter Afghanistan, America has also augmented its commitment, sending in more special forces teams. According to The Washington Post, Secretary of Defense, Donald Rumsfeld told reporters that the United States had doubled the amount of special forces operating inside Afghanistan over the weekend. The United States is also stepping up the air campaign. The U.S. military has begun using 15,000 pound daisy cutter bombs. This bomb is the largest conventional weapon ever produced by the United States, and must be dropped out of a cargo plane due to its massive size and weight. This bomb, known as the BLU-82 floats slowly to the ground, exploding slightly above earth and destroying everything within a 600 yard diameter. It is reported that the blast is similar to the force of a small tactical nuclear weapon.

One month into the campaign, it appears the United States and its allies are finally beginning to attack with the amount of force that will likely produce noticeable results.

Microsoft and Department of Justice reach settlement

Disgruntled states vow to fight on without federal government

Microsoft CEO Steve Balmer and Chairman Bill Gates discuss the settlement with the press.

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

Just last week one would have sworn that Microsoft would be getting off the hook again with a settlement after a fight with the United States Department of Justice that began in the courts on May 18, 1998. But, as the details of the settlement unfolded and the states also suing Microsoft got word of the terms, the deal began to look as if it would fall apart. Currently, the proposed settlement is still under review, and the outcome of the talks between the Justice Department, Microsoft and the 18 states that joined in the fight against the company is uncertain.

On Oct. 31, Microsoft and the United States agreed to the terms of a settlement pact just days before the deadline that was set by Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly of the District Court in the District of Columbia. Almost immediately, the states began looking for more time to review the details of the case in order to make their own decisions on the settlement. However, only three days later, on Nov. 3, executives from Microsoft and lawyers from the Justice Department announced the terms of the settlement to the public.

The terms of the deal between the two parties are what the Justice Department had been looking for over the past few years. According to The New York Times, the company agreed to sign a five-year decree of consent that could be extended if the company violated the agreement. To oversee and verify compliance, a three member advisory panel would be instated and maintained.

> "We always said we would go the extra mile in this case. We are accepting a broad set of requirements, rules and regulations that will govern how we license and market our software."
> —Bill Gates

Another major win for the Justice Department was Microsoft's agreement to eliminate its restrictive contracts and pricing structures that have forced other companies to deal with Microsoft exclusively in the past. The company will also have to share its software architecture more freely with other companies to allow Windows to run more smoothly with competing products. Original Equipment Manufacturers, makers of computers, would have more flexibility in what icons appear on the Windows screen when the computer starts up for the first time.

The deal does fall short of what Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson wanted when he handed down his ruling on Nov. 5, 1999 and his punitive findings on June 7, 2000. According to The New York Times, the company does not have to admit its faults despite Judge Jackson's findings, and it does not have to significantly alter its products. The agreement may fall short of the concessions Microsoft was willing to make when in settlement talks directly after the conclusion of the trial.

However, The Financial Times quoted Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates as saying "We always said we would go the extra mile in this case. We are accepting a broad set of requirements, rules and regulations that will govern how we license and market our software. Aspects of this go beyond the original court's concerns."

The states are showing signs of dissent as the talks over the settlement continue. On Nov. 7, The New York Times reported that nine of the states (New York, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, North Carolina and Wisconsin) would sign the agreement while nine others and the District of Columbia would not.

Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly called the settlement a "license for Microsoft to use its dominance and power to crush its competition" in a The New York Times. He was also quoted in The Boston Globe as saying that the "change in administrations obviously played a role" in creating a settlement in the case.

The dissent threatens the outcome of the case and will make a settlement acceptable to all harder to come by. Judge Kollar-Kotelly will hold hearings in early 2002 on the matter after taking time to analyze the settlement and the complaints and demands by both parties.

All this shows that one thing is truly certain: the case of The United States—and 18 states—versus Microsoft is a case that is nowhere near resolved. The public should look for at least another six months before signs that the three sides are willing to make up and go their separate ways. Until then, expect much bargaining and fighting between Microsoft and the various attorneys general can be expected.

Authorities crackdown on terrorist financial networks

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

In what is being referred to as the most aggressive financial crackdown to date related to Osama bin Laden, authorities raided money exchanges in five U.S. cities. According to MSNBC, the fresh wave of financial strikes includes a new list of financial targets within the United States as well as nine other nations. Foreign assets were targeted in Switzerland, Somalia, Liechtenstein, the Bahamas, Sweden, Canada, Austria, Italy and the United Arab Emirates. CNN reported that the new list contains the names of 62 persons and organizations suspected of having ties to bin Laden. The warrants were executed in Washington, Boston, Minneapolis, Columbus, Ohio and Seattle.

According to MSNBC, these warrants were executed in order to "secure evidence" to connect the individuals and establishments to the suspected terrorists. Wire transfer offices were closed down in Columbus, Minneapolis and Seattle. Two men from Boston and one each from Seattle and Minneapolis were detained as a result of the raid.

According to CNN, notices were taped in the windows of each establishment stating "All property contained in this building is blocked pursuant to an executive order of the President on Sept. 23 of this year under the authority of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act." Many of the people and firms implicated in the crackdown are from Somalia.

At a Treasury Department event on Wednesday, CNN quoted President Bush as saying, "By shutting these networks down, we disrupt the murderers' work." These financial strikes are aimed at disrupting terrorist activities and reducing their capabilities by cutting off their funding. Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill explained that there are now 112 nations with "financial blocking orders," and over $43 million in terrorist assets have been seized.

In Switzerland, police detained two Egyptian financial managers for six hours for questioning before allowing them to return home. According to FOX News, Liechtenstein seized thousands of pages of documents from a manager said to represent the Al Taqua in that country.

Bin Laden has used these networks as well as non-profit organizations to make funds difficult to trace, often using the companies as fronts for purchasing arms and other materials. MSNBC reports that the new wave of seizures are focused on the activities of the Al Taqua and Al Barakaat networks known to have ties to the Al Qaeda terrorist networks. Al Taqua was originally set up several years ago by the Muslim Brotherhood to provide banking services for Muslims.

According to CNN, there are no records in the underground hawala financial system. According to 1999 legislation, hawala agencies, classified as "money services businesses," must register with the Treasury Department by Dec. 31, 2001. As of now, they are not regulated by the government. Nevertheless, they are reportedly able to move thousands of dollars across the globe in a matter of hours. There are some estimates that $6 billion to $8 billion moves through the network every year in the United States alone.

The list of individuals and organizations is available on the Treasury Department's website http://www.ustreas.gov/terrorism.html.

X-Country wins fourth straight PL championship

By Pat Evans
Senior Writer

For the fourth straight season the women's cross-country team captured the Patriot League Championship. Army, the second place finisher in the standings, fell a full 50 points behind the experienced Bison runners. The men's team finished second in the tournament for the second year in a row.

Becki Marshall '02 took her third straight individual championship for the women to lead the Bison to victory.

"I felt pretty strong, which was good and I still have a lot left for the rest of the season now that we've won," she said.

Marshall, who has won three ECAC Athlete of the week awards in the short season, posted a time of 22:40.8 on the 6,000-meter course at Colgate, which was by far the best of the 76-competitor field.

Luckily she didn't even have to worry about the closest runners behind her. For the third straight year the Bison saw its top three individuals finish 1-2-3. Marshall watched teammates Chris Crowe '02 and Theresa Dennis '03 cross the line next to ensure the victory.

Head Coach Kevin Donner was named Patriot League Women's Cross Country Coach of the year after the win.

"Our women have been consistent all season, and I would have to say that today was their best race all year," he said. "I am very happy for the seniors for winning their fourth Patriot League title in a row."

Spotlight Team

The improvement of the runners during the season was a huge factor in the win. The Bison began the season under uncertain terms, and needed some runners to step up to make sure they kept the tradition of a championship cross country team alive.

"Some of the upperclassmen finished low last year, and really came through," Marshall said. "Their improvement helped us out a lot."

Kelly McConnell '02 also broke the top-10 for the Bison, placing eighth in 23:20.8, and making her an All-Patriot League selection. Rounding out the scoring was Kristin Ferrell '02 with a 14th place finish.

For the men's team it was the 12th time in a row that they have finished in the top two in the Patriot League Championship. Bryan Johnston '03 and Greg Costello '03 paced the way for the Bison. After a 16th-place finish last season in the tournament, Johnston's 25:22.4 time placed him fifth, earning him All-Patriot League recognition for the first time. Costello placed seventh, giving him his second all-league title. P.J. Ward '02, Travis Etters '02 and Lou Palma '03 scored for the Bison, but Army edged them out 54-36.

Football outlasts rival Holy Cross 21-14

Bison move to 4-1 in the Patriot League and 6-2 overall in their quest for the League Championship

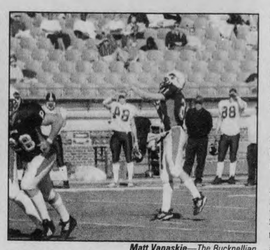
By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

Turning over the ball on the first two possessions of the game was not the way that the Bucknell football team had hoped to start their Patriot League contest against Holy Cross on Saturday. But, the Bison made up for their early mistakes and pulled out a 21-14 victory of the Crusaders to improve to 6-2 overall, and 4-1 in the Patriot League.

Bucknell	21
Holy Cross	14

Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

The Bison moved one step closer to the Patriot League title with a seven-point victory over Holy Cross last Saturday.



Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

Todd Weinrich '03 passed for 234 yards in the win.

The Bison received the opening kickoff only to fumble it on the return, and the Crusaders recovered the ball on the Bucknell 24-yard line. The Bison defense was put to the test early, and continued to play the way that they have been for the entire season by stopping Holy Cross on three straight plays. This forced a 36-yard field goal attempt, which was good to make the score 3-0 Crusaders early in the first quarter.

On the ensuing drive the Bison moved the ball well, and were faced with a third down and goal to go from the 11-yard line when quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 was sacked and fumbled the ball. The Crusaders recovered the ball again, on their own 15-yard line. Two plays later Stephane Pluviose '04 forced a Holy Cross fumble that was recovered by the Bison's Juan Morales '03 on the Holy Cross 26-yard line. The Bison were unable to move the ball, and Chris Lundberg missed a 45-yard field goal attempt into a stiff breeze.

Neither team moved the ball well for the remainder of the first quarter, until the Bison began a drive on their own 20-yard line with just over three minutes remaining in the period. With the help of a 34-yard pass and catch from Wenrich to Jim Horan '03, the Bison moved the ball 80 yards on 13 plays. Jabu Powell '02 capped off the drive with a three-yard touchdown run to give the Bison a 7-3 lead.

Team of the Week

The Bison defense forced the Crusaders to punt on their next drive, and due to a poor punt the Bison received extremely good field position, on the Holy Cross 32 yard line. Four plays later Wenrich connected with J.C. Morgan '04 on a four yard touchdown pass to make the score 14-3 in favor of the Bison with 9:27 to play in the first half. The Crusaders made one more concerted effort at the end zone in the first half, but Jerome Acy intercepted a Holy Cross pass on the Bucknell two yard line to stifle the scoring effort and keep the score 14-3 at half time.

On the first drive of the second half, the Crusaders moved the ball into the Bison red zone, but the Bison defense held tight yet again, forcing another field goal to make the score 14-6. While neither team could move the ball well for the remainder of the third quarter, the Crusaders struck first in the fourth period. Holy Cross connected on a 37-yard touchdown pass to make the score 14-12 Bison, but not for long. The Crusaders converted the two-point conversion to tie the score with 14:49 remaining in the game.

"When they tied it up it was just nice to be able to get back out there," Adam Lord '03 said. Lord was selected the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week.

As soon as the Bison got the ball back they moved it swiftly down the field. Their seven-play, 75-yard drive was capped off by a 25-yard touchdown pass from Wenrich to Horan in the corner of the end zone to make the score 21-14.

"You have to give Bucknell credit, they answered our score with a score," Holy Cross Head Coach Dan Allen said. The Bison defense held on the keep the final score 21-14.

"We were going to take some shots deep and see if we could get the ball to Horan, and it worked," Bison Head Coach Tom Gadd said.

"We were trying to make sure that we took advantage of that match up," Horan said, noting that the Crusader defense is not as fast as others. "We had talked about it earlier, and Todd threw and unbelievable pass in the corner [for the final touchdown]."

The Bison offense also had a lot of success passing the ball in the flat, and with short passes over the middle. "They were blitzing a lot, and their line backers were not covering the middle and the flat," Wenrich said. "I think it was a nice job by our offensive coaches to see those openings," Gadd said.

Bucknell hosts Lehigh University this Saturday, Nov. 10 at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium. The Bison have a chance to put themselves in position to win the Patriot League title if they can knock off undefeated Lehigh.

"We need to take this team to a different level, and I think we are right there, but we need to step over that line and be a championship football team," Gadd said.

Navy triumphs 1-0 in OT over women's soccer

The Naval Academy scored in the 101st minute of play this past Saturday to squeak by the Bison, 1-0 and win the regular season Patriot League title. By finishing in first place, the Midshipmen earned the right to host the Patriot League tournament this weekend as the No. 1 seed.

With the loss, Bucknell falls to 9-6-0 on the year and 4-3-0 in league play. The Orange and Blue will travel to Annapolis this weekend as the No. 3 seed and face No. 2 seed American on Friday. Navy will square off against No. 4 seed Lafayette on Friday too.

Navy	1

Saturday's game was an exciting one to watch as both teams battled back and forth throughout the contest. The Bison out-shot their counterparts 15-14 for the game and Laurie Purse '03 had two saves in net. The winning goal was the first one allowed by Purse in over seven halves of play.

"I knew it would be a good game," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said. "This was the first time our players were fighting for a league title. It was a good team effort; It was the best we have played all season."

Saturday's contest also marked the last home game for Bucknell's seniors. Tri-Captains Ali Chandler and Anna Hall, along with Lindsay Slomer, Meredith Barnes, Sarah Klang-Glienna and Jessi Springer are a talented and special group that will not be forgotten. They are also Findlay's first recruiting class at Bucknell.

"I'll forever be grateful to them and the work they've put into the program. They've all contributed a lot on and off the field and I am really proud to say they were a part of the program," Findlay said. "Anna Hall '02 played strong defensively and added a lot of offense and Abbey Seaboyer '04 continues to organize the defense."

"As a senior and it being my last home game, it was a heartbreaking defeat," Chandler said. "Even though we are still going to the tournament, I think we all wanted this win and more than anything to be able to host the tournament."

"The crowd at the game was great," Findlay said. "Both teams had their chances and Navy got iucky."

Last Wednesday afternoon the Bison lost a close match to visiting Cornell. With just under 15 minutes left in the game, the Big Red slotted home the game-winner from point-blank range off a cross. The Orange and Blue out-shot their opponents 5-3. Purse had two saves in the first half and Kelly Kannen '05 had three saves in the second.

"We played hard and had chances but we didn't convert," Findlay said. "The loss was disappointing because we wanted to tie the program record for most wins in a season and beat an Ivy League team for the first time. Kelly and Laurie both did a good job in net for us."

"We failed to play with urgency against Cornell- there was no intense desire to put the ball in the net and that is something we struggle with," Lauren Schwarz '03 said. "We realized in that game that we need to take advantage of opportunities to score."

The Bison now switch their focus to the upcoming Patriot League Tournament this weekend and to American, a team that defeated the Orange and Blue earlier this season, 2-0.

"I am anxious to play American again as is the team," Findlay said. "They have been waiting for the tournament now for two weeks after finding out they were in it. They know we can win it and it would have been nice to host it but at least we are in it."

"The team had one of its best performances on Saturday, but unfortunately Navy scored first. Although we are disappointed, we have to look ahead to the tournament. Revenge is so sweet and we hope that we can get a taste of it this upcoming weekend," Tri-Captain Tara Utchel '03 said.

"It was a tough way to lose our last home game, but our season is not over," Schwarz said. "We need to use the loss against Navy as a motivating factor at the tournament. We have to play in a way that will leave no doubt about who the better team is. We are in a great position heading into the tournament with something to prove to Navy and American. The regular season is over, but we're looking for paybacks."

Basketball preseason starts off with a slam

Last Friday, the basketball team took one step closer to what looks to be a promising season. The squad squared off with the London Leopards, a traveling team composed mainly of former college players, in Davis Gym for an exhibition game.

The Bison, facing their first real game situation of the season, showed a continuation of the promise they showed late in the 2000-2001 season. Avenging a 23-point loss to the Leopards last year, Bucknell trounced London by a score of 84-73.

Bucknell	84
London	73

Senior Co-Captain Bryan Bailey led the scoring onslaught with 21 points and six assists, while junior Boakai Lalugba threw in an impressive double-double racking up 15 points and 11 rebounds.

The Bison took command throughout the first half, accumulating a 48-37 lead by halftime. The Leopards mustered a moderate rally in the second half that drew them within two points of the Bison, but their efforts proved to be futile. Refusing to surrender their lead, the Bison buffered their lead with accurate free throws and a critical three-pointer by sophomore guard Mark Quinn, bringing the score to 68-61 with 6:19 remaining.

From that point on, the Bison never looked back, leading by as much as 13 points, and concluding the game with an 11-point advantage.

Polo qualifies for Eastern Championships

Squad defeats George Wash., Wash. and Jeff. and Hopkins to go 3-1 in Annapolis

By Barb Morgan
Staff Writer

The men's water polo team traveled to Annapolis this past weekend to compete in the Southern Division Championship at the Naval Academy.

The Bison faced George Washington Friday night and the squad came out ready to play. Led by Co-Captain Ryan McCarty '02, who had five goals, two steals and one ejection drawn, the Blue and Orange defeated the Colonials for the fourth time this season. Also in on the scoring action were Elliot Benoist '05 and James Danforth '05 with three and two goals, respectively.

Bucknell	12
G. Washington	6

The game was a complete team effort, as Jaime Saettele '05 added a goal, an assist, one steal, two ejections drawn and went three-for-three in the sprinting category. Aaron Platshon '05 went one-for-one from the field, registered two assists and one steal and went one-for-one in the sprinting category. In the cage, senior Dave Kennedy recorded 18 saves.

Taking on Washington & Jefferson Saturday morning, the Bison maintained their level of play and won 13-2. Platshon had another fine performance, going five-for-five on scoring attempts, grabbing four steals, drawing one ejection and going one-for-one in the sprinting category. Junior Dan Lonnerdal was the team's other multiple scorer, putting two in the net and also handing out two assists.

Kennedy recorded four saves, three assists and a steal from the cage. Freshman Ernest Martin played almost the entire second half, making three stops and registering one steal. With the win the squad qualified for Eastern Championships.

Dave Kennedy '02 recorded 18 saves in net against George Washington.

"We played some of our best offense of the year in the Hopkins game," Benoist said. "McCarty really came alive and showed what he can do in front of the goal at two-meters."

The Orange and Blue then fell 8-6 to number 12 Navy Saturday afternoon. Navy gained a one-goal lead in the fourth and a missed opportunity by the Bison on a man-up advantage allowed a crucial Midshipmen counterattack. Navy was up on this fast break and scored, creating a deficit the Bison were not able to overcome in the last few minutes of the game.

McCarty scored four of the team's six goals while also handing out an assist and drawing one ejection. Saeettle and Platshon each accounted for one of the team's other goals in addition to recording three assists and two steals, respectively. Defensively, Kennedy registered a season-best 20 saves and shared the team lead with three steals.

"This was our best game by far, even though we lost," Benoist said. "We played our best defense of the year against a very good driving offense."

Head Coach John Zeigler concurred. "The loss was heartbreaking in that it denied us the ability to play for the championship, but in many respects was a breakthrough one for the young Bison squad in that we played exceptional water polo throughout," he said.

Forfeits pin wrestling in loss to Lycoming

By Andrew Burr

Leading 19-13 with two weight classes left to be determined, Bison wrestlers could not hold on for the win as Lycoming recorded the final nine points to spoil the Bison opener, 22-19.

Twelve of Lycoming's 22 points came from two forfeited bouts, including the game-winner.

"It was a good match right up until the last match," Head Coach Tim Wittman said. " It's hard to give up 12 points against anybody, but the way we train, I expected our guys to win despite the forfeits. We train as hard, if not harder, than anyone we will wrestle this year."

Bucknell	19
Lycoming	22

The Bison were forced to concede matches in the 141 and 165-pound weight classes because of injuries to Brandon Green '03 (fractured arm) and Justin Troop '05 (knee), respectively. Because the Lycoming match was scheduled so early in the season, coupled with the unexpected injuries to Green and Troop, Wittman had no choice but to concede the two matches.

The Bison won five of the eight contested bouts, but could not overcome the 12 points Lycoming earned off the forfeits.

"Depending on the last match, it could have gone either way," Josh Perrin '03 said. "We matched up pretty well against [Lycoming]. They're a pretty good Division III squad and we had our opportunity to beat them, but we stumbled a little bit."

Perrin defeated his opponent in the 125-pound weight class to break a 13-13 tie and put the Bison in good position to win at 19-13, but Josh Hartrum '05 was defeated in the next match, cutting the Bison lead to three. Unable to compete in the 141-pound weight class, the Bison sacrificed their lead in the last match of the day, giving Lycoming the victory.

"The team was into it, they were hungry and they wanted to win," Wittman said, despite the season-opening loss. "Monday, we were right back on the mat working hard in preparation for the next match."

Victories came from Bison Captains Rocky Miller '02 (157 pound-weight class) and Brian Neuman '02 (184), as well as Brock Hostetter '03 (174), Brian Falciglia '02 (197) and Perrin (125).

"It was a good starting point and we wrestled well overall, but we aren't quite where we want to be yet," Perrin said.

Despite controversy surrounding the elimination of Bison wrestling following the current 2001-2002 season, Wittman says it has not adversely affected his team's mentality.

"I know it's affecting guys, but as soon as they enter a practice or a match, they step into a different zone," he said. "The guys are very, very focused."

Perrin looks at the controversy in a positive light, claiming it serves as a source of inspiration for the team to rally around.

"If anything, it's helping us come together and bring the team closer," he said.

Swimming teams sink Drexel

By Brooke Rea
Sports Editor

The men's and women's swimming and diving teams opened the 2001-2002 season with some of the best performances in team history. With strong leadership, a core of seasoned veterans and a number of new swimmers, the Bison are taking the Patriot League by storm.

Bucknell (M)	176
Drexel	123

Both teams proved their worth last weekend by drowning Drexel in their home debut, with the women dominating 203-70 and the men 176-123. A week earlier the teams traveled to West Point for their season opener against Army. While the men fell 144-92, the women saw their biggest win in recent history when they crushed the Cadets 153.5-89.5, winning all but two events. The women's team had not beaten Army since 1984, and the win reflects the potential of this year's squad.

Bucknell (W)	203
Drexel	70

"This meet was a big accomplishment for the program," Co-Captain Barbara Morgan '02 said. "This meet set a precedent for how we want to take on this season: To go in and win our meets right from the first event."

Morgan and Co-Captain Abby Weaver '02 have clearly instilled this winning drive in their teammates, as the women's side saw countless impressive performances that weekend. Already making a splash in the Patriot League is Jackie Feinthel '05, who earned three individual first-place finishes against Army in the 1,000-free (10:41.87), 200-fly (2:10.14), and 500-free (5:11.10). Classmate Jackie Flick put her mark in the record books by breaking the school record in the 200-breast in 2:26.68, while also winning the 200-IM in 2:13.80.

"We have two teams that are very capable of being champions. Both teams are considered underdogs ... and our goal is to go into every meet with the mindset that we can be champions, to compete like champions. —Head Coach Jerry Foley

On the board was diver Sarah Petcavage '04, who won both the one-meter and three-meter diving contests.

Others notching individual wins were Darby Golino '03 in the 200-back and Weaver in the 100-free, who were also instrumental in relay victories. Golino, Flick, Weaver, and Ashley Aiken '05 teamed up to win the 400-medley in 4:00.75. Weaver was also a member of the victorious 400-free relay, with Robin Gibson '05 and Krisztina Poda '04 and Meghan Freese '04.

Head Coach Jerry Foley notes the training that has gone into preparing for meets such as this one.

"What I have noticed this year about the women is that they are significantly ahead of where they were training-wise at this point last year," he said. "This was reflected in that they were able to dominate Army. The win was special for me not only because I used to work there, but because the women have not beaten Army since 1984, so you can see just how big a victory that is."

The men's side could not subdue the defending Patriot League Champions at West Point, but Senior Co-Captains Chris Feinthel and Chris Neary will lead the team to excellence throughout the remainder of the season. Feinthel was the only individual winner in the meet, placing first in the 200-back in 2:00.58.

"The men are extremely balanced and we can put a good swimmer in every event," Foley said.

The men were clearly up to the challenge the following weekend, when they handily defeated Drexel in front of a home crowd.

"Drexel could have been a major threat to us," Feinthel said. "But we made sure we did what we had to do to beat them, which was to come at it 100 percent. It was great to come back like that after losing to Army the week before."

Leading the men's side were Neary and Mike Harrigan '04, who each had two individual wins. Harrigan topped the 200-fly and 500-free, while Neary finished first in the 50-free and 100-fly. Other first-place finishers were Matt Hallowell '03 (400 IM), Stelios Saffos '03 (100-back) and Stephen Schwanhausser '03 (200-breast) and Peter Garvin '04 in the 100-free.

The 200-Medley relay team of Harrigan, Saffos, Neary, and Jake Thieman '05 took first, as did the 800-free relay with Harrigan, Hallowell, Garvin and Mike Willats '04.

On the women's side, performances were equally impressive, enabling the women to win every event that day. Feinthel shone once again in her second collegiate meet, almost breaking the Freas-Rooke Pool record in the 400-IM, just 1/10 of a second shy. She won the event in 4:39.68, while also placing first in the 100-fly as an exhibition competitor.

Notching two personal first-place finishes each were Flick, Weaver, Aiken, and Petcavage. Gibson, Golino, Daniela Faas '04 and Tricia Rado '05 each picked up one win. The 200-medley relay team of Golino, Flick, Aiken and Leslie Rice '05 finished first, as did the 800-free exhibition relay team of Feinthel, Flick, Poda and Becky Dolan '03.

"The women's team is has a lot of depth this year," Foley said. "We go three deep in every event, making us very capable. But I am also extremely pleased with our diving program, and when I say that the women's team is deep, that includes three strong divers. The men's team is balanced as well with the contributions of two divers, and all of these athletes have been a big part of our success."

The women's team welcomes 12 new freshmen as well as two sophomore transfer students, all of whom are already making an impact. On the men's side are four rookie swimmers and two divers, rounding out the talented roster.

"We have two teams that are very capable of being champions," Foley said. "Both teams are considered underdogs at this point, and our goal is to go into every meet with the mindset that we can be champions, to compete like champions. All we can focus on is ourselves, and being the best that we can be."

The swimmers return to action Saturday at the Penn State Invitational.

Yanks get snakebit by D'backs

By Scott Kloss
Senior Writer

"Simply Amazing." That's about all a journalist can muster to begin to describe the seven-game World Series between the Arizona Diamondbacks and the New York Yankees. A series for the ages.

For the first time since 1997 there is a new top dog in baseball. The Diamondbacks dethroned the once invincible Bronx Bombers.

How did the D'Backs pull it off? Lets take a closer examination of the ins and outs of the 2001 series.

"This was a World Series that had it all," Mark Grace of the Arizona Diamondbacks said in an interview on ESPN.com.

Going into the series, many sportswriters believed that the experienced Yanks would prevail over the "new kids on the block," the four-year-old Arizona Diamondbacks. Beating the Yankees made them the fastest team in MLB history to win a championship.

In football, coaches preach that defense wins championships. In baseball, pitching wins championships and the Diamondbacks pitchers dominated this series.

Case in point—Curt Schilling featured a 97-mph fastball and a good splitter and scattered only three hits in game one. The last time the Yankees were held to three or fewer hits in a Series game was in 1963, when Don Drysdale of the Los Angeles Dodgers threw a three-hit shutout in a 1-0 victory.

The game was broken open when Luis Gonzalez tagged Yankees starter Mike Mussina for a two-run homer in the third to give Arizona a 3-1 lead. Oddly enough in the course of the game the sure-handed Yankees gave up five unearned runs—the most in a Series game since 1973, helping to pave the way for a decisive 9-1 victory for the D'backs who were suddenly gaining respect.

Courtesy of Reuters

Derek Jeter's Yankees came close, but could not defeat Schilling and Johnson's D'Backs.

Game two was much of the same, pegging the southpaw Andy Pettite vs. the would-be basketball center the Phoenix Suns always wanted in Randy Johnson. Scouts raved that the way to silence the Bombers was with power pitching. That said, New York was in no position to catch up to Johnson's powerful fastball all night. In all, Randy struck out 11 while allowing three hits in a complete-game shutout. While Game One was a rout, this one was tight until Matt Williams hit a game-breaking, three-run homer in the seventh inning off Andy Pettite, effectively taking the steam from any comeback.

Game three provided another exhilarating pitching performance. Pumped and psyched, Roger "The Rocket" Clemens put on quite a performance for President Bush, who threw his own strike with the ceremonial first pitch before the start of the game (reminiscent of his Little League World Series toss). "The Rocket" advanced NASA's budget with a marvelous showing, allowing only three hits and striking out nine. Closing the game was Mariano Rivera who threw two perfect innings in relief, and that was your ball game—Yankee style.

"I knew it was a game that we had to have. It was exciting to be part of everything. It was something I'll always have with me," Clemens said in an interview on ESPN.com.

No baseball team has ever rallied from a 0-3 deficit to win a postseason series. Thanks to Clemens' win and Rivera's save, the defending three-time champions didn't have to.

Arizona skipper Bob Brenly decided to take a chance and pitch Schilling on three days rest so that the series would not get out of hand as the gap narrowed with the Yankee win.

In Game four, Schilling started and pitched magnificently, going seven innings and surrendering only one run on three base hits. When the game was turned over to the ever-reliable Byung-Hyun Kim in the eighth, things went awry. Tino Martinez launched a two-out, two-run homer that tied the game at three and pushed the series into extra innings.

"We had a lead, we had six outs left to go in the ball game," Brenly said. "That's the way we hoped it would work out. Unfortunately, it didn't."

Kim bounced right back getting the next batter out to end the inning. Arizona looked flat in the top of the 10th and the Yanks capitalized with their new-found hope.

In a decision that would be second-guessed for the rest of the series, Bob Brenly kept Kim in, due in part to the D'Backs weak bullpen. At 12:04 a.m. on Nov. 1, Derek Jeter smacked a homer into the right field porch with two outs in the bottom of 10th inning to complete the comeback. The series was notched at two.

Game five had the D'Backs on top until Scott Brosius hit the Yankees' second game-tying, ninth-inning, two-out homer in two days off the same pitcher, Kim.

And the Yankees didn't stop there. In the bottom of the 12th inning, Alfonso Soriano singled home the winning run to give New York a three-games-to-two edge and momentum, a disaster for D'Back fans.

With elimination staring Arizona in the face, they brought Johnson to the mound hoping to force a game seven. And boy did he deliver. Behind a supercharged offense that set a record with 22 hits, Johnson cruised to a 15-2 victory.

The stage was set—Schilling against Clemens in a do or die championship game. Both pitched to near perfection and after eight, the Yanks led 2-1.

That's when they turned to super-closer Rivera, to bring the Yanks their fourth title in as many years. But this time things didn't go as planned. After a costly error by Rivera, Tony Womack smacked a game-tying RBI double into right field. Craig Counsell followed and was hit by a pitch to load the bases with one out. Luis Gonzalez, hitless in the game, stepped up and blooped a soft single over second base to bring home the game winning run.

The Diamondbacks snatched the victory from the Yanks 3-2 in the bottom of the ninth against a pitcher who hadn't blown a postseason save in 23 tries dating back to 1997.

Listening to the final moments of a game that would spark many dinner conversations to come, I was reminded why there is no better sport on earth than baseball, and no better month than ... November.

Bison picked to finish second in preseason poll

Women's basketball looks to build on record-setting 2000 season with return of all five starters

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

Last year's Patriot League tournament is certainly not a happy memory for the women's basketball team. After entering the tournament as the No. 2 seed, the Bison were upset by No. 7 seed Colgate and found their season over a lot earlier than they expected.

"It was as hard as any game I've ever coached. It took the team a while to recover," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "It was so tough because we had such a great season. We don't dwell on it, but it is certainly a motivating force. It is a new year and we have to do it all over again."

Last season was certainly a memorable one for the Orange and Blue as they became the first team in the program's history to win 20 games, finishing at 20-8 on the year. This year, the squad looks to combine a mix of old and new to achieve success. Fedorjaka returns all five starters from last year's team, as well as six seniors and an experienced group of juniors and sophomores. Leading the way for the Bison are Senior Tri-Captains Rebekah May, Monique LeBlanc and Vicki Quimby.

"Vicki had a great all around year last year and looks great in the early going," Fedorjaka said. "Monique has really found her niche at the four position on the floor and looks great physically. Rebekah will continue to play a big role off the bench for us."

Quimby was named to the 2001-2002 Preseason All Patriot League Women's Basketball Team, along with junior returnee Molly Creamer, last year's Patriot League Player-of-the-Year. Creamer became the first sophomore in Bucknell history to score 1,000 points last season. Fellow classmates Kate Franks and Kate Rounsley return as well.

"Molly has had two great years and I think this year she has really developed the whole picture and is coming into her own as a floor general. Kate Franks is out of her knee brace from last season and she looks quicker and much more confident. We are looking for Kate Rounsley to continue to play a big role for us," Fedorjaka said.

Desire Aimind '04 returns after a spectacular freshman campaign and is looking to take her game to a new level. Unfortunately, she suffered a foot injury during the summer and went through a bout of mononucleosis at the beginning of this school year. She has only recently joined the team's practices.

"Our team goals are to improve each game and become a better team every time we step onto the floor ... It's all about being the best team we can be. —Kate Rounsley '03

"She just got back to practice so we are going to bring her back gradually," Fedorjaka said. "I've already seen a lot of growth in her game this year."

The team welcomes six new recruits this year, including its first ever international player, Emily Barruet '05 from Ingre, France. Other newcomers looking to make an impact are guard Laura Hatalsky '05 and forward Amy Ketcham '05.

"Laura has been doing some good things so far this year, and Amy is gradually getting used to the whole system and developing as an inside player," Fedorjaka said.

One of the newest parts of the team is in the assistant coaching ranks, as Fedorjaka has brought in three new people.

Veronica Jutres, Will Flemons and graduate assistant Michelle Katkowski make up the new Bucknell assistant coaching staff. Jutres is a former All-League point guard for Holy Cross and the Patriot League's all-time leader in assists. Flemons is a former standout forward at Texas Tech where he recently served as an assistant coach for the men's basketball program. Katkowski comes to Bucknell from the University of Pittsburgh where she was a four-year letter winner.

"The reaction to our new coaches has been wonderful and they have really had a great impact on the squad already," Fedorjaka said. "Will is such a humble person and he has a great personality and he has been super for the team. Veronica is young and brings a lot of energy to everything she does and as a former player in this league her perspective really helps us."

The Bison were picked to finish second behind Holy Cross in this year's preseason poll. This year's squad is an extremely talented and experienced group and undoubtedly have their sights set high.

"Our ultimate team goal is to become a true team with everybody reaching their potential and finding their role," Fedorjaka said. "This team knows they return a lot of experience and they are looking big. We want to win the regular season Patriot League title and get that No. 1 seed in the tournament and have a chance of hosting the title game and winning it."

"Our team goals are to improve each game and become a better team every time we step onto the floor, whether that be in a game or practice. It's all about being the best team we can be," Rounsley said.

The Orange and Blue open their season at home on Nov. 16 at 7:30 p.m. against Albany.

Lakers will be dethroned with a little Magic | Expect the unexpected in this year's playoffs

By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

Who will be this year's David and Goliath? Who will come out alive from each NBA conference? Who will win the gold trophy?

The Western Conference is the stronger of the two conferences but the leader of the pack has been set for years now, and apparently, for years to come. They wear gold and purple. They are the Los Angeles Lakers.

The Eastern Conference has lost some strength since Michael Jordan left the Chicago Bulls several years ago. Well, No. 23 is back and coincidentally, some teams from the east are strong again. Several teams can make it to the top but only one seems ready to be the team that will try to dethrone the two-time champion Lakers. They hail from Orlando. The Magic have rebounded well from losing Shaquille O'Neal and Penny Hardaway and now have a one-two punch of Tracy McGrady and Grant Hill. They'll rise above the rest.

The Lakers are ready to go. They start a behemoth at center and a future great at the two spot. O'Neal is the most unstoppable force on the planet. Put three guys on him and he will still manage to get up and put the ball in, and then some.

It is almost unfair to watch him dominate the other centers in the league. And he's only 29.

The "Robin" to Shaq's "Batman" is Kobe Bryant. Bryant is the one player that reminds everyone of MJ himself. The way he shoots, the way he dunks, the way he walks, the way he talks, the way he sounds and even the way he wins. This kid is better than Jordan was at this age. He can dominate games by himself with ease and he is only getting better.

He averages better than 28 points per game now and that is with the big guy to share the ball with. Imagine him without O'Neal. He could hit 40 points-per-game if he wanted to. But that's the beauty of it all. They complement each other perfectly. If they don't squabble with each other, don't be surprised if they each come close to filling up all 10 fingers with glistening rings.

To complement O'Neal and Bryant, the LA brass added some core players to the already dominating team. Mitch Richmond, at one time one of the best two-guards in the league behind Jordan, came over from Washington. He won't score or play as many minutes as he used to but he will put some points on the board when he's on the court. He will play the role Isaiah Rider failed to play last year—be the third scorer to help the two big guns when they are double teamed.

Another player they picked up was Samaki Walker. Power forward Horace Grant helped them win the last two titles but he left for Orlando. It would have been a huge void but the Lakers did a good job of addressing the need by acquiring Walker. The burly forward will get lots of minutes for the champs and will provide some inside strength. He hasn't truly lived up to his potential yet since being drafted early out of Louisville several years ago but he fits nicely here. Add to that Lindsey Hunter, who came over from Milwaukee, Rick Fox, Robert Horry, Derek Fisher, Devean George and company, and you've got the makings of a third championship season in the city of LA.

The Lakers will be waiting and the team that will meet the challenge will be the Orlando Magic. They have two of the most complete stars in the league, shooting guard Tracy McGrady and small forward Grant Hill. Hill got injured and missed most of last season for the Magic. McGrady came over from Toronto and had one of the best seasons out of everyone in the league. He had MVP type numbers after filling in the leadership role for the injured Hill. McGrady is now the undisputed leader of this athletic team with his unparalleled scoring abilities.

Shaquille O'Neal's Lakers will try to capture another NBA Championship this year.

Over the off-season, Orlando improved drastically. Add to the return of a healthy Hill, the Magic picked up the championship-prone Grant from LA and that will only help. Ancient legend Patrick Ewing came over from Seattle as well in what is probably his final attempt to win an NBA title. The big guy won't play many minutes because of a deteriorating body but he will be a presence in there. Their point guard, Darrell Armstrong, will provide the same things he's been giving them for several years. He'll give the team a burst of energy with his style of play and he probably won't score as much as he did the past few years. He'll set up to scorers and play defense on the other end with his hustle. On the bench Orlando has last year's Rookie-of-the-Year Mike Miller, Pat Garrity, Bo Outlaw, and rookie Steven Hunter. The O-Rena won't be watching any disappearing acts this year.

In the ever changing world of the NBA, one thing is for certain: the LA Lakers will once again win the NBA Title. No one can stop Shaq. No one can contain Kobe. Not only are they the most dominating duo in the NBA, but they actually get along now too, which means many sleepless nights for their opponents. We should just hand them the hardware now.

But as with all sports, the best team doesn't always win. The Lakers have a huge target on their foreheads with many teams aiming for it. While most of the contenders will remain the same, there should be a few surprises this year. Many of the 'have-nots' have retooled and look to make a run towards the playoffs. Just who the surprise team will be is still uncertain, but here are a few possibilities.

New Jersey Nets—Okay, so maybe I'm a little too excited about their 3-1 start, but with a little luck, the Nets can win 40-45 games. In trading leading scorer Stephon Marbury for Jason Kidd, the Nets may have finally figured out what it takes to win games. While Kidd may not be the prolific scorer that Marbury is, he will get the rest of the team more involved. Kenyon Martin, Keith Van Horn and Kerry Kittles are coming off of injured ridden seasons and should only benefit from Kidd's pass first mentality. If one of them should go down, legitimate Rookie-of-the-Year candidate Richard Jefferson will fill in nicely.

The Washington Wizards—how can there be so much fanfare over a team that won 19 games last year—a team that had a mediocre draft and a team that only had one major free agent signing? The answer is simple—Michael Jordan. The greatest to ever play the game is back, but this time to lead a sorry group to the playoffs. To do this he will need to make the players around him better—they can't do it with their current level of play. Rip Hamilton and Courtney Alexander will continue to mature and should be starters for years to come. But besides Christian Laettner there are no other players even worth mentioning. It will take time, but never count out MJ—you never know what magic he may still have left.

The Atlanta Hawks may be the most improved team in the NBA, after a total overhaul in the offseason. Jason Terry and Shareef Abdur-Rahim will combine for 40-plus points a night while Theo Ratliff and Toni Kukoc will supply the team with intangibles. Atlanta's lineup now mirrors that of the championship Bulls teams of the 1990s—two main scorers, with a deadly long range shooter combined with a dominant defensive player. I really like their playoff chances in the weak Eastern Conference.

Last year the Pacers made the playoffs in what was labeled as a rebuilding year. Even though their stay in the playoffs was short, it served as a learning experience. Now they are older, more mature, and even more exciting. Jalen Rose will lead the run-and-gun Pacers at the three spot, while old man Reggie Miller will continue to provide timely scoring late in the game. But Jermaine O'Neal, Al Harrington, and Jamaal Tinsley are the keys to Indiana's success. If they can continue to play high pace, exciting basketball while avoiding foolish turnovers they have the opportunity to beat anyone in the East. Simply put, they may be the most exciting team in the game.

The Clippers—and no, this isn't a misprint—may make a run at the playoffs. They are still incredibly young, but their potential is scary. The addition of Elton Brand was huge and although he didn't win many games in Chicago, he brings instant credibility and leadership to the young team. Combined with Lamar Odom, they may be one of the best frontcourts in the NBA. But with Indiana, the team's success lies with its younger players. Jeff McInnis, Darius Miles and Corey Maggette are improving daily, but will need to step if the Clippers are to make the playoffs.

The Golden St. Warriors may be a stretch, but you never know. Antwan Jamison came into his own last year and needs to be the leader. Larry Hughes and Jason Richardson are exciting, but need to mature a lot before they get credit. While a team like Utah may be more talented and seasoned, I can't see how they can keep up with the Warriors speed and athletic ability. They will be an interesting team.

The Memphis Grizzlies still won't make the playoffs, but they should benefit from a change of scenery and faces. Stromile Swift and Lorenzen Wright already have improved greatly and should be stars in the future. Shane Battier brings a winning attitude from his days at Duke and Jason Williams adds some flare to this hapless franchise. Give them a few more years and they should be a quality NBA team.

COMMENTARY

Aaron DeRosa

I was sitting in my room Sunday afternoon, being studious of course, when I got a phone call, a rare treat. The caller ID box blinked "666" mysteriously. I picked up the phone and on the other side was just a prerecorded message saying something about how hell was about to freeze over. It didn't make sense to me at the time, but I know now.

It was kind of sad, actually. Mariano Rivera walking off the field with his head down, the disappointment on Joe Torre's face, Paul O'Neill standing on the top step of the dugout, chin resting on his folded arms in his last major league game, staring at the Diamondbacks as they swarmed the field.

I take muted joy in this series. Not because I'm a Mets fan and certainly not because I hate the Yankees. But because it silenced that kid in the front row of seats in the Swartz lounge who kept talking through the entire series. This kid was the most annoying person ever. He was always there, giving his own unintelligent commentary about the merits of Derek Jeter's dietary supplements like he needed to prove that he was a Yankee fan by knowledge of the completely obscure and irrelevant. In the bottom of the eighth I was ready to strangle him with the cable wire.

I reiterate, I don't hate the Yankees even though they hate me. I treat the Yankees much like I treat my female friends, with an outward belligerence to mask inner respect and admiration, although even that is untruthful.

I am not outwardly belligerent towards the Yankees. If it seems that way, then I will explain. In a moment of Zen months ago I realized what I despise most about the Yankees: the fans. Not all fans because I consider myself a fan in certain aspects. I'm talking about the "fans." You know the ones I'm talking about.

I'm talking about the in-your-face, jersey-clad, license plate holder, red hat wearing, pinstripe wallpaper, Bernie beanie baby, top hat and bat flags, Yankee-endorsed space heater, Don Zimmer bobble-head, "Mr. November" sign-waving, front running yokels that pour out of the sky like some celestial sponge-ringing every fall.

These fan-imposters are everywhere. They may be in your classes or standing next to you on line at the Bison. They may even be registered in your classes next semester. They appear every October like that fungus on my toes and twice as annoying.

When they finally do unmask themselves, they are the most violently adamant fans because they must make up for an entire baseball season's worth of cheer. They feel that by forcing their fan-dom on you in such large quantities they will seem more convincing, both to you and themselves.

How else can you distinguish them? They wear jerseys that still have tags on them. Their hat brims are always flat. They are usually, but certainly not always, the loudest ones in the room. They are the ones who make up excuses for any and every poor play, bad at-bat or run scored. For instance, the suggestion that Jeter did poorly in the Series because he was battling injuries. Of course he's battling injuries—who isn't? Not to mention the fact that he was younger than most of the other players on both teams, so he should be the most resilient. The only thing Jeter battles over is whether to wear Armani or Versace.

The kid in the Swartz lounge who wouldn't stop talking had definitely contracted the "not-his-fault" virus. Rivera, in game five, came on in the eighth inning and retired the D'Backs one-two-three. In the ninth he let up two singles in a row, prompting this kid to ask, "Whoa, what happened to Mariano? He never gives up two singles in a row. Is he alright?" To which another Yankee fan responded, "He probably didn't warm up." I didn't feel the need to explain to them that, not only had he warmed up in the bullpen during the seventh inning, but that he had pitched the eighth without a problem.

Why do they do this? Well severe mental problems are the leading diagnosis of such people. Usually these people were not hugged enough as children and must look for comfort in the warm embrace of millions of other Yankee fans, both true fans and those just as deluded as they are.

Why do they congregate around the Yankees? Because they win. Because whether you like it or not they are still one of the best teams around. They didn't have an MVP, a homerun champion and they didn't win 116 games, and they didn't have to. All they had to do was win 11. Ten just wasn't enough. Coincidentally, ten also marks the number of times O'Neill did something good for the Yankees.

Why do non-Yankee fans always seem to be anti-Yankee fans? Bitterness at their success and the behavior of their "fans." Not a day goes by where I don't wish that I were a Yankee "fan" so I could walk around with a chip on my shoulder the size of Roger Clemens' gut.

I've been told that I'm elitist. I'm not elitist, I just deal with Yankee "fans" much like a bouncer outside Yankee Stadium; once I've made sure your ticket is real, you can go in. If you're ticket is bogus, then I throw you out onto the Major Deegan Expressway and you can take your chances with the underside of a bus because you don't belong in my stadium.

When I think about it though, I use Yankee "fans" just as much as they use me. They use me to make them feel better about themselves because they're insecure about their parentage or the size of their sexual organs. I use them as a season marker, like leaves falling suggest autumn, when these "fans" start popping up like insufferable weeds in a wasteland barren of credibility, dignity and self respect, I know it's October.

Volleyball clinches playoff spot

Despite a somewhat disappointing regular season performance, the Patriot League Tournament-bound Bison are confident they have what it takes to repeat as champions. After a two-game skid, the Orange and Blue clinched a spot in the post season by beating Holy Cross 3-1 (22-30, 30-27, 30-26, 30-26). In a harder fought battle with Army, the Bison fell 3-2 (30-27, 22-30, 23-30, 30-27, 10-15).

Bucknell	3
Holy Cross	1

Earlier in the season Holy Cross handed the Bison their first loss on their home floor. The Herd knew they could afford no such defeat this time, and would do whatever it took to ensure their deserved spot in the playoffs.

Shannon Walker '02 led the way against Crusaders, registering a match-high 23 kills in the crucial victory.

"We were more prepared for what was coming than we had been earlier in the season," Walker said. "And we were emotionally hyped up for the game."

Other notable performances included Jackie Leahy '05, who put down four critical services aces to go along with 11 kills in the match. Brandi Trapasso '04 led all players with 12 digs.

"It was nice to avenge the earlier season loss," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "We played really well as a team."

The Bison were hoping to repeat as hosts of the Patriot League tournament, but will have to settle with being a three or four-seed in the four-team tournament. Washington D.C., home of American University, will be the spot of this year's post season and the Bison are happy to be given a chance to seek revenge on losses that occurred before they really started growing as a team.

"We have an opportunity to do some really good things now," Opalski said. "We just have to put it all together."

In their next League contest, the Bison struggled as Army's intense defense stifled all Bison opportunities. The match was close throughout, but the Black Knights won the final and deciding set 15-10 to take the win.

Leahy once again played a consistent match throughout, tallying 14 kills and 11 digs.

Walker and Trapasso provided outstanding efforts in the loss. The two combined for 23 kills, and defensively Trapasso added 11 digs.

"Strategically, we didn't execute our game plan," Opalski said. "We kept hitting the ball outside, and we unable to get it to our strong middle players. We played to their strength, which was blocking."

The Bison will have one more Patriot League contest against Colgate, and will have to rely on Holy Cross beating Army if they want to be the third seed in the post season. With undefeated American as the number one seed, the remaining regular season games are critical.

"We need to play tenacious defense, get the ball to our hot hitters, and we need a total team effort if we're going to bring back a championship to this school," Opalski said.

The Bison will rely on their strong senior leadership to carry them through the remaining stretch. Loyola comes to Davis Gym in what will be the final home game of the season, and the last for the seniors.

"We're really excited for post season play," Walker said. "And for the seniors it's getting down to our last games, which is emotional. We know we can make it a successful ending."

Men's soccer falls to Navy 2-1 in OT

By Tara Utchel
Staff Writer

The Men's Soccer Team lost a hard fought match in Annapolis this past Sunday. Navy earned a playoff birth by filling the fourth-place spot with a 2-1 win in overtime. Sunday's game was the second of the past three games for the Orange and Blue that was decided in extra minutes.

"We dominated most of the game, as usual, but we slipped up in the first half when the ref gave a direct kick from 20 yards out, when the call should have been indirect," Mark Mascarenhas '04 said.

Bucknell	1
Navy	2

Navy was first to get on the scoreboard. The Midshipmen had a direct kick 20 yards out from the goal. The shot rebounded off of the post and Navy wasted no time as they buried it into the net at 24:29 into the game.

"Our team did not give up," Mascarenhas said. "We got our game together second half and put Navy on their heels with plenty of offensive chances."

Mascarenhas tied the game at one all with 20 minutes left in regulation. Brian Johnson '03 connected a pass with sweeper Michael Lookingland '05 who then found Mascarenhas seven yards out from the goal. Mascarenhas was credited with his first collegiate goal.

"We definitely had the momentum after that. When O.T. came and we were fired up," Mascarenhas said.

Despite the team's vigor, Navy came out on top with a goal just under two minutes into overtime. Navy earned its fifth win in overtime this season and also clinched the playoffs.

"It was a frustrating game because we deserved to win. It may sound like sour grapes, but I felt the referee had a direct effect on the outcome of the game," Mascarenhas said. "This season has been one where the bounces or the calls have not gone our way. Yet, I am proud of the effort the team is putting forth and realize the frustrations we are all going through. This season will make us stronger in the future and hopefully the bounces will start going our way."

The next match was under a full moon on Halloween night, and the bad omen proved to be true. The Panthers shut them out 2-0. The Orange and Blue had 10 corners to Pittsburgh's two, but they were not able to put any of them away.

"The field was the worst Division-I soccer field I have ever seen," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "We did not adjust to the field very well in the first half. At half-time we made a small adjustment and told the guys to play the ball in the air. It is not what we like to do, but it needed to be done. We controlled the second half, but could not score a goal. Our bench once again picked us up."

The men will end their season Friday, Nov. 9 at Army.

"We are 0-5-1 in the PL. Enough said," Mascarenhas said. "I think we know what needs to be done. Before the last few games, the word for our team was pride. The last game is definitely going to be for pride and respect."

Field hockey players receive honors

Campbell, McCorry and Wettergreen named to All-PL teams

Although the field hockey team missed a bid to the Patriot League Tournament with an overall record of 8-9 and a league record of 3-4, the team has accomplished a great deal this season. Among the greatest accomplishments are the end-of-the-year honors received by three of the Bison's standout players.

Over the past four years Senior Tri-Captain Lauren Campbell has made her mark on the field hockey program as both a leader and strong defensive player. She has started all but one game for the Bison in the past three seasons. Campbell was a Second-Team Mideast Regional All-American in her junior year.

This season, Campbell played a key role in the defensive unit for the Bison and provided ongoing support for the offense. She finished the year with five goals and four assists to account for a total of 14 points, the second highest on the team. In addition, Campbell leads the team in positive tackles with 68 and registered 44 interceptions. Campbell was honored as First-Team All-Patriot League and was selected to play in the National Field Hockey Coaches Association North/South Senior All-Star game to be played during the Final Four weekend at Kent State University. She is currently being considered for Mideast Regional All-American honors as well.

"Lauren is very deserving of the post-season honors that have come her way," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "She was our most consistent and most determined player all season long. I am very proud of her and so very happy that she's capping off a brilliant career with such recognition. She truly is deserving of these accolades."

Senior Monica McCorry is the only player on the team to have started every game of her Bucknell career. As a key member of the Bison defense, McCorry has led the team in defensive saves (six) and interceptions (69), and was second on the team in positive tackles with 67. She holds the career record for defensive saves with 35.

With few scoring opportunities from her defensive post, McCorry scored her first and only career goal against Towson earlier this year. McCorry was selected as a First-Team Mideast Regional All-America following her junior season. Recently, she was honored as Second-Team All-Patriot League and was selected as an alternate to play in the National Field Hockey Association North/South Senior All-Star game at Kent State.

"It's hard for me to imagine a defensive unit without Monica, as she's been my starting sweeper since the day she arrived on campus," Lewis said. "She will leave this program as the most natural and most gifted defender I have ever coached.

As the Patriot League Rookie-of-the-Year in 1999, junior goalie Sonja Wettergreen has only become more deserving over the past three seasons of all of the honors and recognition that she has received. The honors she saw this season are just a natural progression of her talent, hard work and dedication.

Wettergreen has been found in the national rankings for both save percentage and goals-against-average throughout the season. She finished the year with a save percentage of .81 and a goals-against-average of 1.84. Throughout the season, Wettergreen recorded 106 saves. This past season, she was honored as Second-Team All-Patriot League and is currently being considered as a candidate for Mideast Regional All-American honors, which are to be announced at a later date.

"I'm so very happy for Sonja, as I think she truly is one of the best goalkeepers in this league," Lewis said. "I think this award will only serve as motivation for her final season next year as I know she'll work even harder to make a run at First-Team All-League.

Quinn and junior Brian Werner also reached double-digit points. Quinn finished the night with 14 points and six rebounds, and hit three of his four three-point attempts, while Werner amassed 13 points and eight rebounds.

The Bison hit 31 of 43 free throw attempts, while shooting 41.4 percent of field goals. The team also outdid the Leopards in the rebound department, accumulating 46 rebounds to the Leapords' 33.

The team's performance served to back up the promise in the young Bison squad that has been apparent since last season. The roster features only two seniors, but boasts several players with notable starting experience under their belts.

The Bison finished the 2000-2001 season with a 14-15 record, compromised by some inconsistency on the offensive side of things. The offensive difficulties, according to Head Coach Pat Flannery, "have partly been a product of trying to develop young players." While previewing the team earlier this fall, Flannery added, "the end result was that we got a lot of young guys much-needed experience, which should make us deeper and better this season."

Friday night's exhibition was consistent with that prediction, as the team displayed a maturity that will hopefully carry over to the regular season.

The Bison will kick off a daunting early season schedule on Nov. 16, traveling to Connecticut for the Mohegan Sun Classic.

"Our men gave a nice effort, however Army was the better team today," Donner said. "Some of our men have been inconsistent from race-to-race and now we have to regroup to prepare for the Mid-Atlantic Regional."

The Patriot League championship is not the end of the Bison's season. They still have the Mid-Atlantic Regional tournament at Lehigh University this weekend, and if they run like they're capable of, they will qualify for NCAAs. They don't intend to rest on their laurels as they look to run even stronger than they have in years past. It will take an even better effort than they gave in the Patriot League Championship if they want to place and have a shot at taking their season even further.

With experienced runners on both teams, the Bison are optimistic about what they have think they can accomplish.

"We definitely have to run even better than we did in the Patriot League Championship, especially if we want to qualify for Nationals," Marshall said. "We've been working hard in practice, and everyone looks incredible."

The NCAA Mid-Atlantic Regional meet is at Lehigh University on Saturday, Nov. 10.

Companies attempting to reduce risks of smoking

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

Vector Tobacco Ltd. has recently come out with a new type of cigarette called Omni which they claim has a reduced risk of carcinogens at a premium taste. The product has not yet been scientifically proved.

The Omni cigarette is treated with a combination of chemicals, such as palladium, a metal found in the catalytic converters of cars, and has a new, carbon-filled filter.

According to Vector scientist Robert Bereman, the filter removes nearly all of the benzene from the cigarette's smoke.

Miami-based Vector Tobacco Ltd. claims that its palladium catalyst reduces the effects of carcinogenic compounds in tobacco smoke by 15 to 60 percent, according to MSNBC.com.

In addition, the palladium catalyst decreases the amount of a nitrosamine called NNK, a potent lung carcinogen present in the cigarette.

Vector has yet to address the possible health effects of palladium itself. Tony Albino, a cancer researcher and the company's vice president for public-health affairs, supported that the amount of metal inhaled by smokers is insignificant and poses no health risk.

According to MSNBC.com, Stephen S. Hecht, a chemist studying cancer prevention at the University of Minnesota Cancer Center, believes that scientists need to gather more information in order to determine whether the reductions due to the new treatments are large enough to make a significant health difference.

Other tobacco companies are scrambling to produce a similar low-level toxin cigarette. On Monday, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. will begin sales of Advance in Indianapolis with the slogan of, "All of the taste ... Less of the toxins."

Advance uses specialized, cured tobacco and a three-part filter to reduce the levels of a broad range of carcinogens and other toxins in its smoke.

In Dallas, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Holdings Inc. is testing an unconventional Eclipse cigarette, which heats tobacco instead of burning it. Studies have found that because these cigarettes do not burn down like a regular cigarette, they could be less likely to cause cancer and other diseases.

Next year, Vector Tobacco will introduce Omni Free cigarettes, made from genetically modified tobacco that will contain almost no nicotine. They claim that the taste will not be altered.

"The other attempts affect the taste of the tobacco, but we haven't touched the leaf at all so the taste is still there," Bennett S. LeBow, CEO of Vector, said.

Other tobacco companies warn that genetically modified tobacco could hurt their business by scaring away foreign buyers. Vector is investing $100 million into the revolutionary new product.

Anti-tobacco activists fear that the altered cigarettes will discourage smokers from quitting and even encourage new smokers to start.

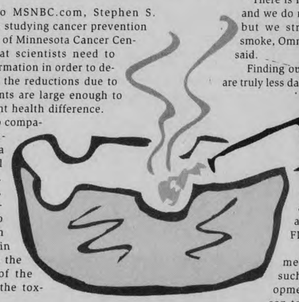
The fact that, in the United States, every year more than 400,000 people die of some smoke-related disease leaves many Americans uneasy, as well as skeptical.

"There is no such thing as a safe cigarette, and we do not encourage anyone to smoke, but we strongly believe that if you do smoke, Omni is the best alternative," LeBow said.

Finding out whether or not these cigarette are truly less dangerous is difficult for researchers to uncover.

One reason for this is because there are no government regulations for what constitutes a less hazardous cigarette, or how such a product can be sold, since the FDA has no claim on cigarettes.

Some may argue that government intervention is needed in such a matter, and this new development may give them a new reason to do so.



Internet reliance increases

By Ben Chittenden
Staff Writer

S&T Commentary

It's hard to imagine a life without the Internet these days.

What would happen without the constant updates, on just about everything, that only the Internet can provide?

Looking for a restaurant, go on the Internet. Need directions, look on the Internet. Want to know the news, search for it on the Internet. The latter of the three has become a way of life for many Americans after the Sept. 11 attacks. Just several hours after the attacks, search engines had statements like, "Many online news services are not available because of extremely high demand."

In a time when the public needs to be brought up to date, the technologies of the Internet provide an environment where this can happen.

With recent reports of Anthrax and scares of smallpox, chemical and nuclear attacks, the Internet has calmed the public by giving them a place where they can research such issues.

Before the Internet the only way to do this would be to go to a library or to rely on what others have to say about the matter. This is a huge boost for the confidence of the nation. The Internet reduces fears because they can now be assessed on a more personal level, by looking at as much information as an individual can. The Internet not only reduces fears, but by keeping people filled in on events, creates more awareness.

Websites like MSNBC and CNN reported having removed some of their graphics to allow for faster access to their web pages. These two websites have been the two most active sites in response to the events of Sept. 11.

Having different views on some events could create a stir in the general public. On MSNBC there was a report by a professor who claimed that it was relatively easy for an individual to acquire enough chemicals to wipe out thousands of people. This provokes a sense of panic.

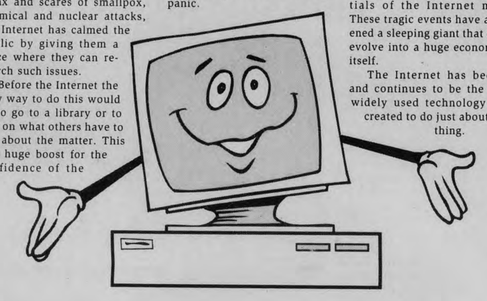
However, if one looks at CNN.com, it mentions no such report. Being a leader in cable news broadcasting, it seems like they should have received word about something like this.

By searching the Internet it seems as if this scare was just reported by MSNBC, not many other organizations comment on this. If an individual just received his news based on the MSNBC report there would be reason to panic, however, because the broad range of information that can be acquired on the Internet can calm some of the panic.

The Internet has not only increased its traffic on news sites but has also increased its traffic on sites that include pictures, videos and information about the attacks. If possible, the attacks have stimulated the Internet.

People changing their holiday plans have started to shop on the Internet, talk on the Internet, and explore the potentials of the Internet more. These tragic events have awakened a sleeping giant that could evolve into a huge economy in itself.

The Internet has become and continues to be the most widely used technology ever created to do just about anything.



Budworms and absence of wildfires cause harm to forests

By Nate Ivanick
Staff Writer

The state of Washington is dealing with an environmental problem of epic proportions, and ironically, it results from the lessons of Smokey the Bear.

Everyone has heard Smokey admonish, "Only you can prevent forest fires." We are taught from a young age that forest fires are bad for the environment.

The truth is, forest fires help maintain a balance in many forest ecosystems. Many species of pines actually require fires to physically propagate themselves.

In Washington state, the case is slightly different. According to MSNBC.com, at the turn of the twentieth century, the forests of eastern Washington were roughly 70 percent Ponderosa pine, and 30 percent Douglas fir. Before the intervention of man, the two trees were quantitatively balanced.

Douglas fir tolerates shade better than Ponderosa pine, and thus spread more rapidly in the shade of larger trees. However, the pine was more resistant to the forest fire, that swept through the area about once each decade. So, the tree populations remained in balance. Humans, however, destroyed this natural balance by preventing forest fires from spreading and giving the fir trees an advantage.

This mistake seems to have had severe repercussions not only for the trees, but for the animals living in the forests. Now, the majority of the trees in eastern Washington forests are Douglas fir, which incidentally are prey to a bug known as the budworm.

According to MSNBC.com, budworms can be held at bay by the tree for several years, but eventually will succeed in completely defoliating entire trees and forests. The budworm is a devastatingly efficient feeder that is expected to decimate roughly 800,000 acres of forestland this year.

This situation could be fixed by planned forest fires, which would allow the bug-resistant pine to return to its natural domination.

Removal of infected trees is also an option except that fir tree dominated forests in eastern Washington are home to the Spotted Owl. The Spotted Owl was placed on the "threatened" species list in 1990 and has not been removed since.

Spotted Owls used to live west of the Cascade Mountains in western Washington, but, as fir trees increased in abundance in eastern Washington, Spotted Owls became more prominent. Removal of Douglas firs from eastern Washington could damage the already low population of Spotted Owls, potentially driving them to extinction.

The situation is a delicate one. Removal of infected trees through fire or cutting will almost certainly harm Spotted Owls in these forests, but if such measures are not taken, entire forests may be lost to the budworms. Such measures also mean a halt to the logging industry that supports much of the Washington economy.

The only solution is then the most difficult one. Small tracts of forest must be returned one at a time to their natural balance, allowing the owls to migrate, by planned forest fires and selective cutting. Though this process is longer and more difficult than wide-scale burns, as well as costly, it is important if the natural balance of the Washington forests are to be returned.

Live performs at crowded Gerhard Fieldhouse

By Chad Flood
Staff Writer

"Overcome," alternative rock band Live's newest hit, has practically become widely associated with the Sept. 11 tragedy. They have released five solid albums and supported them with radio-friendly singles. However, in lead singer Ed Kowalczyk's own words, "What they play on the radio these days sucks!" This may be indicative of why this weekend's show was so good.

With the recent release of their new album, V, I was worried that the night would consist of mostly songs from that album, with an occasional radio-hit tossed in the mix to hold the audience's attention. It seemed that my initial fears were becoming reality when they opened with "Simple Creed" and "Like a Soldier," both songs from the new album.

However, the band only played five songs total from their latest effort, and without flashy gimmicks or unnecessary banter, were able to captivate the crowded fieldhouse for the duration of their 90-minute set.

Just four songs into the set, favorite "All Over You" re-energized an already excited audience. Featuring songs from all but one of their albums, the show quickly became an anthology of the past 10 years of Live's history.

The defining moment of the night came when, in honor of the events in New York City, Live performed a beautiful rendition of John Lennon's "Imagine" in the middle of the show, allowing the audience to reflect and relax a little between songs. The show quickly picked up, as in the next five songs the band ripped through "Lakini's Juice," 'Lightning Crashes," "The Dolphin's Cry" and "White, Discussion," the final song of the set.

For the encore performance, the band changed their original selection to "Shit Towne" in reaction to a sign held up by a concertgoer. The show ended with what may be the band's biggest hit to date, "I Alone."

The concert concluded with a reserved and emotional version of "Overcome," a song that might not have even been released as a single were it not for the events of Sept. 11.

The crowd of over 4,000 people got its money's worth. Live had everything going for them that the Foo Fighters did not last year—a relaxed but powerful show with surprisingly good sound.

Fans knew their songs, were able to relate to many of them and appreciated the fact that a hugely popular, fairly local act could still return to its roots and perform on a smaller level than it was used to—and still rock.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Over 4,000 enthusiastic fans attended the Live concert on Saturday night.

"Hard Times" a believable period piece

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

The Department of Theater and Dance presented the University community with a successful depiction of Charles Dickens' "Hard Times" last weekend. This satire focuses on a time when fact was valued more than imagination, and the battle of the social classes was at its height.

"Hard Times," the fall mainstage placed in Tustin Studio Theater, tells the story of characters of various classes whose lives are interestingly intertwined. Mr. Gradgrind is a man who lives his life only by the hard facts. His daughter, Louisa, is forced to live this way as well. She suppresses the inevitable human emotions that exist inside her and is used as a pawn by her brother, Tom. She is also victimized by Mr. Harthouse, a man who takes up the challenge of bringing out her emotional side by gaining her trust.

Meanwhile, the social Mr. Bounderby, who is used to getting what he wants, preys on Louisa to be his wife. He runs his business with a no-nonsense attitude, often oppressing his hard-working employees while he dines every night at a table set with an elaborate and filling meal.

Sissy, a girl who has lived the circus life, is adopted by the Gradgrinds after her father leaves, and soon becomes a part of the family—though she is not as easily influenced by their fact-based lifestyle.

Mr. Blackpool struggles to live the obedient life of the working class while the rest of his social class is trying to break away from the master/slave dynamic and protecting themselves by forming a union.

The play consisted of a sparse set of wooden planks as the stage and the use of the bleachers and balconies, with the occasional table and chair.

This setup contributed well to the play since the characters integrated themselves into the space of the audience. When individual characters narrated or the entire cast was together for a scene, they would make use of the bleachers, walking up, down and around the sides and the audience members.

The costumes were well done—each suit accentuated the rigid and formal manner of the upper class men. The upper class women were proper in their dresses and curled hair, while a shabby shawl distinguished a woman of the lower class.

The cast performed well, and the fact that they had learned and practiced to skillfully speak with certain accents was even more impressive. The mannerisms and movements of the characters were essential to the performance. They were able to portray the change in the characters as their ways of life moved from widely-accepted stoicism to a more openly emotional state.

The audience members enjoyed this change in the characters.

"I liked how the characters gave their own little asides about what was going on, because it let you see their own reactions, and what they were doing or thinking at the time," Grace Annis '03 said. "It also helped to show the change in the character."

Others liked the underlying connection joining all of the characters.

"I liked the gradual progression of the play that revealed connections between characters that I hadn't suspected," Nicole Sizgorich '02 said.

The set, actors and costumes in "Hard Times" worked together to produce a believable period piece, embodying the ideas and movements of Dickens' times.

Hartman exhibits passion and grace in dance

By Andrew Clugston
Staff Writer

The famous dancer and choreographer Martha Graham once said "great dancers are not great because of their technique, they are great because of their passions." When people watch Kara Hartman '02 dance, many will see such passion.

Originally from the Lewisburg area, Hartman's ascent to become one of the University's dancers started at an early age.

"I had my first dance class at the Moyer Institute of Dance in Sunbury when I was eight and I loved it," said Hartman, a petite senior. "I've been dancing ever since."

Specializing in ballet, but nonetheless establishing a solid foundation in other styles such as modern, jazz and pointe, Hartman demonstrated talent and promise early in her career.

She was encouraged by instructors to expand her potential and look beyond the region's dance opportunities.

"At 13, I auditioned for the Pittsburgh Ballet Summer Program, having just about convinced myself that dance would be my career for life,' she said.

Hartman has never looked back, developing her technical and artistic skills through a number of distinguished summer programs and auditions, including the Joffrey Ballet School and the American Ballet Theater.

Hartman's reverence for her art is central to her development as an artist.

"I greatly respect the art of dancing, whether it be for pleasure with Bucknell's encouraging and inspiring dance company, or otherwise," she said. "Then again, you have to respect the art and its instructors to grow; you cannot let skill get to your head."

This is both an attitude and an approach highly regarded by Director and Professor of Dance Er-Dong Hu, who has known Hartman since she started dancing with the company at 14.

"I am delighted to have been able to work with Kara over the last seven years," he said. "I have watched her develop as a dancer and a person and I can only praise her for her personality and progress. She is an exceptional individual—consistently giving her 100 percent, both in class and on stage, both technically and artistically.

Hu said Hartman has many different strengths contributing greatly to her success.

"Her versatility is inspiring to many because she is so strong in so many areas," he said. "In one piece she'll be classy and romantic, and in the next she'll be sexy and eccentric. She can do it all, and can do it well."

Versatility also applies to Hartman in the broader sense.

In addition to her involvement in dance and with the University Dance Company, Hartman is working towards her B.S. in electrical engineering.

"It can definitely be stressful," she said, beaming. "But at the same time, the combination of engineering and dance reinforce each other. When I'm done in the lab, dancing provides a great outlet, and in turn, dance revitalizes my ability to stay motivated and enthusiastic about my classes."

Graduating in May, Hartman intends to pursue a career in electrical engineering. Before graduation, however, she will perform in and co-choreograph a piece for the Dance Company's fall shows on Dec. 7 and 8.

"She is a strong person—disciplined, extremely talented and very intelligent," Hu said. "She is one of those students whom we shall miss. She has touched our lives as both a top student and dear family member of our university."

"Madame F" addresses Holocaust trials

By Sara Endyke and Becky Champagne
Staff Writers

"An Evening with Madame F" portrayed the experience of the Nazi concentration camps to the University in an evening filled with life, death, hope and renewal. Drawing upon survivor accounts, including that of Fania Fenelon, a performer in the Women's Orchestra at Auschwitz, a musician, an actor and a playwright Claudia Stevens brings drama and music to the steps of Rooke Chapel in an emotionally-charged performance.

The performance was not a first-hand account, but rather partially a theatrical representation of Fania Fenelon's book, "The Musicians of Auschwitz." Claudia Stevens portrays Fania Fenelon. Her story begins in Auschwitz, where, for the crime of being a Jew, she was sent to the concentration camps facing probable death. As a prisoner, she was forced to entertain Nazi officials in the wake of the Holocaust.

She asked the audience if they wondered how she could reconcile herself to that. Musicians today, she said, sell their art for vanity, so that they can be rock stars; whereas she played her art to clear her mind, lift her soul and spread some hope among the victims. Most importantly, she created music to live.

Her speciality, "Madame Butterfly," began the evening's performance. The incredible strength of her voice and the intensity of the piano accompaniment flooded Rooke Chapel, entrancing the audience undoubtedly as it had once entranced the Nazis, for she was allowed to survive one more day because of her music. As a member of a female orchestra, she finds a new life as she comes to realize that all of the goals and meaning of her life have vanished, replaced by only one: to sing and play is to live.

Her years at the concentration camp were spent composing performances, playing waltzes for the SS soldiers, playing personally for her captors and "singing with the jaws of death open." In one event, she sings, "You Are My Heart's Delight" for Josef Mengala, the infamous "Doctor of Death," whose atrocities stun the medical field today, and Heinrich Himmler, commander of the SS officers.

When Himmler criticizes the orchestra, every orchestra member fears his/her imminent death in the gas chambers, but Madame F. remarks, "Isn't that the point?" From there, she makes little acts of defiance, arranging marches and operas out of the works of Jewish writers and French resistance songs.

The songs were secretly hopeful and rebellious without the German soldiers' knowledge. Yet she confesses that the Germans were too dumb to notice the prisoners' "pitiful revenge." When Fania was transferred from Auschwitz to another concentration camp, Bergen Belsen, she finds that her only sanity is taken away by the disintegration of the orchestra.

Wasting away in the camp, with no identity or solace, she realizes the hopelessness of all, and lies among the dead Jews, whose bodies are discarded in the streets because of the lack of room in the crematorium. She awakens, almost as if in a dream, to find that the English have liberated the camp. She realizes that song is life, and she rejoices to sing the French national anthem, "La Marseillaise," for the prisoners, the soldiers and herself.

"An Evening with Madame F." tells the story of Fania Fenelon, who throughout her time in Auschwitz and Bergen Belsen struggles to find peace and humanity in the face of terror and cruelty. The orchestra in which she participated gave her hope amidst the dehumanizing effects of Nazi concentration camps and showed her that her life was singing—and singing could save her life.

Food fair opens eyes to cultural diversity within the community

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Features Editor

The University and the Lewisburg community celebrated the cultural diversity on campus and in the community at the annual International Food Fair in Larison Dining Hall on Sun. Nov. 4. The event has been hosted by International Spectrum for over 10 years and throughout its history has always included both the University and the community.

Much of the success of the food fair was due to the leadership efforts of Vanessa Fuquene-Pena '04, president of International Spectrum, who played a large role in coordinating the event.

William Schurmann—The Bucknellian

Sampling from the variety of international cuisines.

"I basically had my hands on everything. I made reservations, worked with dinning services, worked with individual clubs and organizations that participated in the event, made sure everything and everyone was at the right place at the right time, among hundreds of smaller things that pop up when putting an event together," Fuquene-Pena said.

Working with Fuquene-Pena were Susan Zingale-Baird, international students advisor and advisor for International Spectrum, Nathan Zapata, social chair of International Spectrum, Julien Faure, Treasurer of International Spectrum, Evelyn Tellez, a current member of International Spectrum and Pawin Sriusvagool, member and 2000-2001 president of International Spectrum.

Tables of the represented nations were organized regionally, so that participants could tour through each continent, reflecting this year's theme, "World Tour 2001."

Participating nations and cultural organizations included the Japan Society, Korean Association, Thailand, Spain, Ecuador, Sri Lanka, Middle Eastern Association, Mexico, Venezuela, Botswana, Burma, Turkey, Italy, Chinese Cultural Association, German Club, Bucknell Russian Culture Society, French Club, Hillel, The Philippines and Cumbre.

The ultimate goal is to educate participants about the various cultural aspects of the country that they are "visiting," not simply the food. In accomplishing this goal, each table had as its background the flag of the nation it represented. The tables were also decorated with photos, musical instruments and other relics that reflected the nation's heritage. A map of each country, including information about the population, size, language, currency and other interesting facts, was also displayed at each table. In addition, entertainment included an African story by Kyle Lange, a piñata and a performance by Two Past Midnight.

William Schurmann—The Bucknellian

Two students offer greetings and food to the attendees.

"We really want people to go by the tables asking questions, looking at the displays, interacting and learning, listening to the music, understanding the performances and of course try the food, but don't just get food and walk away," Fuquene-Pena said.

The success of the food fair is dependent upon a "combination of involvement from the student body and the community," Zingale-Baird said. The event was open to all members of the University and was also advertised to the surrounding communities. In an additional attempt to include the children of Lewisburg, all third and fourth graders in Lewisburg schools received personal invitations.

William Schurmann—The Bucknellian

The breaking of a Pinata was one of the many activities offered at the food fair.

"One of the goals of International Spectrum is to promote cultural awareness throughout the University and the nearby communities. In order to accomplish this, the event has always been open to everyone at the University and outside of the University," Fuquene-Pena said.

This goal was certainly met, as the event drew both members of the University and the community, enhancing the cultural experience for all involved.

"I was very impressed with the number of people there; the number of cultures represented, the amount of students who showed up to support it and even the turn out of non-University students from the town," Julianna Pietak '04 said. "It was a great opportunity to experience not only a diverse number of cultures represented in the world, but the diverse number of cultures represented on campus as well."

In the wake of the Sept. 11 tragedy, Zingale-Baird feels that the International Food Fair was particularly significant for Middle Eastern students in comfortably celebrating their culture with their community.

"This year it was especially important for our Middle Eastern students to have a chance to share their culture by wearing their traditional clothes and showing pride in their counties," Zingale-Baird said.

Both Zingale-Baird and Fuquene-Pena were pleased with the success of the fair and the receptive attitude of all participants. Students left the food fair both having been educated by their peers and also impressed by the tremendous collective effort that went into making the event a success.

"It was a great way to experience a variety of cultures and foods," Chase Heitman '05 said. "I was especially impressed by the cultural performances and also the elements, like native dress, displayed by students representing each country."

Responses such as this reflect the appreciation of cultural diversity that is the driving force behind International Spectrum and events such as the International Food Fair, which Fuquene-Pena simply describes as "a great opportunity for all people to look beyond what they see everyday and open their eyes to the rest of the world."

La Primavera Italiano Restorante: Bon Appetit

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

La Primavera brings the diverse tastes of Italy to Lewisburg.

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

Celebrating its one-year anniversary last week, La Primavera has become popular Italian restaurant for many local residents.

Located one mile west of Route 15 on Route 45, La Primavera offers a tasty and affordable menu in a friendly atmosphere and is open for both lunch and dinner (closed Mondays).

The décor is unquestionably in need of reconsideration. The fake potted trees and mini-chandeliers were rather tasteless, but the appearance belies the restaurant's quality. Once seated in the comfortable chairs around tables that are adorned with white tablecloths, complementing wine red cloth napkins and sparkling silverware, you will quickly begin to enjoy the setting. Relax, listening to the music of Italy and an array of its most loved opera classics.

La Primavera's extensive menu is its main attraction, offering a wide variety of Italian cuisine. Salads, pizzas, pastas and calzones each have their own page in the menu. As alternatives, veal dishes, steaks and fresh seafood such as salmon and calamari are offered. There are also separate children's and desert menus.

Salads, such as the Caesar, are tasty and fresh. They are definitely large enough to satisfy the appetite of two rather than one.

Daily specials, such as cream of broccoli soup, calamari, tortillini alfredo and fetticini alfredo, are absolutely delicious and all priced moderately.

The pizza, baked with fresh mozzarella, mushrooms and artichokes, is also available and is large enough for two people to spilt. This is, by far, some of the best pizza in town.

Another delight is the free appetizer of bruschetta, made with tasty fresh tomatoes and olive oil and followed by a basket of warmed bread and butter.

For those in the mood for something less Italian, La Primavera serves the veal and steak dishes, which are usually complemented by a more traditional side dish of pasta.

> Daily specials, such as cream of broccoli soup, calamari, tortillini alfredo and fetticini alfredo, are absolutely delicious and all priced moderately.

While some of the prices may seem high, the food is definitely worth the average $10 for an entrée. Servings are all large and the food is excellent.

The quick and friendly service is undeniably impressive. Once you are seated, a member of the pleasant staff immediately greets you. The wait for food is short, and the entrees arrive fresh and hot.

The dress at La Primavera is casual, despite the white tablecloth setting. Many wear jeans and families brought their children of all ages. Fortunately for those with larger groups or families, the dinning area has many large round tables.

While they are not required and La Primavera works quickly to seat all of its hungry customers, reservations are recommended. On average, the wait for those without reservations is about 20 minutes.

At La Primavera one can receive the service and quality of fine dinning at reasonable price. For those who love Italian food, this restaurant has a great menu, just bring a bottle of wine along to enhance the experience.

And if you decide you do not have the time or the means to drive, the restaurant also offers take out, just call 523-1515. Bon appetit!

Art director prepares for new position

By Alyson Walker
Staff Writer

If you have been to the third floor of the Langone Center, you may have noticed a new person milling around. Meet Dan Mills, director of the Samek Art Gallery, new to the University this year.

Prior to coming to campus, Mills worked for State University of New York as a director of a college art museum and in Chicago for 14 years as the curator for a large private collection.

So far, Mills is very excited to be here and is pleased with his new home.

"I like it here very much. It is a wonderful university, and I'm glad to be here in this location with this group of colleagues and students," Mills said.

Some may think that after spending 14 years in Chicago, the Lewisburg area might be an unwelcome change. For Mills, it is not.

"One of the great things about the job as director-curator is that I really need to go to art centers and view art and meet with artists. So, living in a small town but with a job that makes it necessary to travel to New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, D.C. is really the best of both worlds," Mills said.

Mills is focusing this semester on familiarizing himself with the permanent collection of the Samek Gallery. There are over 8,000 objects in the University collection, some of which include eighteenth century English caricatures, twentieth century photographs, prints and drawings and the Kress Collection of Baroque and Renaissance Art.

Also in the University collection are Japanese decorative arts, including netsuke, small figurines which evolved into high art after originally being the toggles at the bottom of cords worn over Japanese kimono robes.

"I'm very interested in first getting to know this collection better, which I'm in the process of doing this first semester and in figuring out ways to make this resource more accessible to students in support of academics on campus," Mills said.

Mills has been researching ways to make the permanent collection more accessible to University faculty and students. He is hopeful to get the collection onto a database with images and texts for the works. This way it would be available for viewing, since most of the collection is in storage.

> "In the liberal arts environment, I think it's really important to organize exhibits across disciplines, themes and media, so that it may be engaging and of interest to students and others from various backgrounds and disciplines.
> —Dan Mills

Students and faculty could then make private appointments to view the works or have groups come in to see them, hopefully creating more interdisciplinary ties.

"One of the reasons I'm really pleased to be here is because of the liberal arts environment," Mills said. "In the liberal arts environment, I think it's really important to organize exhibits across disciplines, themes and media, so that it may be engaging and of interest to students and others from various backgrounds and disciplines. I find that really exciting."

The primary users of the gallery tend to be art students, but Mills pointed out, "Art speaks to issues from different periods of time." Anyone studying a certain time period can benefit from viewing the art of that time.

The current exhibits in the Samek Art Gallery, "Portraits of Life-Sentenced Women" by Mary DeWitt and "Cellblock Visions 2001," demonstrate the cross-disciplinary ties of which Mills speaks. On Nov. 13, at 7:30 p.m. in the L.C. Forum there will be a panel discussion titled "Meeting the Needs of Incarcerated Women."

These panelists are not artists; rather, they come from varied backgrounds, and include speakers from groups such as the State Correctional Institute, Lewisburg Prison Project and Transitional Living Center. The talk will be moderated by Matthew Silberman, professor of sociology and anthropology.

Mills is interested in inviting student groups, whether academic or social, to use the art gallery in different ways. He is willing to give talks in either a casual or lecture style, or groups could use the gallery as a backdrop for functions or meetings.

"I'm interested in having the gallery and the arts become more a part of people's lives on a regular basis," Mills said.

The second exhibit next semester will be Mills' premiere at the University with an exhibit for which he was the curator. It is titled "Issues of Identity in Recent American Art," and he is hoping to have some of the artists come and speak. The pieces all address issues of gender, race, culture, and other forms of identity and were created by nine artists who, according to Mills, are "some of the most significant artists working today that address identity issues in their work."

Mills is also very excited about the course that he is teaching, Gallery Practices, which will be offered for the spring semester. Any student who is interested in art, art history, museum practices in any discipline or is curious about how galleries function would benefit from this course.

"When a viewer walks in, he or she might be totally unaware of the very aspects of exhibitions that a student in this course may apply," Mills said. "The well-conceived and well-installed exhibition can be magical." He refers to the class as the "'Penn and Teller' of Museum Practices."

The largest challenge facing Mills is location. Being on the third floor of the Langone Center, the Samek Gallery is not part of the most common thoroughfare on campus, but it still attracts a large number of viewers. The last exhibit had approximately 2,500 visitors. Although it may not be en route anywhere, Mill advises that it is definitely worth a visit.

Mills' philosophy is to organize exhibitions of the highest level, to have them accessible to everyone and to have people feel welcome to come in and view the exhibitions and participate in the programming. "I'm interested in introducing the people who are intimidated by art to feel welcome in the gallery, to view and participate in the arts," Mills said.

The exhibitions are all free of charge, and when an exhibition is on display, the Samek Gallery is open Mon. through Fri. from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Sat. and Sun. from 1 to 4 p.m.

BSG modifies club recognition policy

By Jason Rubinstein
Associate Editor

The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) passed a new policy this week that calls for a restructuring of the system for recognition of student organizations. Upon determining numerous problems with the current system, the BSG Recognition Committee began to investigate a new means in which to recognize clubs last January.

The Recognition Committee consists of three members of appropriations responsible for funding, two members of internal affairs responsible for laws, Vice President of Operations Jen Collier '03 and the chair, Erica Delsandro '02.

"When we started last year we didn't know where we were at and spent the semester determining our direction and why the present method was unfair," said Omar Zalatimo, chair of Internal Affairs and member of the Recognition Committee.

The new policy calls for each organization to exist in one of 13 different categories, including a miscellaneous category. The previous system had three large categories: partial, full and not recognized.

> "The hope is that all clubs in general will benefit from this new policy. Groups will not necessarily receive more money, but it will be more efficient to their purpose.
> —Omar Zalatimo, Recognition Committee

Organizations that discriminated membership were partially recognized and only guaranteed operating costs. Academic honors societies, for example, discriminate based on grades. Most other organizations such as Activities and Campus Events are fully recognized.

"With the previous system some organizations were taking advantage of the money while others were suffering," said Chris Dinkelmeyer '02, BSG parliamentarian and member of the Recognition Committee.

Two significant problems with the previous system were clubs overlapping and lack of guidance for the Appropriations Committee.

Overlapping occurs when an organization requests funding for an event while another organization is already funding a similar event. For example, both an honors society and an academic club in the same discipline may have hosted similar speakers.

Last spring BSG allocated over $347,000 to 103 organizations and clubs. The Appropriations Committee found it difficult to allocate necessary funds when clubs and organizations were separated into three categories.

"Club recognition and appropriations go hand-in-hand," Zalatimo said.

Under the new policy, the Appropriations Committee will still have the last say but will have more direction when allocating funds, being able to distribute it more evenly and fairly.

"It makes it easier on them because they have more guidelines," Dinkelmeyer said. "An organization can now be more in line with what their goals are, but it will be harder to get money for other things that may not be relevant to their purpose."

The new policy divides clubs and organizations into the following 12 categories: honors, academic, athletics, performance, Greek, religious, diversity, media, service, BSG, interest and start-up. All newly recognized organizations will be categorized in the start-up category. There is also a miscellaneous category.

Each category has its own financial recommendations for funding based on the main objectives in regard to motivation, intent and commitment. Dinkelmeyer used academic groups as an example—they will now be more fully funded for speakers, but not as much for din-

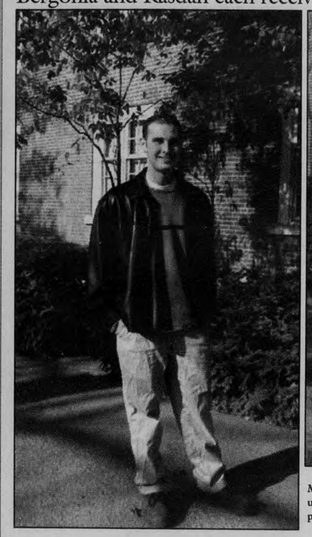
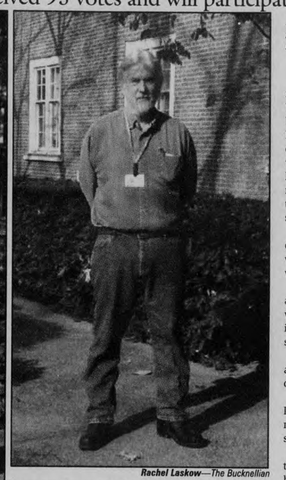
Official results reveal Ward III tie

Bergonia and Kasdan each received 95 votes and will participate in tie-breaker





Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

Matthew Kasdan '03 (left) and Peter Bergonia, utilities supervisor of Physical Plant, will participate in a tie-breaker on Nov. 26.

When the unofficial election results were announced early last Wednesday morning, the numbers showed Republican Peter Bergonia beating Matthew Kasdan '03 by one vote. However, when the official count was released on Tuesday, the numbers reveal that Bergonia and Kasdan tied for the two-year Ward III seat, each receiving 95 votes.

According to Patricia Nace, election coordinator, the votes were counted again because it was such a close call.

"I was shocked and really, really excited. Before I lost by one vote and now it's tied up—it's an incredible experience," Kasdan said.

According to Bergonia, he had a neutral reaction when he found out about the tie.

Bucknell Student Government President Nathan Sorber '02, who recently ran for mayor, also shares this enthusiasm.

"I'm very excited [that Matthew tied]. This whole process has had several hurdles to go over to get goals accomplished.

Diversity Report labeled "wake-up call"

Committee for Campus Diversity looking into future means to increase diversity

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

The data compiled from last year's campus climate survey was recently presented to the University's faculty, staff and administration and many were surprised by what the Campus Climate Report revealed.

While the University has made great strides in diversification in past years, the report revealed that we still have a long way to go to ensure that people of all genders, sexualities and ethnicities feel welcome and safe on campus.

According to the report, only 22 percent of the nearly 5000 students, faculty and staff given the survey responded, including a 20 percent response from undergraduate students. Thirty percent of the respondents reported hearing students make negative or offensive remarks about women or LGBT individuals more than six times in the year. A significant number of LGBT individuals reported experiencing harassment, as did a substantial number of racial and ethnic minorities. In addition, "Over half of the respondents indicated that the classroom climate on campus was not welcoming of diverse individuals."

> "Over half of the respondents indicated that the classroom climate on campus was not welcoming of diverse individuals.
> —2000-2001 Campus Climate Report

Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Robert Midkiff, a member of the Committee for Campus Diversity (CCD), said that many people have been startled by the report, which he presented at the faculty meeting, the administrative forum and the support staff forum.

Midkiff believes the report "represents a wake-up call to all of us." In particular, he finds it disturbing that more than half the respondents feel that the classroom climate and work environment on campus are not welcoming.

Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock, who joined the CCD as chair this past summer, feels that the report indicates that much work is still needed to achieve the campus climate the University desires. He also states that the University is interested in obtaining comparative data from other institutions, which will help the University to determine if its situation differs greatly or "mirrors the norm."

Midkiff stated that though many groups are disappointed with what the report revealed, people are already asking, "in true Bucknell fashion," what can be done to improve the situation.

He believes that, aside from the statistics, the University has learned a great deal from this report. "We learned that our efforts to create a more positive climate on campus must target all constituencies—behaviors that interfere with climate and are experienced as harassment on campus occur in the student body, in the faculty and in the staff." The report provides a valid and useful assessment upon which future plans for diversity can be based.

The CCD can decide on what actions it can take in the future

Trustees broaden communication link with University over weekend

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

Last weekend trustees converged on the campus and met with students, faculty and staff to discuss the future of the University.

Trustee Weekend began last Thursday as various organizations such as Habitat for Humanity, the varsity wrestling team, and the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice sent representatives to discuss University issues during Trustee Access Day. Later that evening, faculty and trustees met in the relaxed setting of faculty homes.

Last Friday, trustees met with their various committees, and after a long day, ate with students and faculty during dinner. A presentation by Steve Knotek and Bill Flack highlighted the dinner. Both Knotek and Flack discussed "Crisis and Psychological First Aid: Bucknell's Response to Sept. 11."

Saturday was packed with action as Trustees participated in the dedication of the Moriarty Investment Lab Suite in Taylor Hall and the Berelson Center for Jewish Life.

Berelson Center officially dedicated as new Hillel house

The Berelson Center for Jewish Life was officially dedicated on Saturday, Nov. 10. The new Hillel house, with renovations made possible with funds donated by trustee Stuart Berelson '59, is equipped to meet the needs of the approximately 200 Jewish students on campus. Since 1977, Martin House was considered the Hillel House.

"It really was not adequate for our needs," Rabbi Serena Fujita said about Martin House.

"The new house is big, comfortable and looks like a home. It is already drawing more Jewish students currently on campus, and it is welcoming to prospective students," Fujita said.

The new building is a renovated faculty house and it includes two lounges, a library/study room, a room for worship and two kitchens—one of which is kosher.

"Appearance-wise, the new house is much more welcoming," said Danielle Cannon, president of Hillel. "Unlike Martin house, it is not a dorm—it feels like you are actually walking into a house."

University Chaplain Ian Oliver echoed Cannon's sentiments.

"Hillel really didn't have a home until now. They will be able to do so much more," Oliver said.

Although the Berelson Center for Jewish Life has been open and functioning since August, the dedication ceremony took place over Trustee Weekend to accommodate the attendance of Berelson and his wife, Betty. The ceremony consisted of an invocation by Fujita, University President Steffen Rogers, Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, and Oliver all made remarks that were followed by a ribbon cutting. Berelson and Fujita then made the closing remarks, ending the ceremony.

Bucknell Brigade pitches numerous fundraisers for spring trip

By Matt Ellis
Features Editor

The Bucknell Brigade has recently been completing fundraisers in order to prepare for its next relief trip to Nicaragua.

The Brigade is comprised of University students, faculty and staff members who are committed to aiding poverty-stricken people of Nicaragua. The organizations main area of concern is the village of Nueva Vida.

Nueva Vida, which is Spanish for "new life," is a resettlement community outside of Managua. It was formed when a small village was flooded after Hurricane Mitch struck the country. Since the organization's first trip, four additional Brigades have traveled to Nicaragua to complete volunteer service.

The Brigade collects monetary and medical donations to take on its two annual service trips to Nicaragua. Also, the Brigade will be placing a "rainbow list" that is a list of all medicines that the organization would like to collect for the upcoming trip.

Currently, the Brigade is conducting several fundraisers in order to pay for their next trip to Nicaragua. The group is selling apple and pumpkin pies for $10 each and is also receiving donations of medical supplies in order to help to keep the University-built clinic in Nicaragua fully stocked. The Brigade will transport all pharmaceuticals or medical samples donated.

The Bucknellian Archives

Twenty-one students and four University staff members helped complete a clinic in Nicaragua last January during the fourth Bucknell Brigade. The Brigade is planning a fifth trip later in the year.

In December, the Brigade will sell Nicaraguan Cultural Alliance Christmas cards. Every year the club gets a great response from this fundraiser and they are hoping for the same this year.

"Students in the Brigade are extremely helpful with fundraising. Many members will fundraise in their hometowns and local churches. We get really great participation," Maria Lopez '02 said.

Dr. Donald Stechschulte, director of Student Health Services, stressed the importance of funding the Brigade.

"The organization pays for everything by fundraising. Last year, the Brigade raised over $40,000 to build a permanent medical clinic in the village," Stechschulte said.

While in Nicaragua, the Brigade will do everything from staffing the medical center to digging latrines for the local village. The work is completed by University students and labor from the surrounding area.

"Originally, the Brigade started out as a fundraising-only organization, but now it is a fully hands-on experience," Stechschulte said.

The Brigade's next trip will be from Jan. 7-15. The organization will spend two days traveling and nine days in the village. The following trip will be over spring break.

"The organization really provided me with an eye opening experience. I was able to do stuff that I normally would never get a chance to do," Stechschulte said. "It is truly a life changing experience that has caused a couple of students to change their majors."

The Brigade will also be featured on an upcoming episode of the Weather Channel's series on natural disasters and people and organizations that are doing humanitarian work in the chaos that pursues. The Brigade will occupy a 10 minute portion of the thirty-minute show, "Hurricane Heroes," airing Dec. 9 during primetime. The 10 minute slot will feature interviews with Lopez, Steven Cowfer '02, Sarah Rives '02, University Chaplain Ian Oliver and Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center and advisor to the Brigade.

Both Butler and Lopez continually seeks help with monetary or medical donations as well as students interested in volunteering.

"I don't know what work we are going to be doing on this upcoming trip. We are looking forward to having a good time and getting to know everyone," Cowfer said.

Investigators focus on jet's tail

NEW YORK—Investigators seeking the cause of the crash of American Airlines Flight 587 took a new look Wednesday at the tail section of the Airbus A300 jet, which was sheared off in midair. Authorities continued to say that mechanical failure was probably responsible, though they also were looking into whether turbulence from a 747's wake also played a role.

They began examining the plane's flight data recorder, hopeful that it would help determine what caused the jet to nose-dive into a Queens, N.Y., neighborhood moments after takeoff.

Taliban appears to quit Kandahar

Afghanistan's ruling Taliban appeared to be abandoning its southern base of Kandahar, a senior U.S. official told NBC News, although it was unclear whether it was being overrun by troops of the main opposition Northern Alliance or falling to independent tribal forces.

NBC News also learned late Wednesday that U.S. forces had bombed a building believed to contain senior leaders of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network.

United Nations readies for new Afghan order

UNITED NATIONS—Under a U.N. plan endorsed Wednesday, leaders of Afghanistan's political factions will be invited to meet in the United Arab Emirates to formulate plans for a transition government, possibly as early as this weekend. The plan came together quickly in the wake of Kabul's fall to opposition forces Tuesday, part of an effort to prevent anarchy in areas abandoned by the Taliban.

Nuclear papers found in Kabul

LONDON—Documents giving details of how to build a nuclear bomb have been found in a looted Kabul house used by Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida network, The Times reported Thursday.

Notes in Arabic, German, Urdu and English described the detonation of explosives to compress plutonium and trigger a thermonuclear reaction, the paper said.

Bin Laden, accused by the United States of masterminding the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, has claimed to have a nuclear bomb—a claim dismissed last weekend by British Defense Minister Geoff Hoon.

Senate rejects stimulus package

WASHINGTON—Senate Republicans on Wednesday blocked a $73 billion Democratic stimulus package containing more government spending than President Bush wants and too few tax cuts. Lawmakers said the maneuver could actually clear the way for serious bipartisan negotiations to begin.

The point of Wednesday's vote, several lawmakers said, was to make clear that nothing will happen without bipartisan talks—and politicians are loath to be seen as doing nothing to help the struggling economy.

AOL shows its marketing wizardry

The magical Harry Potter movie is widely expected to reach blockbuster proportions and start a franchise for AOL Time Warner. But the real story may be about the wizardry of the company's internal marketing and ability to cross promote—an example of how the merger between AOL and Time Warner works to promote a hit across all its properties, save marketing costs and drive customers across all the parts of its media empire.

Ford extends zero-percent financing

Ford Motor Co. matched General Motors Corp.'s extension of no-interest financing Wednesday, even as its top official questioned the sustainability of such a program.

The number two automaker announced it was extending zero-percent financing on 36-month contracts for most 2001 and 2002 Ford cars, trucks, sport utility vehicles and minivans through Jan. 14, 2002. Low-interest rates also were being offered on longer-term contracts.

Effective Nov. 21, interest rates on 2001 cars and trucks will be offered at zero to 3.9 percent interest, depending on the length of the contract. Interest rates on 2002 vehicles will range from zero to 5.9 percent.

Ailing airlines face rough skies ahead

Since Sept. 11, all the airlines have been carrying fewer passengers and losing millions of dollars a day. Whatever the cause of Monday's devastating crash on the Rockaway Beach area of Long Island in New York City, it can only make this financially fragile situation even worse.

For an industry already carrying 27 percent fewer passengers, the events of Monday have dealt a potentially devastating blow.

The airline industry has been reeling since Sept. 11, losing at least $7 billion and eliminating 100,000 jobs. Its problems are reverberating across the economy, with hotel occupancy still off 12 percent and car rentals down 10 percent. Travel for Thanksgiving, traditionally the busiest time of the year, is already reduced and is now expected to drop even further.

University students react to federal investigations on college campuses

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

As part of heightened U.S. security measures following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, federal agents have contacted administrators on over 200 college campuses nationwide to survey students of Middle Eastern descent, The New York Times reported Monday.

Investigators from both the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Immigration and Nationalization Service have, in many instances, also made visits to campuses to personally speak to students from the Middle East.

Questions regarding academic performance, current residence, post-graduation plans and personal views on Osama bin Laden have been among those that investigators posed to campus administrators and students. Frequently, campus officials say, the investigators arrive unannounced and in some cases, make several return visits.

One Saudi Arabian student attending the University of Colorado at Denver told The Times that after an interview with federal agents, they told him to "expect to see us again."

Such behavior by federal agents has mainly been necessitated by two things: A promise by President Bush to account for the half-million foreign students on college campuses nationwide and indications by the federal government that a terrorist with a student visa participated in the Sept. 11 attacks.

So far, according to The Times, the inquiries of campus officials regarding Middle Eastern students has not been heavily protested, because foreign students who live in the country through educational visas must permit their respective schools to give certain information to immigration officials. Still, as former Dartmouth College President James O. Freedman told The Times, "You don't want students to get the perception that you are in a league with those who may be out to get them."

Opinions on the University's campus regarding the recent behavior of federal agents is a mixture of support and dissent.

"It seems like a violation of the freedoms that make America unique and the freedoms that we are fighting for right now," Tim Smith '04 said. "Just because you are from a different part of the world doesn't give this nation the right to discriminate against you."

Zohare Haider, a sophomore from Pakistan, agrees with Smith that the government should find other means to conduct anti-terrorist activities.

"If a federal investigator showed up at my door, I would shut him up and tell him to leave," Haider said. "The government has no right to impede on my life and my privacy. I don't think it's fair nor right."

But according to Ankur Patel '04, an Indian-American student, the government is justified in engaging in such types of inquiry. "The government isn't judging students by questioning them, it's just trying to pursue leads, especially considering the incident involving the student visa," he said. "At this point, taking into consideration the magnitude of the Sept. 11 crisis, I feel the government's actions are justified."

This is one more fork in the road. I hope it turns out positive for Matthew on [Nov.] 26th," Sorber said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro feels that both candidates had a lot of support and therefore tied.

"I think Mr. Bergonia is a fine public-spirited gentleman who is cognizant of the needs of the permanent residents of Lewisburg; and I think Matthew Kasdan is a fine, public-spirited young man who is very knowledgeable of the needs of Bucknell residents downtown. I think both were worthy of support and I expect that is why they ended in a tie," Ferraro said.

When a tie between two candidates occurs, a tie breaker is held on the third Friday after Election Day. This year, the third Friday falls the day after Thanksgiving and the Courthouse is closed for the national holiday. The tie-breaker will take place on Monday, Nov. 26 at noon. The candidates may be present.

Kasdan will be present for the tie-breaker, but Bergonia will not be because he will be out of town.

According to Nace, a coin toss, drawing of straws or drawing of names will determine the winner.

"It is an interesting way in settling the election when it comes down to it. We both got 95 votes, so it's a 50-50 chance," Kasdan said.

Although Bergonia feels that there should be a better way to break the tie, he believes that it all comes down to whoever is the luckiest.

"All you can do is wait for the outcome and see what happens," Bergonia said.

Sorber does not feel that the impending tie-breaking measures are an unfair way to decide the winner.

"This may be the only way to move forward," Sorber said.

Ferraro believes that a run-off election would be a better way to find a winner, but he feels that a coin toss would be fair.

"I suppose if I had my choice I would prefer a run-off election, but if two candidates have the exact same number of votes, and the will of the people represents an absolute tie, then one can argue that a coin toss is efficient and fair," Ferraro said.

Kasdan expects that the tie will once again show the town that the students are an important and necessary constituency.

"If I win the tie-breaker, it shows the town how much the student body really cares and that we deserve a voice no matter what the outcome is. It might be an uphill battle, but I'm ready for it," Kasdan said.

ners and entertainment. They can still receive money for it, but organizations would have to show how it meets their purpose or how it would benefit the campus.

"The hope is that all clubs in general will benefit from this new policy. Groups will not necessarily receive more money, but it will be more efficient to their purpose," Zalatimo said.

Vice President of Finance and Member of the Recognition Committee Amir Sadaghiani '03 is optimistic about the implementation of the new recognition policy.

"The recognition committee has taken the first step in fixing the process for clubs," Sadaghiani said.

> "Clubs and organizations should be what they want, do want they want and be recognized for it, not forced to change their mission in order to acquire funds.
> —Erica Delsandro '02

Because the change is recent and not yet implemented, club executives are not aware of how the policy will potentially affect their organizations, whether it be positive or negative.

"It's still a work in progress. Because it is such a large change we do not know of its effect and we will continue to ask the student body how they feel about it," Zalatimo said.

The policy was passed last week and will plan to go into effect for budgeting in the spring.

"The next step is that the Appropriations Committee must redo their guideline book and make it consistent with the new categories. This has to be done before budgeting," Sadahiani said.

The Recognition Committee believes that the new policy will encourage organizations to continue with their original intentions.

"Clubs and organizations should be what they want, do want they want and be recognized for it, not forced to change their mission in order to acquire funds," Delsandro said.

to diversify the campus and how to incorporate those actions into the current projects. The CCD focused efforts in four primary areas for the 2000-2001 school year: recruitment and retention of students and of faculty and staff, building community support and momentum and assessment.

Midkiff states that the committee has made progress in these areas, but the projects are long-term. Currently the CCD is looking into how merit and other forms of financial aid might be used to increase campus diversity, as well as how to improve the quality of advising and attending to the special needs of diverse students.

The CCD also hopes to create a diversity website in the near future that will bring the diversity-related efforts of people on campus into the public eye.

As the University enters a new strategic planning phase with Visions 2010, the CCD hopes that diversity will be a key element. Midkiff stresses that the ability to work with a diverse group of people is essential.

"It seems incumbent upon the University to strengthen its efforts in increasing the diversity of the Bucknell community, including the student body, the faculty and the staff," Midkiff said.

According to Pollock, the University's commitment to diversity should "affect almost every element of the plan, from the student life and curricular portions to the student and faculty recruitment components."

Pollock states that he anticipates "broad appreciation" of whatever advances the University makes in regard to diversity

Midkiff hopes that students will support the CCD's efforts and will begin to reach out to students who have been targets of harassment.

"We cannot stop or rest on the issue of diversity. Our students and our colleagues ... deserve to feel safe, to be free from harassment and to feel welcome and accepted," Midkiff said.

Bill Schurmann—The Bucknellian

Trustees met with students and faculty for dinner over the weekend.

The biggest event of the weekend was the full board meeting where the future of the University was discussed. University President Steffen Rogers felt the meeting went well.

"I have never really considered the hundreds of board meetings I have attended to be exhiarating, but this was and demonstrated we had the full support of the board and could move Bucknell forward in the upcoming planning process," Rogers said.

Trustee Weekend was exceptionally productive and eventful. Janice Mann, assistant to the President and an instrumental coordinator during Trustee Weekend, commented that one of the best things that happened was the Trustee Access Day.

"The day really helped facilitate communication between the Trustees and the University Community," Mann said.

She felt it was great that members of the Bucknell community could talk with the trustees about what they have been doing and what they needed to do it better.

"The whole weekend was very positive for everyone concerned," Mann said.

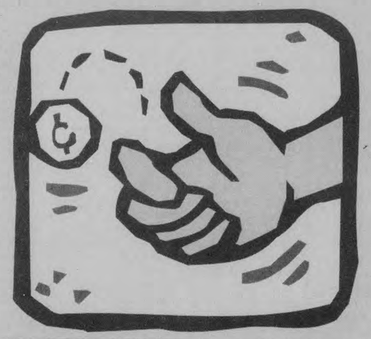
Coin toss could resolve election fairly

Last week's unofficial election results showed Republican Peter Bergonia winning the two-year Ward III seat by only one vote. However, official results released on Tuesday revealed that Matthew Kasdan '03 and Bergonia each received 95 votes, creating a tie. The winner of this close election will be determined on Monday, Nov. 26 with a simple coin toss, drawing of straws or drawing names. Although these methods may seem trivial, they are a fair and unbiased way to name a winner.

Another idea for electing a winner would be a runoff. Although this option appears to be the most obvious answer, there are several conflicts. For example, Election Day was on Nov. 6. By having a runoff, constituents would have to reschedule their work days to vote in an election in which they already chose a candidate.

In this specific situation, residents who voted for Democrat Steven Beattie would have to either vote for Kasdan or Bergonia, or not vote at all. This circumstance could create numerous problems. First, residents who voted for Beattie could vote for Bergonia for the mere reason that they do not want a student on Council. A second problem would be that if all democrats voted for Beattie on Election Day, they might not participate in a runoff because a republican candidate would be their only option.

A more mindful process to decide the winner would be a Borough Council vote. Although Council members would discuss the positives and negatives of each candidate, too many biases would be present. For example, Bergonia is currently a Council member and therefore his fellow Council members would most likely vote for his reelection. Would Bergonia be eligible to vote because he is a current Council member? Also, if the majority of the Council is republican, they might automatically chose Bergonia based on his party.



The Council is composed of eight ward members. It is likely that a small group of people will not be diverse and therefore biases will influence its decision making. All of the members of the Council are residents who may not want to include Kasdan as part of the Council, merely because he is a student.

Even though a runoff and Council vote are potential solutions for any general election, they are not the methods prescribed by Borough law. The coin toss, drawing straws or picking names out of a hat have been used in past elections and prove to be a fair ways to break the tie.

In this specific situation, a coin toss, drawing straws or drawing names will provide a winner without bias. On Nov. 26, the winner of the two-year Ward III seat will be determined. The Bucknellian congratulates both candidates and wishes them the best of luck. No matter who wins, the Council will see the importance of improving town-gown relations.

"Harry Potter" appeals beyond kids

The world of wizardry captures imagination for all ages

By Emily Novick
Staff Writer

What ever happened to imagination? Cars have TVs and VCRs so that, on car trips, parents can avoid conversing and playing with their children. There are even children's books where a child can point to a word and the book will pronounce it. Have we really lost our imaginations? Have we forgotten about creativity, daydreaming and fantasy worlds?

Enter Harry Potter, a revolution in children's literature and the rebirth of imagination. I am 21 years old and yes, I am an addict. Obsessed with a "child's book," I have successfully sorted every single person I know into four categories: Gryffindor, Hufflepuff, Ravenclaw and Slytherin (myself being a Gryffindor, my friends call me Hermione). I've renamed my least favorite professor, Professor Snape. And I truly believe that I belong in the wizard world.

"Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" is the first of four books in print by author J.K. Rowling. Rowling, who plans on a series of seven books, was a single-mom on welfare in England when she began writing Harry stories on napkins in a coffee shop for her young daughter. The amazing imagination of this one woman has opened the door for millions around the world. Whether readers are young children just exploring their imagination or adults who after many years are dusting off their spider-webbed imaginations, the juices are flowing.

Children love these books. They are reading for fun. They're camping out at bookstores all over the world to be the first to get their hands on each book as they are released. It's simply a phenomenon.

But children are not the only ones crazy for Harry. He is serious business. I know grandmothers, like the famous Grandma Kitty, fraternity brothers and sorority girls, dads in business suits, big-time athletes and stylish New Yorkers in their 20s who have caught the bug. "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire," book number four, is almost 800 pages long. Children's book? I don't think so.

So, what's it all about? Well, Harry Potter is an 11-year-old orphaned boy who lives with his dreadful aunt, uncle and cousin on Number 4 Privet Drive in the cupboard under the stairs. The magic begins on his 11th birthday when a letter arrives inviting Harry to Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry. It is then that Harry finds out that he is in fact a wizard, as both his parents were, although he has lived his whole life with his "muggle"—non magical—aunt, uncle and cousin.

Harry is also not an ordinary wizard. When he was a baby he somehow managed to survive an attack from the most powerful dark wizard He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named or if you have the guts to call him by name Lord Voldemort. From here Harry starts his seven year long education at Hogwarts School, one book per each year at the school.

Harry's two sidekicks are one Ron Weasley, a red-haired, freckle-faced boy from a large family of hrawizards and one Hermione Granger, a studious, know-it-all witch and daughter of a muggle dentist. At Hogwarts, Harry finds Hagrid the gamekeeper, Headmaster of Hogwarts Albus Dumbledore, Professor McGonagall, Ron's brother's Fred, George, and Percy, Draco Malfoy-Harry's archenemy, Nearly-Headless Nick the ghost and many many more.

The obsession with Harry Potter will see a huge boom tomorrow when the film "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" reaches theatres. The all-British cast boasts such talents as Richard Harris, Maggie Smith, Robbie Coltrane and the soon to be famous Daniel Radcliffe as Harry Potter.

The creation of the film is a huge debate among devoted fans. Harry Potter nuts, like me, fear that Hollywood will distort the story. But the author herself worked very closely with directors as to insure no inaccuracies (although I've already noticed that Ron Weasley has no freckles, as he should).

Many say that making Harry Potter into a movie will destroy the personal images of Harry, the Great Hall, Hogwarts, and Hogsmeade that millions have created for themselves. But the reality is that when I read Harry I still picture my Harry and my Hogwarts that I created in my head, not those I see advertised on tv.

So bring your Nimbus 2000 and some Bertie Bott's Every Flavor Beans to a bookstore or a movie theater (book before movie always). Enjoy something refreshing and escape to Hogwarts. Open up your mind. You could learn something like a memory charm, how to speak parseltongue, the many uses for unicorn blood, or how to travel by floo powder.

If not, you're just another muggle with no magical powers or imagination.

Letter to the editor

Administration and campus not so liberal

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to an article by Mr. Michael Gorman in which he asserted that there is no dominant conservative voice on campus. I'd like to counter that by saying that this university is dominated by conservative policy—be it the below living wage we pay our workers, the lack of minority voice and the overall conformist, capitalist attitude of our students.

Calling the administration and University President Steffen Rogers liberal by any means is ridiculous—although I guess you could say 1.) they certainly try or 2.) they are simply forced to by way of social norms that favor our much treasured "politically correct society."

Don't get me wrong. If conservatives want to have a formal voice on campus by means of a student run organization, that is their constitutional right. I wholeheartedly endorse a constructive political forum in which students can engage in fiery debate. Presenting both sides of any argument is always more beneficial.

But to say that the University is dominated by liberal politics .... My response to that is this: don't be fooled. Come to a "progressive" meeting sometime (i.e. the Catalyst/PULSE, EMSA or ADL). You will see only a minute portion of University students involved in these organizations and oftentimes it's the same core group of students anyway.

And while conservatives point to the fact that the University has FLAG&B and an office for those struggling with their sexual identity, for example, the fact remains that many students are afraid to reveal their sexual preference on this campus, in fear of peer ostracism and rejection.

So let's have our organizations where liberal and conservative can politely duke it out. That can only ameliorate our intellectual understanding of what's going on "out there". But please, let's not make gross assumptions about our university's political leanings. We're treading on some dangerous grounds if we do so.

RHA excels on a limited budget

Ideas abound from campus group while money restricts what it can achieve

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Layout Editor

From the "Who's on Top" game show for Sexual Responsibilities Week to Ping-Pong tournaments to RA appreciation, the Residence Hall Association (RHA) impacts the campus life of students as much as any other organization. Surprisingly though, few students fully understand what RHA does and even fewer are directly involved.

While it is difficult to determine whether its relatively small budget causes RHA to operate with a lower profile than other groups, like the Bucknell Student Government for example, or whether that lower profile is the cause for its smaller budget, it is clear that RHA rarely gets the credit and praise it deserves.

RHA's goals are determined annually by the University residents who actively voice their concerns and ideas. This focus takes shape on two levels: at the individual dorm level and at the campus level. The local focus of the organization should be a model for other campus-wide groups.

The unique structure of RHA allows it to play a major role in improving students' living experience despite its modest budget. According to RHA President Carol Varano '03, the focus is on getting people involved in projects that improve the features in dorms and projects that give back to the community. This is accomplished to a satisfactory degree right now, but RHA has higher aspirations.

"People do an amazing job working within the budget, but we want to do more. The game show last year, 'Who's on Top,' is an example of multiple dorms having to pool money to put on a program," Varano said.

Even though the University funding is tight in all departments, increasing the budget for RHA would be a wise investment. If an organization has demonstrated that it uses its funds prudently and has established that it has a significant positive influence on students, it would seem logical to increase that group's funding and allow them to expand the scope of their efforts. This is precisely the case with RHA.

RHA is careful to point out that it respects and admires the work of the two other groups on campus that serve a similar purpose and isn't advocating a transfer of funds from either of those groups to RHA. Nicole Loyd, assistant director of Housing and Residential Life and advisor to RHA explains, "We don't want a competition [for funds] with the CAP Center or ACE."

One responsibility that RHA currently has, that should be handled by the University's Physical Plant office, is the purchasing of ping-pong and foosball tables. RHA has to use some of its scarce resources to provide these for the dorms, which takes away from money that could be spent on programs to build hall and dorm pride. RHA should continue to serve the role of identifying the desires of students in each housing unit, but shouldn't be saddled with the costs. If the University wishes to continue the current process, there should be additional funds provided to RHA for this purpose.

Replacing existing older appliances or the purchasing special products, like larger televisions and pool tables, should continue to be the responsibility of RHAs if the residents choose to use their funds in that manner, but it is certainly a failing of the University when RHA is forced to choose between activities and events that increase hall pride and providing recreation activities for residents to enjoy in the dorms.

> "People do an amazing job working within the budget, but we want to do more. The game show last year, 'Who's on Top,' is an example of multiple dorms having to pool money to put on a program," Varano said.

Whichever solution the University chooses, RHA should be financially capable of serving the dual purpose that it has always been asked to: increase the pride that residents feel for their halls and dorms and improve the living conditions in those dorms by providing things for residents that aren't provided by Physical Plant. A secondary result of these changes will almost certainly be an increase in student interest and involvement in RHA. Ultimately, the students get more of what they want, the responsibilities of RHA and Physical Plant are more clearly defined and students become more involved in improving the quality of life for themselves.

Vote based on merit not age

As a University student, I am pleased that the University is seeking to become more involved in Lewisburg politics and to improve town-gown relations. However, as a Lewisburg resident, I am disturbed by the reactions I have witnessed from some students about the elections.

The controversy surrounding the recent elections has been a subject of much debate around campus and in my own personal experiences. I have no problem with students who want to get involved in Lewisburg politics—provided they want to get involved in all aspects of Lewisburg politics. I recognize that the University brings a lot to Lewisburg, both economically and culturally. However, I feel it is important for students to realize that there is a Lewisburg outside of the University. There are thousands of people who call Lewisburg their home who have no connection to the University whatsoever.

Although Nate Sorber '02 didn't win his position and Matthew Kasdan's '03 position is still pending, both campaigns made an important point—that students are willing to work with (or within) the local government to ensure that their voices are heard. I commend them for their ambition and perseverance. They truly represented the University in a professional and thoughtful way. They should both be proud of their accomplishments. Their campaigns were successful because they opened people's eyes to the fact that University students should and do have a say in how their town operates. The people of Lewisburg, including those University students who were genuinely concerned with the outcome of the vote, made their voices heard—and they opted to be represented by someone other than a University student. This is not a failure for the University, it is just the implementation of the wishes of the majority of the town.

It has recently been argued that students did not care enough about the elections. The students in question said that they did not know enough about the issues to make an informed decision. I think that, given the circumstances, they were right not to vote. They should not have voted simply out of an obligation to a fellow student or to the University. Their votes were contributing to an outcome that would undoubtedly affect the lives of thousands of Lewisburg residents—how could they be asked to do that without knowing exactly what they were voting for?

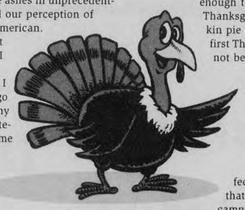
It has also been argued that townspeople were voting without knowing University issues. This is probably true, but they weren't voting for someone to run the University, they were voting for someone to run their town. A large part of the University doesn't even lie within the limits of the area over which the person elected would have jurisdiction. It was important that the townspeople knew the issues which would affect their town, including some that would affect town-gown relations. But we can blame their ignorance of University issues next time the town is allowed to vote for the president of the University.

Students who didn't vote because they didn't care should be commended. It is irresponsible for students to blindly determine the lives of the townspeople. If they are knowledgeable about the issues and genuinely care about what goes on in Lewisburg, I agree that they should vote. Voting is one of the most essential aspects of our democratic system. But unless they know what their vote could potentially achieve, students do not have the responsibility to show their support for the blue and orange by voting for one of their own in the town elections.

Thanksgiving has new meaning this year

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

Writing out a check the other day I absentmindedly asked my friend what the date was. She told me it was Nov. 11. Wow, I thought, exactly two months. Two months from the day that will live in infamy in American, if not global, history. Two months from the day that ripped our country apart, only to have it rise quickly from the ashes in unprecedented unity. Two months from the day that changed our perception of what it means to live in this country, to be an American. At the same time, I thought, only two short months. I've seen changes in those months that I have not seen before in an entire year of my life.



And then it really hit me ... Thanksgiving. All I had been thinking about was a break, a time to go home and relax, to watch TV for hours and have my mom do my laundry. I had thought about my excitement to see my family, but it never occurred to me until that moment that thousands of families would be different this year. Thanksgiving, next to Christmas, is the pinnacle of family gathering. For some, this holiday is the only time of year that they see certain family members.

I realize now that for many there will be empty places at the table. Instead of a time for gluttonous family celebration, it may become glaringly obvious what is missing. I'm sure that Thanksgivings of the past, during World War I and II, the Korean War and Vietnam were also painful times for families, but I also think we can all agree that the shocking, senseless, and immediate loss of life surrounding Sept.11, makes the absence of family that much harder to swallow. Not only will families be missing those who are gone forever, but many families will be missing those who may be gone for indefinite amounts of time—the troops who are being sent in droves to the Middle East on this controversial quest for justice. I know that this is beginning to sound a bit morbid, but that is not what I'm trying to convey. Rather, I want to make other people aware, on this campus or anywhere that this article reaches, that we need to be more thankful this year than we ever have been.

Last year I spent my Thanksgiving abroad in England, and let's face it, that's not exactly a country that would be celebrating our holiday. My friend's family, who had just moved from America to England, was kind enough to invite me into their home for a real American Thanksgiving celebration. The turkey, stuffing and pumpkin pie certainly helped to ease the homesickness of my first Thanksgiving without my family, but certainly could not be a substitute for my own family. With this anecdote I urge you all to think of our friends and classmates abroad right now, who will most likely not make it home for the holiday. Any Thanksgiving away from home may be a difficult time, but particularly this year, when family is so essential, and its importance so much more apparent.

There is not one person who has not been affected by what has happened, and the aftermath that continues to resonate, in our country. While our campus has been fractioning off into liberal and conservative, for the war or against it, we may have forgotten that no matter what we believe there is a time to simply put it aside and be thankful. Be thankful that we are a strong country who can come together in a time of crisis. Be thankful for your family, whether it be changed or not, do not forget to cherish the living as much as those who have left us. Be thankful for a home to go to and a family—no matter what that word encompasses-to love and support. Most of all, be hopeful—hopeful that our country will overcome and neither we or the generations to follow will have to face what we have seen just two short months ago.

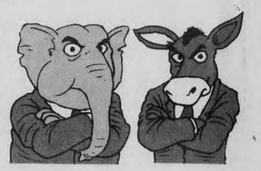
Political clubs spur discussion by students

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

So my inbox tells me that we've got a "Liberals Club" forming here on campus. My reaction? Hey, cool.

Don't get me wrong. I'm a die-hard Republican and a member of the University's newly formed Conservatives Club. I doubt I'd last five minutes at a Liberals Club meeting (before they threw me out a window or something), not that I'd ever really care to go. But I do think their formation can be a good thing, both for the campus in general and for conservatives in particular.

One reason should be obvious—it's that even being liberal (read: wrong about everything under the sun) is better and far more interesting than being apathetic. In addition to breeding and perpetuating ignorance about important issues both on- and off-campus, apathy is boring. If the Liberals Club can even work to make people aware of certain issues that they might not be aware of otherwise, they've done some good ... as long as the conservatives are there to offer their point of view as well—which is, of course, purely the responsibility of the conservatives themselves.



In this way, we just might be able to get some substantive political dialogue going. Right now, most of the communication takes place through homemade fliers or the pages of the Bucknellian—and it is not communication so much as it is yelling and screaming. Where there ought to be intelligent exchange of ideas, too often there is rudeness and sloppy, immature bravado. Hopefully these new political organizations will allow students of each persuasion to get their message together, and make it a good one. To have to actively and openly compete for the hearts and minds of the campus will force both liberals and conservatives to put out their very best arguments; the liberals will help the conservatives by keeping them intellectually honest (and vice versa). I know what I think—to hear why someone else thinks something different will force me to think more clearly and articulate it better. It is good to be right; better still to be right and thoughtful.

The greatest benefit to the campus lies not in the mere existence of a Liberals Club, or even a Conservatives Club. It lies in the interaction between the two; one is almost no fun without the other. If these two clubs get it right, well-reasoned political ideas ought to be whizzing around this place in and around your head like radio waves, 24 hours a day. We will do our part. Here's to hoping the liberals do theirs, in part by simply getting their club off the ground.

And if they don't, then maybe in a year or so we'll be out a Liberals Club. I guess we'll still have a liberals club. We'll just have to call it what we've always called it: The Faculty.

Car policy creates transportation problems

By Colby Ricker
Staff Writer

I am a freshman. I cannot have a car on campus. I live in New Hampshire. I cannot walk home. However, I do need to get from Lewisburg to New Hampshire during breaks, and as there are no buses that run from here to there the easiest way for me to get home is to hitch a ride. (Believe it or not, there are other students here who come from New Hampshire.)

Unfortunately, sometimes schedules conflict. Lets say that my ride home was planning on leaving a few days early for Thanksgiving break. Lets continue to assume that I have an exam or quiz scheduled for the Monday directly before break officially begins. If I leave, I am penalized academically. If I stay, I don't go home.

The scenario becomes grimmer when you consider the situation of people who can't drive home. For example, let's say a student lives in Montana. In order to get plane tickets the student must book at least a month in advance. The student checks his calendar and finds out that he doesn't have any tests or quizzes the Tuesday before break officially begins, so he books himself on a Tuesday flight that is $50 cheaper than the one that leaves on Wednesday. The week before break his professor announces that a quiz will be moved from Thursday to Tuesday. Now the student can either change his ticket and pay a fee to the airline, skip his quiz and pay a penalty on his report card or scrap the trip all together and pay for food all week. There really is no good solution.

I want to clarify that I don't see this situation as the fault of any one individual. It is the fault of the University. University policy says that tests and quizzes cannot be made up except in special cases. These cases do not include cheaper airfare or anxious drivers. If you have to leave because your ride or plane is leaving, and you have a quiz to take you can expect to take a hit academically. I don't think this is fair, and there are likely professors who agree with me, but those are the rules.

Of course, rules can be changed, although, I'm not sure that simply granting blanket permission to make up missed assignments is the solution. It would be nice, but if that were the case it is entirely possible that the semester would never end. "Uh, yeah, I'll make up that test from November sometime after spring break." Furthermore, as students we should probably accept responsibility for our actions, and be mature, and blah, blah, blah. However, in my (hypothetical) case, as in the case of our friend from Montana, the absentee is not at fault for his absenteeism, at least, not entirely. If the University changed its policy, professors could use their discretion to judge whose case deserved a make up, and whose deserved a, "'fraid not." Another solution is to allow freshmen to have cars. If I didn't need to hitch a ride, I wouldn't have to miss class, hypothetically speaking, of course.

Whatever the University decides to do (my guess: nothing) I hope that they re-examine the rigidity of their policy, this one and all others dealing with student life. I am only a freshman, but the one thing that I have already learned here, nothing works for everybody all the time.

THE CAMPAIGN HAS BEGUN ...

Northern Alliance breaks Taliban lines

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

According to several major media sources, including The Associated Press, the rebel Northern Alliance has now taken control of three major cities in Afghanistan, including the capital, Kabul. The Northern Alliance marched triumphantly into Kabul on Tuesday, following its conquests of the strategic Taliban garrison Mazar-i-Sharif and the northeastern city of Taliquan.

The war in Afghanistan has left the Taliban with only one major stronghold, Kandahar, a city in the south. The supreme leader of the Taliban, Mullah Mohammed Omar, claimed to be there when he made a radio address telling his followers that, "This is my order: that you should obey your commander." But even Kandahar, which the AP called "the birthplace of the hardline Islamic movement," may be slipping out of the Taliban's grasp. Kandahar has recently been the site of Taliban mutinies and outbreaks of fighting, and there are even unconfirmed reports that the Taliban has abandoned that city as well.

According to the AP, U.S. officials have speculated that the Taliban's new strategy may be to abandon cities and fight a guerilla war from Afghanistan's southern mountains. It is unclear whether that is a conscious decision or merely a military necessity due to widespread desertions.

Courtesy of Reuters

Northern Alliance troops enter Kabul, the capital of Afghanistan after five weeks of U.S. airstrikes.

Following a streak of military victories in the north, the Northern Alliance took Taliquan without firing a shot, and Taliban forces retreated from Kabul when the Alliance forces arrived on the city's edge.

The Taliban's retreat has had remarkable social consequences, which the New York Times has reported in detail. In the liberated cities, barbershops are packed with men who relish the idea of having their Taliban-mandated beards shaved off. Women now walk the streets alone or with other women. When under Taliban rule, they could only walk outside if accompanied by a male family member. Citizens are also blaring loud music and watching long hidden television sets, both of which are activities the Taliban forbade. Young men happily speak of perhaps growing their hair long, something they could not have safely discussed just a few days ago. Men of all ages are throwing off their turbans, and cigarettes are reappearing in people's jubilant mouths.

As 23-year-old Afghani pharmacist Muhammad Humayun declared, "The Taliban, they were cruel people, and the whole city clapped and cheered when they retreated. The first thing I did was take my turban off and throw it away."

The AP has noted, however, that women have not yet chosen to stop wearing their all-covering burkas, as they are unsure of what the new rules will be.

The Northern Alliance's march into Kabul was slightly discomforting to the world community. President George W. Bush and several other leaders had repeated their wish that the Alliance not occupy Kabul, for fear that it would then be able to control the government. The Alliance is made up primarily of ethnic minorities, and the United States and its allies want ethnic Pashtuns, which constitute a much larger portion of Afghanistan's population and dominate the Taliban, to play a role in the new government.

Northern Alliance leaders claimed, according to the AP, that they needed to enter Kabul to maintain law and order and that that is all they are doing. Its leaders have invited all Afghan factions to come to Kabul and form a government—except, that is, the Taliban. They maintain that they are not occupying the city.

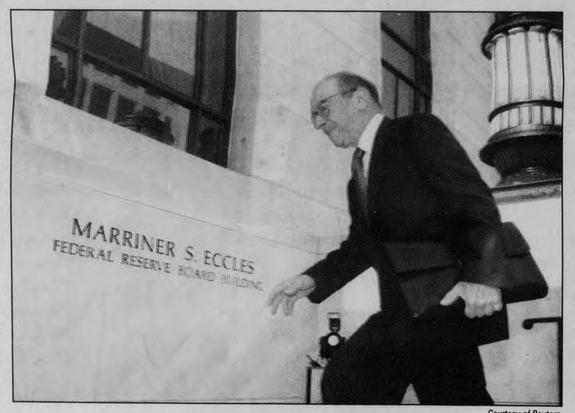
U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld has confirmed that U.S. special forces are in Kabul to offer "advice and counsel" to the Northern Alliance. Alliance commanders are helping Americans find Taliban data in the city that could potentially expose the location of terrorist Osama bin Laden, whom Bush has promised the United States will hunt down.

U.S. military action, including help from a U.S. special forces, continues in the south of Afghanistan. CNN has reported that bin Laden is now on the run, and that U.S. forces are in hot pursuit of the terrorist leader.

Lower interest rates dramatically affect the American economy

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

A government agency is running out of ammunition as you read this. It is not the Army, Air Force or Navy. In fact, it is the Federal Reserve headed up by Alan Greenspan that has backed itself into a seemingly inescapable corner. The Federal Reserve has lowered interest rates by four-and-a-half percent since the beginning of this year, yet the economy continues to stagnate. With interest rates now at two percent, Greenspan and his colleagues have exhausted their ammunition to no avail.



Courtesy of Reuters

Alan Greenspan, Chairman of the Federal Reserve entering the Federal Reserve Board Building.

The U.S. economy has struggled since the dot-com boom ended in 2000. Companies have been struggling to make profits, once valuable employees are finding their jobs eliminated and consumer confidence, according to the Conference Board, has been steadily dropping throughout the year. Likewise, the unemployment rate has also been steadily increasing as the number of layoffs continues to mount.

Many economists have questioned the actions of the Federal Reserve over the last year from both sides of the issue. The Federal Funds Rate—the basis for all interest rates in the United States—has been lowered 10 straight times in 2001 and the economy has yet to see any signs of recovery. In these unprecedented move, interest rates have fallen from an already low six-and-a-half to two percent. The only problem is that investors have seen most of these moves coming and the stock market has not reacted as the Fed had hoped.

After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the economy has been placed into a steeper fall. Airlines are reeling from the loss of travel while business and even car rental companies are feeling the pinch. While some sectors are seeing better business, like defense and biomedical companies, most are hurting as consumers are spending less and saving more.

Recession is another word that has slipped into view over the past year. In a report published on MSNBC.com, Harvey Rosenblum, the president of the National Association of Business Economists and research director at the Federal Reserve Bank in Dallas, explained his view of the current recession, which, in some ways, goes against the common belief that the Fed's actions have failed to work.

"The Sept. 11 attacks pushed the U.S. economy into a recession that will be mild both in depth and duration," said Rosenblum. "The rapid easing of monetary and fiscal policy this time around should enable the economy to return to positive growth more quickly than usual and with lower interest rates and inflation than during the 1990s expansion."

Despite all of the talk about the slowdown, there is some hope. On Wed. Nov. 14, the retail sales report, according to MSNBC.com, rose a record 7.1 percent. Its largest one-month gain ever, the rise was a sharp turnaround from September's number that showed a 2.2 percent decline. The strength came largely from car sales. With favorable financing rates from American car-makers and low interest rates on bank loans, many Americans went to their car dealerships and purchased cars in October.

Whether the Federal Reserve acted correctly in the past year by lowering interest rates dramatically, it is hard to escape the fact that the American economy has slowed significantly. Only time will tell if the rate cuts were the correct thing to do but right now, many investors and analysts are questioning Greenspan's move.

Crash of flight 587 puts the nation on edge

Police officials examine the engine of flight 587 near the crash site.

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

On Monday at 9:17 a.m., American Airlines flight 587 crashed into a residential area outside of Manhattan, N.Y. The plane was on its way to Santo Domingo in the Dominican Republic. According to CNN, all 260 people on board were killed when the plane came town in the neighborhood of Rockaway in the borough of Queens. The crash destroyed four houses and damaged 11 others. The crash dealt another blow to an already battered neighborhood. Fox News reported that Rockaway suffered about 75 casualties on Sept. 11. The area is inhabited largely by firefighters and other emergency personnel as well as by men and women who work in the financial district.

Although authorities now believe that the crash was caused by mechanical failure, the city of New York was on high alert in the hours after the crash. CNN reported that Mayor Giuliani closed the bridges and tunnels into New York, and the Pentagon ordered additional combat air patrols over the eastern seaboard. The FBI also noted that while there was no evidence of terrorism, they could not rule out sabotage.

According to CNN, eyewitnesses claimed to have seen what appeared to be an explosion followed by parts of the plane breaking up. "Oh my God," was Giuliani's initial response when told about the crash of Flight 587. In a press conference later in the day, CNN reported Giuliani as saying "The consequences so far are catastrophic," and that the casualties would likely exceed those of TWA flight 800.

After recovering and examining the flight data recorder, the cockpit voice recorder, and other pieces of the wreckage, the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) is now telling CNN that the crash was likely caused by mechanical failure. It now appears that the tail rudder of the aircraft, an Airbus A300, broke off during the flight, causing the pilots to lose control of the plane. However, according to CNN, the NTSB is stumped as to exactly why the rudder fell off.

One possibility being examined is that turbulence from a plane in front of flight 587 may have placed too much stress on the airframe, causing it to break apart. According to MSNBC, the plane was flying about two and a half minutes behind a JAL 747-400. Two and a half minutes is equal to about six nautical miles, and is well within FAA regulations. Chairman of the NTSB Bob Francis told CNN that although it is theoretically possible for the wake of another aircraft to breakup an airliner, it "certainly would be unprecedented as far as I know." Francis also said that air-traffic control tapes are being examined along with the evidence recovered from the plane, "but certainly it appears that the way in which it broke off is very unusual."

The tail and rudder of the plane were at the beginning of the debris trail according to CNN, indicating that they were among the first pieces to come off in the crash. Both engines also fell off of the plane in the crash. However, none of the parts show any indication of either an explosion or a strike by a foreign object such as a bird.

Football downed by Lehigh 21-14

Lehigh captures Patriot League title

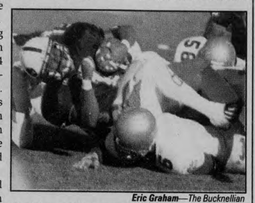
By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

Two of the top defenses in the nation clashed heads on Saturday in a game that would determine the Patriot League champion for the 2001 season. The Bucknell Bison came into the game needing a win to have a chance at the title and the Lehigh Mountain Hawks needed a win to clinch the title for the fourth straight season.

The defensive struggle went Lehigh's way as the Mountain Hawks outlasted the Bison 21-14 for the victory in front of a season high 8,831 fans at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

Bucknell	14
Lehigh	21

After being forced to punt on their first possession of the game, the Bison got an interception from Vic Cole '04 on Lehigh's second play from scrimmage. Cole returned the ball to the Lehigh 15-yard line and the Bison took advantage of the early Mountain Hawk mistake. On second-and-goal from the Lehigh four yard line Todd Wenrich '03 connected with full back Todd Warmington '03 in the flat for the Bucknell touchdown to give the Bison an early 7-0 lead.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Bison offense struggled against a strong Lehigh defense that held the Bison to 14 points.

On the ensuing drive the Mountain Hawks marched 74 yards on 20 plays, chewing up 8:56 off the clock. The monster drive was capped off by a Lehigh quarterback sneak from the one-yard line to tie the score 7-7 at the end of the first quarter.

Early in the second quarter the Bison ran into a bit of luck. After Lehigh blocked a Bucknell punt, George Cowan '02 recovered the ball and ran in 19 yards to the Bucknell 44-yard line to give the Bison a first down. When the Bison could not successfully move the ball, they punted again.

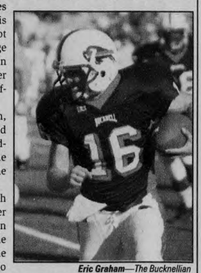
This time the punt got away clean, but Lehigh fumbled the punt and Mark Tallman '02 recovered the ball for the Bison on the Lehigh 31-yard line. The Bison were unable to take advantage of the Mountain Hawk mistakes, and came away with no points after a missed field goal from 42 yards out.

The Bison began to move that ball down the field, and looked to have a chance to score right before halftime, but a Bucknell fumble squandered any hopes of the Bison going into halftime with a lead. The half ended with the score knotted at seven.

Early in the third quarter, the luck swung Lehigh's way. A Wenrich pass fell into the hands of a Lehigh linebacker at the Bucknell 25-yard line, and there was a clear path to the end zone. This put the Mountain Hawks up 14-7 with 12:24 remaining in the third period.

On two consecutive Lehigh drives at the end of the third quarter Tallman came up with takeaways for the Bison. He recovered a fumble, but the Bison were unable to take advantage of the Mountain Hawk turnover. On Lehigh's next drive he intercepted a pass on the Bucknell 49-yard line.

This time the Bison moved the ball all the way down to the Lehigh one yard line, much in part to a 36-yard one-handed catch by Jim Horan '04, who led the Bison with 10 catches for 129 yards on the day. But Chris Lundberg's '03 field goal attempt was tipped at the line of scrimmage and deflected wide left. Tallman was chosen the Diversified Player of The Game for his defensive efforts.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Todd Wenrich '03 passed for 228 yards against a superior Lehigh D.

"If I had a chance to do it again, I would have gone for it," Head Coach Tom Gadd said about deciding to kick the field goal on the fourth and goal situation from the one yard line.

Midway through the fourth quarter Lehigh tacked on another touchdown on a 56-yard pass down the middle of the field to make the score 21-7. On the next drive the Bison showed that they were by no means out of the game. They marched the ball 84 yards in nine plays, and Wenrich capped of the drive with a 39-yard touchdown pass to Albert Marquardt '04 to make the score 21-14 with 3:56 to play.

The Bison defense did their job, and forced Lehigh to punt quickly on their next drive. But, the Bucknell comeback was stifled when Wenrich fumbled the ball while trying to escape the Mountain Hawk rush. Lehigh recovered the ball with 1:03 on the clock, and was able to kneel on the ball three times to run out the clock for a final score of 21-14.

"Turnovers were a big part of the game," Wenrich said.

There were eight turnovers between the two teams, but it was the Bison that were not able to convert on Lehigh's five turnovers. "We had a couple of chances, and we just didn't put them in. We didn't take advantage of our chances," Gadd said.

"Offensively we knew that is was going to be a struggle, and we just couldn't get any points on the board," Wenrich added.

The Bison defense held the nation's third ranked scoring offense to only 14 offensive points. "Our defense has hardly given up anything," Gadd said.

"Lehigh is known as an offensive super power, but the defense did all we could," Tallman added.

The Bison close the season against rival Colgate in Hamilton, New York on Saturday.

Women's soccer advances to NCAA tournament with OT win over Navy

By Andrew Bevan

With one stroke of her right foot from the penalty spot Sunday afternoon, Lauren Schwarz '03 made history for Bucknell Women's soccer by winning the Patriot League Championship 2-1 over Navy in overtime and earning the program its first-ever League Championship.

Navy	1

Just over three minutes into the extra-session, Bison Tri-Captain Tara Utchel '03 was pulled down from behind inside the penalty area. Schwarz finished the penalty kick into the back of the net for her second goal of the season and was named the Patriot League Championship Most Valuable Player for her efforts.

"The championship was a truly memorable experience. We outplayed Navy throughout the game, and were able to capitalize on their mistakes. We wanted to walk off the field with no regrets and I think that it what made the difference. We were all committed to making ourselves champions," Schwarz said.

Courtesy of Athletic Communications

The team gathered together to watch the NCAA selection in the Fieldhouse this past Wednesday.

The Orange and Blue were aggressive from the opening whistle, out-shooting the Midshipmen 9-2 in the first half, but were unable to find the back of the goal.

Sophomore forward Kristie Simon ended the 0-0 stalemate in the 68th minute, putting in a rebound from point-blank range off a shot from fellow frontrunner Savannah Rennels '04. The Bison almost won in regulation, but were denied by their opponents with just under a minute left in regulation when Navy capitalized on a defensive error by the Orange and Blue to knot the game at one.

"We were trying to stall at the end of the game and we knew the only way they would have a chance was with their goalie punting the ball because she had the wind behind her and her punts were going 70 yards. That is exactly what happened and there was a scramble in front of the goal and they put it in," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

"Navy's goal with 55 seconds left in regulation was a hard blow, but everyone on and off the field dwelled on it for less than a minute before we all confirmed that we were just going to beat them in overtime," Tri-Captain Anna Hall '02 said.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Goalie Laurie Purse '03 tallied three saves in the game against Navy.

"That is something I will never forget. It was amazing to see the confidence they had at the end of regulation. No one had a face of defeat," Findlay said.

Team of the Week

With the victory the Bison assured themselves of their first winning season since 1995 and tied the program single season record for wins with 12.

"Our pregame was about how much heart do you have. We knew Navy had been in the championship game four times before and had the experience," Findlay said.

"I can't describe what I felt when the ball went into the net. I don't think it has set in for the players and me. Its something we all dream off and it feels like all of the sweat and tears over the years have been worth it," Findlay said.

"It is like a fairytale. This is the closest team I have been a part of the last four years at Bucknell and I can't think of a more amazing way to finish off the season than as Patriot League Champs," Tri-Captain Ali Chandler '02 said.

The Orange and Blue advanced to the finals by virtue of there 2-1 victory over American in the first round on Friday afternoon. Lindsay

X-country sends two runners to national tournament

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

Neither snow nor rain could prevent the Bucknell cross-country team from doing what they do best ... running. Any person who has walked around the campus during the day has witnessed these athletes in action.

As individuals or in groups, in wool hats or tank tops, these runners are on a mission. They arrive at school in August before any of the other students do and they will be the last ones to leave in May.

During the cross-country season, the men's team is running an average of 70-100 miles weekly, while the women are running an average of 40-70 miles weekly.

Each member of the team runs cross country, indoor track and then outdoor track. They hold themselves and their teammates to the very highest standards, constantly pushing each other to run a little farther and a little faster.

"These athletes are taking their bodies to the limit to compete against scholarship kids. I admire them."
— Head Coach Kevin Donner

The cross-country team plays by different rules than most of the other teams at Bucknell.

While many of our athletic teams compete to win the league tournament in order to receive an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament, the cross-country team must compete in a regional tournament.

Here, they must run against athletes from much larger programs, many of which grant athletic based scholarships. For a small liberal arts school, Bucknell has proven that they can run with anyone.

"It is a lot tougher for us to get to the NCAA Championship than those sports that get an automatic bid from winning the league tournament," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "We have to go through a regional meet first. These athletes are taking their bodies to the limit to compete against scholarship kids. I admire them."

The Bison proved their dedication, commitment, and drive this past weekend as they traveled to Lehigh for the Mid-Atlantic Regional race.

Just missing an overall team bid to the National Championship cross-country meet, the women placed third and the men placed seventh. The team experienced quite a few standout individual performances on top of their exceptional overall team performance.

On the women's side, junior Theresa Dennis ran an individual best race of her season in a field of 180 competitors. Dennis crossed the finish line in 10th place which earned her an automatic bid to the NCAA Championship.

Senior captain Becki Marshall finished in 13th place and senior Chris Crowe came in 16th. All three of these women were awarded All-Regional honors for finishing in the top 25.

Seniors Kristen Ferrell and Kelly McConnell, Bucknell's final two runners, finished the race at 42nd and 48th respectively.

For the Bison men, junior Captain Greg Costello had a seventh place finish which was good enough for him to earn All-Regional honors and to receive an automatic bid to the NCAA Championship meet.

Costello will be the first male member of the Bucknell Cross Country team to compete at this meet since 1994. Junior Bryan Johnson will join Costello on the All-Regional squad with his 23rd place finish. Behind Costello and Johnson were junior Lou Palma (31st) and seniors P.J. Ward (54th) and Travis Etters (56th).

The Bison's top three runners at this regional meet will be back next year which makes for a bright future for the men's cross-country team. Coach Donner refers to these three juniors as "a great nucleus of front runners."

The cross-country team will be gathering for the last time this season on Saturday, Nov. 17. They will attend with hopes of defending their championship title in the ECAC Cross Country meet.

Strong Crew showing in Philadelphia

By Sarah Riggs
Contributing Writer

Last Saturday, the Bucknell men's and women's crew teams traveled to Philadelphia to compete in the Philadelphia Frostbite Regatta.

Unlike the Head of the Schuylkill, which features a 2.6-mile distance common in fall races, the Frostbite Regatta spans just 2000 meters, the spring "sprinting" distance. At the end of the fall season this allows rowers and coxswains to preview their competition and see what the spring races hold in store.

Bucknell's novice squads raced an unprecedented number of boats this year, entering four novice women's eights and one novice men's eight.

Last year's women's squad consisted of just two eights, but their first and second place finishes at the Frostbite set high standards for this year's crews, as did last year's first place finish by the novice men.

Coxed by Sherri Glicklin '05, Bucknell's first novice women's eight (Bucknell A) was comprised of freshmen Lauren Donnelly, Katherine Thompson, Laura Jacque and Candice Olszewski in the stern four, and with Emily Frost, Vi Ngo, Jocelyn Dautel and Meiko Nevels in the bow four.

With a finishing time of 9:31.6, they came in a close second to Loyola (9:25.8), beating Binghamton, Delaware, St. Mary's, and Haverford. In the next race another Bucknell novice women's eight finished third in 10:02.0.

In the third heat of novice women's eight George Mason took first (9:45.4), but the patriot league rivalry inspired Bucknell to a finishing time of 10:03.1, beating Lehigh B, Loyola B, Lafayette C and University of Maryland.

Slomer '02 gave her side the early advantage with her first goal of the season, a 30-yard blast unassisted 14 minutes into the contest.

American answered 11 minutes later to tie the game. The Bison were on their way to overtime again when Emily Keber '03 worked a textbook give and go with Utchel and scored her second game-winner of the season with 11 seconds remaining. Orange and Blue goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 had two saves on the afternoon to earn her 11th victory of the season.

Bucknell	2

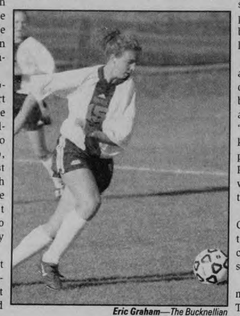
"We came out solid and focused and dominated the first part of the first half and the end of the second half," Findlay said. "Lindsay's goal was outstanding. No one could have saved it. Also, Laurie had a huge save in the last five minutes of the game, which could have been a reason we turned the game around. I wasn't sure if we were going to go into overtime because we really stepped it up at the end."

"The weekend was all about paybacks. Entering the tournament and knowing we'd most likely play two teams that had beaten us before, was not discouraging but motivating," Chandler said. "Written on our left arm was 'PB' [paybacks] in permanent pen. This way just in case sometime during the 90 minutes we forgot what we were playing for we could look down at our forearm and remind ourselves we were playing for pride."

The Patriot League Champions ended their regular season on a positive note by defeating non-conference foe Howard 3-1 on the road this past Wednesday. Rennels notched her team-leading tenth goal of the year, 11-and-a-half minutes into the game on a header off a corner pass from Hall.

Rennels added another just over a minute into the second half with a beautiful shot from the left side into the upper right corner of the net. Howard would get one back in the 64th minute, but Utchel gave the Bison some insurance five minutes later on a breakaway, registering her first tally of the season. Purse had three saves in net for the Orange and Blue.

"Howard was having the most successful season in the history of their program. We knew it would be a tough game. Our goals were to take a lot of shots and be compact on defense and deny any attack," Findlay said.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Emily Keber '03 scored her second game-winning goal against American.

"Savannah got back on track after her injury and it was great to see Tara get a goal. Also, our reserves off of the bench did a great job stepping up on the field," Findlay said.

The Bison racked up some hardware for their trophy shelves when the end-of-the-year Patriot League awards were announced a day before the tournament. Rennels and Slomer were named to the All-Patriot League First Team and Utchel was selected as a member of the All-Patriot League Second Team. Midfielder Ashley Dincher '05 was named Co-Rookie of the Year and Findlay was selected as Patriot League Coach of the Year for the second year in a row.

Bucknell	3
Howard	1

"It is an honor to have two on the first team and one on the second team. Ashley being Co-Rookie of the Year shows the talent of our younger players and it is great for the area because she is a local kid," Findlay said.

"It has been a great season and this award means a great deal to me, but it would not have been received without the help of all my teammates," Rennels said. "We have come together at many key moments and we accomplished the goal of winning the Patriot League championship, which we set at the beginning of the season."

"It is an honor to be named Coach of the Year knowing the talent and dedication of other coaches in the League," Findlay said.

The Orange and Blue now move on the NCAA tournament. They found out on Monday that they would travel to Penn State to play the Nittany Lions in the first round on Friday at 5:30.

"It would have been nice to play someone we haven't already played but we played great against them before. I really think that game re-instilled confidence in our abilities during the season," Findlay said.

"Penn State was in the Final Four last year and they are probably contending for the national championship this year. We are going to take advantage of our opportunities and enjoy the whole experience. It is an honor in itself to be one of 64 teams still playing out of over 260 Division I teams," Findlay said.

Gadd one win away from career football wins-record

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

The task of reviving a college football program was nothing new to football Head Coach Tom Gadd when he arrived on the Bucknell campus seven years ago.

Prior to coaching the Blue and Orange Gadd had revitalized a Long Beach State team that posted a record of 1-10 the season prior to his arrival and a University of Utah squad that in three seasons previous to Gadd was a combined 5-28.

Gadd was also responsible for shaping up the programs of the University of California at Riverside and the University of South Carolina. So it was of no surprise when Gadd and his staff marched into Lewisburg and turned around a Bison program that had just one winning season in its last 14.

"It wasn't the first time we had done it," Gadd said. "We had experienced the same situation four or five times before."

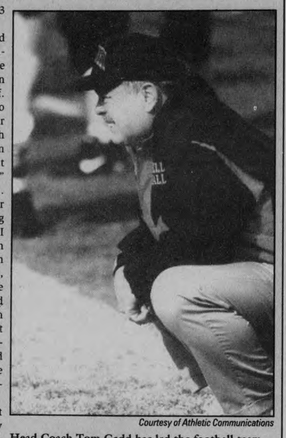
Since Gadd arrived at Bucknell, he has compiled 48 wins in seven consecutive winning seasons. As of Nov. 16, he is one win away from becoming Bucknell's winningest football coach. Gadd attributes his success to the changes the squad has undergone.

"It's a change in attitude and work ethic; a change in off-season workouts, discipline, and changing people's perceptions," he said. "The talent pool wasn't as poor as everyone thought. There were good kids here that were ready to work, listen and do what you asked them to do."

"When Coach Gadd came to my house to recruit me he guaranteed me that we had great talent and that we would not have a losing season, it would just take hard work," defensive lineman Eric Storm '03 said.

Gadd worked extensively with the players, both on the field and off.

"I have so much respect for him as a coach and as a person that I cannot even express it," Storm said. "Freshman year I wasn't doing as well as I should have on the field and in the classroom, but he pulled me aside, showed confidence in me and that gave me motivation to succeed not just on the field but in everything I do."



Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Head Coach Tom Gadd has led the football team to seven straight winning seasons.

"When I first got here my freshman summer we were in freshman camp and we were doing a drill," Defensive Back Reed Tunison '02 said. "Coach came over to me and told me that even though I am undersized, I can play here. That gave me the confidence to do my thing."

"To be successful in life you have to demonstrate the same characteristics in job situations, class, etc.," Gadd said. "You have to walk and talk with the same qualities."

If the Bison win on Saturday at rival Colgate, Gadd will earn his 49th win and will have the most all-time wins of any Bucknell head football coach.

"I would love for him to get the record," Tunison said. "It would mean a lot to me for him to get that win in my last game in a Bison uniform. I am honored and I appreciate the opportunity that I got to play for him."

As for the wins record, it isn't the top priority on Gadd's mind.

"The record is a sidelight," said Gadd. "Goals are nice to look back on but I am not even thinking about it during the game or in pregame. It would be an honor in retrospect because they have played football here so long, but it is not the focus."

This kind of unselfish approach to the game and the team defines Gadd's character succinctly.

"Every day he shows how much he cares about Bucknell football and his players," Storm said. "He is so passionate about it."

Flick breaks second school record in Penn State defeat

This past weekend, the men's swimming and diving team placed third, and the women's team placed fourth at the Penn State Invitational. The men tallied 496 points, edging Villanova for third place honors. The team was led by Adam Freeman '05 who placed first in the one meter diving event with a score of 254 points and third in the three meter diving event with 210.3 points.

Stelios Saffos '03 also did well, earning two third place finishes in the 100 and 200 breast stroke. Peter Garvin '04 placed eighth among 34 competitors in the 100-yard freestyle, only 1.87 seconds behind the leader.

The women's team racked up 527 points but were unable to pass third place West Chester who had 656.5 points.

Jackie Feinthel '05 picked up a fifth place finish among 20 other competitors in the 500-yard freestyle. Abby Weaver '02 placed eighth among 26, precisely one second behind the first place winner.

Jamie Flick '05 led the charge with a fourth place finish in the 100 breast with a time of 1:06.64. Her victory broke the previously standing Bucknell record in that event and is also the second record that Flick has broken in three meets thus far this year. In the season opener in late October, she broke the Bucknell record in the 200 meter breaststroke.

Both teams square off against Navy and American this Saturday.

Indianapolis (4-4) at New Orleans (4-4)

The Colts are hurting. Edgerrin James is sidelined with a knee injury and Manning's jaw was broken last week. The Saints also find themselves struggling to get back into the playoffs. They have lost two intense games since handing the Rams their sole defeat of the season. The Colts just need to find a better way to protect their QB and their lead. The Saints win.

New York Jets (6-3) at Miami (6-2)

The Jets have six wins due to one man, Curtis Martin. He is the NFL's leading rusher and the sole offensive punch of the Jets. This divisional matchup will decide the leader of the AFC East. While the Dolphins are undefeated at home this season, the Jets are undefeated on the road this season. The Jets won their first meeting this season on the wings of a 17 point comeback. Miami will be looking to redeem themselves. But Martin will lead the Jets to victory.

Jacksonville (3-5) at Pittsburgh (6-2)

The Steelers looked in trouble after an embarrassing season opener against Jacksonville. However, since then, they have won six of seven games. The Steelers will be looking to avenge the early season loss. The Jaguars looked good early on, winning their first two games against division rivals Pittsburgh and Tennessee, but since then have been disappointing. Bettis and the Steelers' formidable defense will be too much for the AFC Central's new bottom feeder.

Chicago (6-2) at Tampa Bay (4-4)

Is Chicago for real? They could have proved it last week and silenced all doubters with a win against the Packers, with whom they now share the NFC Central lead. Now they face the team that is closest on their heels. Tampa Bay has become a running team and they had better get their passing game working again. The Bucs have not won two games in a row this season. This week won't be any different as the overachieving Bears storm the underachieving Bucs.

New York Giants (5-4) at Minnesota (3-5)

These two teams were expected to be contenders for the NFC title. However, both teams have struggled this year. This game is a rematch of last year's NFC Championship game when the Giants demolished the Vikings 41-0. The Giants defense is unstoppable, led by Michael Strahan who is seven sacks away from the NFL record. But the dismal Viking defense and the bad Giant offense will level out and the Giants will stay in the thick of the playoff hunt.

Indianapolis (4-4) at New Orleans (4-4)

So a few weeks ago I mentioned that Peyton Manning looked like Tim Couch from the Browns. Well I just saw a picture of Peyton's brother Eli who plays for Nebraska. It's like triplets. How many of these guys are gonna pop up? You can almost imagine, you're standing in line at the Bison, talking to a friend, turn around to grab a Twix and standing behind you is a line of about seven guys who all look like Peyton Manning. The Mannings must be at it like jackrabbits. New Orleans.

New York Jets (6-3) at Miami (6-2)

Party in the city where the heat is on, all night, on the beach till the break of dawn ... Welcome to Miami, bienvenidos a Miami. Yes that's right sports fans, it's Will Smith rockin it in da house. And if Will Smith has taught us nothing, and he hasn't, it's that if you're an intergalactic deviant with aspirations for terrestrial domination you best not be steppin' in my crib. Translation: "Go Jets."

Jacksonville (3-5) at Pittsburgh (6-2)

Why am I even writing about Jacksonville? I would rather be a Yankees fan than write about Jacksonville. This team is the most uninspiring collection of two-bit yokels I've ever seen. It's like the Beverly Hillbillies meet Bill and Ted for a fiery debate about campaign finance reform. Sure it's entertaining to watch them make fools of themselves for a little bit, but eventually it's just plain sad. Pit.

Chicago (6-2) at Tampa Bay (4-4)

Chicaaaaagoooo. Chicago is another one of these overachieving monstrosities. Where did they come from? Do they even have a quarterback? Maybe they're being spotted a few points or something. Or the football equivalent of bumper-bowling, where they just bounce off a springy wall instead of running out of bounds. I think that would make the game go a lot quicker too. Chicago

New York Giants (5-4) at Minnesota (3-5)

Daunte Culpepper is a machine. He is artificial intelligence in motion. Living proof of the successes of the technological era that we live in. You couldn't take this man down if you wanted to. Luckily for opponents, he's American made and has a shelf-life equal to his one-year warranty. This man is the equivalent of that Ford Explorer that always seems to be on the side of the road. The men's novice eight placed third behind Columbia and Colgate.

Bucknell's varsity boats put on strong performances to close their fall season. The varsity men's pair finished fifth in 8:48.06. The women's lightweight varsity four rowed a tight race against Delaware and Buffalo. Their third place finishing time of 8:58.0 placed them less than a second behind Buffalo (8:57.1), and just seven seconds off Delaware's first place finish (8:50.7). The varsity women's open four took third place with 9:41.48, trailing Penn State (9:14.8) and Temple (9:04.02), but placing them ahead of UMBL and Loyola.

The women's varsity lightweight eight took third in 9:10.86. The women's varsity open-weight eight finished in 8:54.38, earning fourth place. The varsity men's eight placed fourth with 7:43.49, behind U Penn, Ithaca, and Lafayette and beating U. of Maryland.

McGwire salutes in final curtain call

Outside of Busch Stadium, home to the Saint Louis Cardinals since 1966, there is a massive bronze statue of Hall of Famer Stan Musial. Stan "The Man," an enduring baseball icon, is remembered not only for his dazzling skill on the diamond, but also for his character.

Musial was a gentleman. He was noble. And he loved the game with a passion.

Emblazoned on the pedestal of this grand statue are the words of once-commissioner Ford Frick, offered in tribute upon Musial's retirement in 1963. They read as follows:

Occasionally we are fortunate enough to witness the career of a player whose character could be defined in such a way. Such a player is a rare find—a man with humility, a man who puts the good of the team ahead of his own interests, a man whose composure on and off the diamond is almost chivalric.

"Chivalric" may seem a laughably dramatic word to describe the actions of a professional athlete, but no other word provides such a fitting summation of Mark McGwire's recent decision to terminate his celebrated career.

McGwire had at his disposal a two-year contract that would have put an extra $30 million in his pocket; .187 batting average or not, all Big Mac had to do was scribble his John Hancock on the paper and the money would be his.

But last Sunday, the legendary slugger decided instead to hang up his Cardinals uniform—the same armor that Musial hung up in 1963—and close the book on his 15-year career.

"I have decided not to sign the extension, as I am unable to perform at a level equal to the salary the organization would be paying me," McGwire explained. "I believe I owe it to the Cardinals and the fans of St. Louis to step aside, so a talented free agent can be brought in as the final piece of what I expect can be a World Championship-caliber team."

It's hard to believe that McGwire owes anything to anyone. He gave his best for 11 seasons with the Oakland Athletics, and then did it for another four years in St. Louis.

He helped the A's to three World Series, earning a ring in one of them. He's played in ten postseason series. He's led his league in slugging percentage four times, and home runs five times—including his rookie season, when he set a rookie record of 49 home runs that still stands today. He hit more than 50 home runs for five consecutive seasons, including two seasons of over 60.

The number that everyone will remember, of course, is his 70 home run season of 1998. It doesn't matter that McGwire had to watch Barry Bonds break that record only three seasons after it was set. It doesn't matter that Bonds did it in even less at-bats than McGwire. McGwire set his record in style.

He did it with Sammy Sosa at his heels, all the while embracing Sosa like a partner in crime rather than an enemy. He did it with enough flashbulbs going off at every at-bat to light up a small country. He did it when baseball needed it most. And he did it all while maintaining respect for his teammates and the game.

With McGwire, the team was always the first priority. On occasion he turned away reporters because he felt they should be focusing on a different player or the whole team, rather than him.

McGwire looks out for the best interests of himself and his team, retiring in style.

He understood how much the fans needed him, taking curtain call after curtain call, tipping his hat and smiling in city after city—not for his own gratification, but simply because he recognized how much joy it brought a crowd to see his Paul Bunyonesque manner.

He set up a charity for sexually abused children, and wasn't afraid to talk about the issue—or cry about it—in front of everyone in the nation.

He wasn't afraid to admit that he was using a questionable substance, Androstenedione, and eventually, wasn't afraid to admit that using it was a mistake. His reason for terminating his use of Andro? He wanted to be a better role model for kids.

Unfortunately for McGwire, he just couldn't avoid injuries. Blame it on the drugs, blame it on his size, blame it on luck, blame it on fate. He was plagued by them his whole career, and in the end, they took away his thunder.

He could have hacked out a couple more years. He could have reached 600 home runs for his career total. He could have struggled along through a few more games, a few more curtain calls, a few more giant paychecks.

But instead he did the noble thing, acting in the best interest of the team—a rare move in an age when most players won't even blink before placing the almighty buck ahead of the team, the organization and the fans.

It could be said that this decision was a final curtain call for McGwire. He prided himself in his dedication to the good of the game. For fifteen years, he gave all he could to the team, to the fans, to the integrity of the game he loved. When his body wore out, he gave all he had left to give, by simply having the class to bow out gracefully.

We can remember him under the flashbulbs. We can remember him circling the bases in jubilation on a euphoric night in September, 1998. We can remember him as the man who hit more home runs in his career than anyone other than Aaron, Ruth, Mays and Robinson. We can remember how he made the most out of every at-bat he had, a fact that is evident in his career at-bat-to-home-run ratio (10.6, the best in history).

But we can also remember what made him so alluring—his humility and his passion for baseball. On Oct. 14, 2001, in what would have been his last Major League at-bat, McGwire put away his bat so that rookie Kerry Robinson could pinch hit for him, because he knew that would be best for the team.

We ought to remember him that way, too. Historically, he wasn't the hitter that Musial was, or the fielder, or the baserunner. But he was, in his own way, every bit the man that Musial was. A gentleman, a team player, a gamer. Forty years after Musial's era, McGwire is a modern version of "The Man."

In the end, McGwire stands as a perfect warrior—a perfect knight in a flawed generation.

Take a good look at him while you can, because it may be 40 more years until we cross paths with another player worthy of that label.
